The outlawed robber chieftain now submitted himself in all things to the missionary, as "his guide, philosopher, and friend;" and some months after his conversion Mr. Moffat proposed that he should accompany him to Cape Town. Africaner said, "I had thought you loved me, and do you advise me to go to the government to be hung up as a spectacle of public justice?" then laying his hand on his head, he said, "Do you not known that I am an outlaw, and that one thousand rixllars have been offered for this poor head?" t last, however, Mr. Moffat having assured him at he would be well received in Cape Town, he nsented to go.

A BOER FARMER'S INCREDULITY CURED.

On their way they came near the farm house in nich the missionary had received kind entertain-ent when travelling toward Namaqua-land. Mr. offat left the wagons and went alone to meet the rmer. The latter seemed startled by his appear-ce, and asked, in rather a wild manner who he as. When the name was given the farmer ex-aimed, "Moffat, it is your ghost!" And it was th difficulty he was persuaded it was the living issionary, for the current report was that he had en murdered by Africaner, and one man de-ared that he had seen his bones.

While walking toward the wagon they were eaking of Africaner, and Mr. Moffat said, "He now a truly good man." "That I cannot edit," replied the farmer; "but if what you as-rt be true, I have only one wish, and that is to e him before I die. As sure as the sun is over ir heads, upon your return I will go with you to e him, though he killed my uncle." They were en near the chief, and Mr. Moffat said, "This Africaner." A few questions having been tisfactorily answered by the former sanguinary arauder, the farmer raised his eyes to heaven, id exclaimed, "Oh God, what a miracle! 'hat cannot Thy grace accomplish?"

Africaner was kindly and affably received in ape Town by the governor of the Colony, Lord harles Somerset, and many in the town who had ard of his terrible exploits years before were led with astonishment as they witnessed the oofs of the wonderful transformation which had en effected.

AFRICANER'S DEATH.

He was faithful to the close of his life, and when found his end approaching, he called all the ople together after the example of Joshua, and ve them directions as to their future conduct. We are not," he said, "what we were, sav-es, but men professing to be taught by the Gos-l. My former life is stained with blood, but Je-is Christ has pardoned me, and I am going to eaven. Oh! beware of falling into the same ils in which I have frequently led you; but seek od, and He will be found of you to direct you."

So died the man, whose black hands had often en red with the blood of Dutch Boers, and hose black face lifted in savage triumph had ten been brightened in the glare of blazing farm-eads. The great missionary who guided him to ie cross of Christ and whose crown of life will e jewelled with many memorials of heroic service one in the cause of the Divine Master, will have one more conspicuous than that on which the ame of Africaner will be engraven.

MR. MOFFAT'S MARRIAGE.

While in Cape Town on this memorable occa-on, in the year 1819, Mr. Moffat was married to liss Mary Smith, who had gone out from Eng-nd. She was the sister of the amiable Rev. ohn Smith, of Madras. For more than fifty years ie was the loving and faithful companion of her usband, cheering the loneliness of an African ission station by her bright and genial presence, nd diffusing encouragement by a buoyant hope-lness that rarely failed, even in the darkest days f trial and disappointment. Her consecrated life n earth was changed for the rest and triumph of nmortality on January 10th, 1871, and four days ter her remains were interred in the Cemetery at orwood, near London. She was seventy-six years f age.

Though strongly attached to Africaner and his eople, Mr. Moffat did not go back to Namaqua-nd, for a deputation from the London Missionary ociety being at the Cape at the time of his mar-age, wished him to prosecute a mission among ie Bechuanas. Mr. and Mrs. Moffat went for a hort time to Griqua Town, while Mr. Hamilton, ereafter to be associated with them in Christian ork among the same tribes, went forward to nd founded a station there, and in 1821 we find hat the three devoted standard-bearers of the truth had fairly settled there and were hard at work.

Their patience was severely tested for a long time by the selfishness and perversity of the natives. They had no religious system, no idea of a Creator, no belief in the immortality of the soul—nothing which might form a groundwork for conveying to them instruction in spiritual things. For a bit of tobacco, or some little equivalent, the missionary might gain their attention for a little time; but his efforts to convey to them the idea of a Creator and a Saviour, appeared as futile as the attempt to transform a granite rock into arable land. For more than five years the people thus continued callous and indifferent to all instruction, unless it were followed by some immediate temporal benefit.

Regardless of their filth and fearless of their ferocity, he went and lived alone among them. He waked, he slept, he wandered, he hunted, he rested, he ate and drank with them, till he had thoroughly mastered the legion of uncouth and fugitive dialects which constituted their tongue; and then he began to preach to them the redemption of Christ. Through the long space of ten years, amid difficulties and distresses of all kinds, now and again aggravated by threats of murder, he labored patiently on, without one sign of success. At length they listened, and then they trembled, and finally they wept. The heart of stone was broken, was melted; repenting of sin, they forsook it; and, hearing the Gospel, believed it.

With the acquisition of the Sechuana language (the vernacular of the Bechuana tribes), an important point was gained. Mr. Moffat did not content himself with simply preaching the Gospel, but translated a number of simple evangelistic hymns. These were learned with avidity and sung by old and young, by day and night. But the great need was the Bible—the Bible in the Sechuana tongue. Without any intention of attempting so colossal a work as the translation of the Scriptures himself, Mr. Moffat, after composing a primer in Sechuana, translated a few Scripture lessons for the use of his schools. But being disappointed in not receiving help from the Bible Society, as he had anticipated, he was induced by the pressing need to make a commencement, and by the year 1832 had completed the Gospel of Luke. He then proceeded to Cape Town to get it printed, but as printers were scarce, this was easier planned than executed, so the missionary had himself to set the type at the Government Printing Office, the plant being placed at his disposal by the kindness of the Governor.

When he returned to his home at the Kuruman he had the pleasure of taking with him a supply of type, a press, paper and ink, which had been sent out from England for his use. These, with the newly acquired skill to use them, furnished him with the means of supplying the long-needed knowledge to the natives.

CONFRONTS A SAVAGE CHIEF.

The early trials of the little band of Christian pioneers were increased by a long drought, for which they were blamed and cursed. It was said that their chapel-bell frightened away the clouds; and even Mr. Moffat's black beard and a bag of salt he had brought in his wagon from Griqua Town were imagined to have something to do with the unkindliness of the heavens. The feeling indeed, fomented and intensified by the professional "rain-makers," became so stormy against the missionaries, that they were informed they would be driven out of the country if they did not speedily take themselves away. The chief who conveyed this message stood at their cottage door, quivering a spear in his right hand in an imposing manner, delivered the decision which had been arrived at in secret council; while Mrs. Moffat stood calmly with a babe in her arms watching the crisis, for such undoubtedly it was.

As fearlessly as David before Goliath and the Philistines; strong, too, like him, in the Divine power on which he threw himself and his cause, with a steadfast, unflinching gaze the missionary looked the spear-bearing chief straight in the eyes, and said with the utmost deliberation, "We were unwilling to leave you. We are now resolved to stay at our post. As for your threats, we pity you, for you know not what you do. We have suffered, it is true; it is no more than we are prepared to expect from those who know no better. As for me, my decision is made, I do not leave your country." Then, throwing open his waistcoat, he stood erect and fearless. "Now, then," he added, "if you will, drive your spears to my heart; and when you have slain me my companions will know that the hour has come for them to depart." "These men," said the chief to his twelve armed attendants, "must have ten lives. When they are so fearless of death, there must be something in immortality."

RUMORS OF MYSTERIOUS WARRIORS.

The confidence of the Bechuana savages having been won by the intrepidity of the missionaries, they enjoyed a complete immunity from any further molestation, and Mr. Moffat had soon an opportunity of rendering services to the tribe by which he gained their cordial esteem.

For more than a year there had been startling rumors in the settlement at Kuruman, about a woman named Mantatee, who was said to be advancing with a mighty army from the interior, conquering all before her, and leaving desolation in her footsteps. Mr. Moffat did not give much credit to the rumor, but being up the country on a mission to a powerful chief, who lived about two hundred miles from the Kuruman, he was convinced that here was truth in the story of the Mantatee army, and saw that unless vigorous measures were adopted it would not be long before his own station would be overrun by the mysterious and insatiable warriors. He hastened home, and communicated the alarming tidings to the people, who were in such consternation that some of them proposed immediate flight to the Kalahari Desert.

Mr. Moffat suggested, as a wiser plan, a request to the Griquas for help. The suggestion was agreed to, and Mr. Moffat himself went to Griqua Town, where he succeeded in his purpose with the chief Waterboer. This bold but judicious action saved the chief of the Bechuanas and his people, who a little while before had sought to drive away him who was now their deliverer. The Griquas, joining with the Bechuanas, advanced against the invading army, whom they so completely routed that they fled from the country.

From place to place in this wild unknown land Moffat went preaching the Gospel to savage tribes, his life often in peril from wild beasts, from men scarcely less ferocious, and from disease; but God preserved him to see the fruit of his labors. Many incidents of thrilling interest are recorded of his adventures and hairbreadth escapes, some of which we hope to give in an early number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

RETURN TO ENGLAND.

In the summer of 1870 the veteran missionary and his wife were compelled by failing health to bid farewell to their beloved Kuruman and return to England, where they were welcomed with the enthusiasm due to their long and faithful services. Dr. Moffat had spent more than fifty years in Africa, and had been in perils from savage men and savage beasts. He had known weary wanderings in the desert, when his tongue was so parched with thirst as to be almost deprived of the power of speech; he had visited and conciliated barbaric kings, whose rude halls were hung with the execrable trophies of cruel and exterminating wars; he had confronted and overcome Herculean difficulties in the spirit of a Christian heroism loftier than that which animated his ancestors on the sanguinary field of Bannockburn; and he had witnessed transformations of character and social life more wonderful than poetry has ever imagined.

Looking back from the height of his numerous years on the scenes of protracted and agonizing toil and sublime achievement, still glowing with the missionary ardor which, in the beginning of his course impelled him to dangers and hardships amid the sterilities of Namaqua-land; and having before his eyes visions of Africaner and a crowd of glorified converts from Kuruman, beckoning him to eternal beatitude, he is worthy of the golden phrase which, in happy parody of Milton, the Rev. W. Arthur applied to him on a great public occasion, "That old Man Magnificent."

NOT GIVEN UP.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Evening, February 13, 1881.*

"How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?"—HOSEA 11 : 8.

God's Favorite People—What He Did for Them—God's Large Heart—Slow to Give a Man Up—A Letter from a Penitent Prisoner — How Many Moves God Has Made to Save—The Birth, Life, and Death of the Saviour—Personal Experience—Childhood—Sickness in the House — Your Wedding-day — The Death of Your Child—A Business Upsetting—The Warning of Sudden Deaths—Never Give a Man Up—A Wife's Twenty Years of Prayer—Never Give Up a Child—A Fate Worse than Death—Boys' Prayed Back Home—Ministers Never to Give Up Their People—An Eternal Disappointment Experimenting with God's Patience—An Awful Entry in the Book of Remembrance.

THOSE people with black eyes and raven hair and olive complexion and arched nose, whom we recognize, whether in New York or London or Berlin, as Jews, were once God's favorites. He takes other people by the hand, but the Jews, the Bible says, He lifted by the arms, as a nurse carries a child over a ditch or lifts it up. So God cared for them. Were they hungry; God made bread in heaven and dropped it down to them. Did they want a lantern to travel by; He raised one a mile long against the sky. Were they dry; He made the water bubble up from the scoop in the rock. He flung over their enemies flies, and locusts, and boils, and blains, and darkness, and the Red Sea. He did everything for those Jews, yet they acted outrageously. They grumbled, they pouted, they lied, they swore, they thrust the fist of their obstinacy into the very face of God. Travelling as they were to the large and beautiful clusters of Canaan, they wanted to go back and get the offensive onions of Egypt.

What are those Assyrian swords being sharpened for and being scoured up for? Look at the sharp blades. Run your finger across the edge cautiously, as you test the sharpness of a razor cautiously, lest it cut you to the bone. Why are those swords being sharpened? It is to hew and cut to pieces these very Jews; but the Lord seems to break down in emotion. He reviews what He has done, and thinks what an awful thing it would be to have them perish, notwithstanding all their advantages, and it seems as if He cannot consent to the massacre, and His voice trembles and there start the tears of a God as he exclaims: "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?"

Oh, what a great, large, generous, sympathetic heart the Lord must have! I wish I could measure it. He has a large hand, for the ocean is represented as lying in the hollow of it, and the waves that whelm Eddystone Lighthouse dash from beach to beach without tossing outside the palm of that hand. But His heart is bigger yet, and though all earth and all heaven have rolled into it, still He longs for other worlds to conquer; and if, as Dr. Chalmers and Dr. Dick thought, the stars are inhabited, at the winding up of all things, when the world shall fly on wings of light into God's heart, after the last world has nestled in the bosom of eternal love, God will throw out His hand over the empty space of immensity, crying, "And yet there is room!"

But if some poor world, some waif of a world, some prodigal world, should insist in flying off in the other direction, methinks God's heart would burst into a tempest of agony as He flung out His hands toward it, crying:

"COME BACK! COME BACK!
How shall I give thee up?"

There are two things for me to do to-night. First, to show you how very slow God is to give a man up, and in the next place to show how very slow we ought to be in giving a man up. While I was thinking of this a letter was sent in to me, dated from one of the prisons of the city, in which a man says: "My happiest days were three years ago, when I was a member of the church in Baltimore and had a Sunday-school class. I have been lying in prison waiting for my trial. Had I been more attentive to my spiritual welfare and not neglected my duties to God, I should not have been where I am now. I feel as if when I pray to God that it seems like mockery on my part; or, in other words, now that I am in trouble I go to Him. Why did I not go before? God be merciful to me, a miserable sinner, is all I can say." When I read that I said, "Another illustration of how slow God is to give a man up."

One would have thought that Noah's ark would have settled down while God was waiting for the people to come into it. For more than a century the door stood open, and if, as many suppose, all the different kinds and species of creatures went into that ark, there were five thousand species of birds that went in, and two thousand species of reptiles, and a hundred thousand species of insects; and surely, while they were going in, and their forage for that strange voyage was being shipped, there was room enough for a great crowd of people to have gone into that ark But no, they would not go. God waited and waited. If in these times a vessel gives ten days' previous notice of the fact that it is going to sail, we consider that sufficient; but before this vessel sailed God gave more than a century of notice, and He waited and waited. It seems as if He could not give the people up.

But why should I go so far out and so far back to get an illustration, when I can get one here and now? Shall I from the lives of the people in the gallery bring illustrations for those who are below? Or shall I, for those who sit below, bring illustrations from others? No, no, I will come nearer; within three feet of where you sit I shall find an illustration. From the one that sits next to you in the house of God I shall prove the truth of what to-night I am saying. Aye, I will come closer home; I will take yourself.

HOW MANY MOVES HAS GOD MADE for your redemption? And now, I am not talking to the audience, but to you personally. How many moves has God made for your salvation? The first I think of was in Anno Domini one. The meteor that swung out from the Bethlehem cabin was kindled for you. Pull back the swaddling-clothes from that child. That is your Lord and King. I come on down to Anno Domini 33. Hark to the splitting of the mountain shelving at the martyrdom of God! Look at those outspread hands, wounded clear through. Look at those mashed feet. Listen to that sigh, that prayer, that strangulation. "Father, forgive them." Whom did He mean? He meant you, "It is finished." What did He mean? He meant your salvation.

Oh! Lord, didst Thou begin eighteen centuries before this man was born to look to his welfare? Was it so long ago? Yes. Mercy began to plan for your relief nigh two thousand years before your mother held you in her arms. Behold the height of it. Behold the depth of it. Behold the length of it. The love of a God!

But I come down and see the second move for your salvation. I look to

THE DAYS OF YOUR CHILDHOOD.

Was it the picture of Samuel or of Jesus, or the whisper of a Christian saint, or the sickness and death of a playmate, or the counsel of a Christian father, or a Bible lesson? I do not know what it was. But I know that your soul was called mightily. You felt it through and through and through. You tried to shuffle it off. You drowned it out by running your fingers over the lighter keys of the piano, or plunging into a season of rioting, frivolity, or worldly gayety. God called you and called you. It seemed as if He could not give you up.

I come down to the third move which God made for your salvation. There was

SICKNESS IN YOUR HOUSE.

Your father was very ill. You remember the anxiety on all the faces. You remember how carefully the physician studied the critical case, and how he shook his head when he went out of the house, and how soon he came back again. You remember the shrill cry on the night when your father died. You remember the vendue when the furniture was sold. You remember when you had to move out of that home. You remember how you bade farewell to all familiar associations. You remember how you felt while you were going to the other house. You remember the sensation of nailing the old pictures against the new wall. You remember how hard it was for you to get used to the new surroundings.

God was calling you then; through all that sore-heartedness, through that upsetting of your interests, through that desolation, He was saying "Oh! man, this world is not your home. I have something better prepared for you. Build not on uncertain foundations. Build for eternity." God waited and waited to have you repent. It seemed as if He could not give you up.

God made the fourth move for your salvation You had a home of your own.

came and passed. In a few years you had a beautiful dwelling. There were adornments on the mantel and on the table; but brighter than all were the bright eyes of the little one that looked up into yours. Her laugh, her skip, her queer questions, her waking moments, her slumber, snug under the coverlet, the kiss she gave you when you went off in the morning, the kiss she gave you when you came back at night, were to you perpetual fascination. But, alas! for the sudden cold, and the hot cheek, and the throwing out of the fevered hands, and the unavailing cry for recovery, and the death of the first-born, and the crying through all the house: "Dead! dead!"

There is a cloud on everything. On the dining-room, for there she ate. On the hall, for there she played. On the nursery, for there she slept. God was calling you to look upward toward the gate through which the little one had gone, saying "Oh! man, this world is not a place for your residence. There is a better place toward which you ought to aspire." And God waited and called through all that desolation of your home, and called again and waited again. It seemed as if He could not give you up.

God made the fifth move for your salvation. It was

A BUSINESS UPSETTING.

You had laid out all your plans, but somehow there was a change in your affairs. There was some useless machinery thrown on your hands, or you bought a large bill of unsalable goods, or you were over-persuaded to an indorsement, or there was a general panic and you were thrown penniless, with no courage to start again, and the men whom you helped when they were in a strait did not help you when you were in a strait.

Oh, it was hard after so much toil and struggle to see it all go. And God stood there saying "These are not treasures to seek after. I have taken these away that you may look for heaven treasures in banks that never break." And God stood there amid the wreck of your fortunes waiting, waiting, calling, calling. It seemed as if He could not give you up.

I believe that in the last fifteen years God has made five thousand moves for your salvation, my dear brother, my dear sister. Every night of the year, every week-day night, there are New York and Brooklyn merchants, bankers, and mechanics leaving their stores, offices and shops for eternity. If there were a great fire to-night, on Fulton Street or Wall Street, or Broadway, or Water Street, all the engines and hook and ladder companies might be in full uproar; these men of whom I speak would not come down to see it. Why? They have gone home to die.

There are so many

such fatal slippings on the ice, so many cases of pneumonia, such falling down between boat and bridge, such crashing through of scaffoldings, so many victims of heart disease and apoplexy, such droppings down lifeless of robust men, that you have all been warned. God put down His foot by you. He took you by the shoulder. He tried to make you think, and repent, and pray, saying by all these things: "Life is uncertain. You may be gone. Are you ready. Are you ready?" God stood waiting, waiting, calling, calling. It seemed as if He could not give you up.

* Dr. Talmage did not preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday. We therefore publish this week one of his recent evening discourses.

And now do you think that God has gone away from you? That He has turned His back upon you and left for other parts? No. He is in the Brooklyn Tabernacle to-night. Instead of your being on your knees before God, God is on His knees before you, reviewing the past, the imploration He has given you, the rebuffs and sins of your soul, what you have lost and what you seem determined to lose in the great future, and He throws Himself against you and seizes you in the embrace of a heaven-astonishing love, while His heart seems breaking as he cries out: "Why will you perish? Are you determined to die? Is not my Bethlehem humiliation sufficient? Is not my Calvary excruciation enough? Is there nothing in tears and blood to move your soul? Oh! you poor soul. Stop! Stop! My omnipotence breaks down at the thought of your overthrow. How shall I, how shall I give you up?"

When I see how God holds on to a man after his case seems hopeless and forlorn, I learn for my soul and for your souls the lesson that we ought —never. Perhaps you were, a good many years ago, at the marriage altar. The record of that is on the church book or on the county books; but were you at that time married for all time and for all eternity? I want every Christian husband and every Christian wife to realize the truth that you ought never to give up, ought never to surrender the eternal salvation of an impenitent companion. Amid a great throng that stood at the church altars, there was

NEVER TO GIVE A MAN UP

who held her husband by the hand, and she said to me: "Mr. Talmage, my prayers have been answered. For twenty years, morning, noon, and night, I have prayed for the salvation of this man. He seemed to be going on further from God and further from heaven. I asked him to come to the house of God. He scoffed at me. I told him of the worth of the soul. It made him mad. But the more he resisted Christ, the more I prayed. I begged God for Jesus' sake, for the sake of our only child, for the sake of everything that was good and beautiful and true, to save this man. People said I might as well give up the prayer, it would not be answered; but I kept on, sir, and I have brought him at last. He wishes to connect himself with the church of God. Will you ask him a few questions?"

I said to him: "Do you feel that you are a sinner?" "Oh, yes," he said, "it is nothing but that, it has been that all through." I said: "Do you think that God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven your sin?" He said: "I know He has." I said: "Would you like to be baptized, and to sit at the holy sacrament?" "Well," he said, "I would if you think I am fit." "Ah," I said, "my brother, we are none of us fit to come. Not the righteous, but sinners Christ came to call;" and there and then I joined the hands again of that husband and wife. "Married for time," I said, "now be married for eternity. The angels of God witness the banns."

But I said to her: "Your daughter will be coming soon, will she not?" "Oh," she said, "bless the Lamb, I forgot all about her in my anxiety for my husband. She is coming. Here she is. Ask her a few questions. She would like to unite herself with the church of Christ." I said: "Mary, have you come, too, to join your father and mother in heaven?" She said, "I have," and then I thought of how Christ took the little children in His arms and blessed them; and I saw the three started on the way to glory.

Oh, Christian husband, Christian wife, never give up the salvation of an impenitent companion. Why do you not pray? "Oh," you say, "I have been praying." But you have not prayed hard enough; you have not prayed long enough. Is it not worth a struggle for fifteen years? Satan loves divorcement, and if he sees souls united in this world pleasantly for a long while he likes to have them parted. He has failed to make the separation here; he wants to make eternal separation beyond the grave. Oh, after you have lived so pleasantly on earth together, will you suffer him to bring any such bill of divorcement? Cry aloud to God to-night: "Save my husband! Save my wife!" Why will you be parted forever? Oh! be married in a bond that shall never be broken. Take him, while I speak, by the hand, crying, "How shall I give thee up?"

But I remark still further

NO PARENT OUGHT TO GIVE A CHILD UP.

This parental tie, oh! how tender and strong it is. I was never more impressed with it than on last Thursday, in that great storm, when a man came to my house on a matter of business—he was an entire stranger. As he was going out of the door he said, "Three weeks ago we buried our little one." I said, "Was it sudden?" "Very sudden," he said. "She sat at the table in the evening, with a good appetite, and was as bright and fair as ever I saw her, and the next day at four o'clock she was gone." I said, "What was it? Was it scarlet fever or croup?" He said, "It was scarlet fever. But," he said, "there is one thing that comforts me and my wife very much." I said, "What is that?" "Well," said he, "we know where she has gone."

And so I have thought he expressed the ambition of every Christian parent to have the child saved. If the child goes out of the arms in infancy, it goes straight into the peace and glory of heaven. One moment after the mother kisses it good-night on earth, Jesus kisses it good-morning in heaven. But suppose the child grows up and comes to years of responsibility, and then wanders off—oh! it is very hard. There are few tougher things than that. That is worse than death. If the body were in Greenwood, it would lie peacefully there; but if it be in a gilded, dissipating saloon, it is worse than death.

But let me say that no parent ought to give up a wandering child. You have a mighty lever to lay hold of. "I will be a God to thee and to thy seed after thee." I have seen parents praying their boys back from Omaha, from San Francisco, from Pekin, and from Madras. With your wrinkled hands lay hold of the eternal God, and put your gray hairs against His bosom, and sob out the all-conquering prayer of the righteous. "Oh!" you say, "how can I give him up?" You cannot afford to give him up. If you give him up who will do for him? You are his last chance for reformation and salvation. By the cradle in which you rocked him, by the bosom on which you nursed him, by the God to whom you consecrated him, do not, do not, do not give him up!

But I must say

SOME WORDS TO MYSELF.

If a man preaches nine-tenths of a sermon to his people, may he not preach one-tenth of it to himself? And so I say to myself, as well as to all those Christian ministers whom I see scattered through this audience to-night, and in all our services—I say to my own soul, and I say to you, we cannot afford to give up the eternal salvation of the people to whom we preach. I look off upon the assemblage, and know, as well as I can know anything, that there are multitudes of you tramping on all unprepared toward an unhappy deathbed or an accidental decease, and know that soon the book of God's reckoning will drop open its iron lids and you cannot get rid of it. I feel as if I must make another move for your eternal salvation. God help me. God help me now. "How shall I give thee up?"

I have so set my heart upon having all these people brought to God, young and middle-aged and old, rich and poor, wise and ignorant, that if you do not come to God it will be to me an eternal disappointment. I have thought how pleasant it would be if to-night every family in this congregation would go home and set up an altar and put their best affections upon it. I have thought how beautiful it would be if these young men were manly and courageous enough to step out for God. I have thought how glorious it would be if people who have come here to-night, indifferent about their souls, would now wake up to the questions of eternity. I have thought how magnificent it would be if all this audience in solid phalanx would march through the wide-open gates of eternal life. "How shall I give you up?"

I have preached to many of you so long, I have implored you so often, I have mingled with you in such vicissitudes, I have told you so frequently about the bleeding heart of the despised Christ, upon whom you have set your hard heel, I have told you so often that the cord of life was being gnawed off and soon the last strand might snap asunder, I have told you as well as I know how, again and again, what it is to be saved and what it is to be lost, and yet you halt, and yet you turn away, and yet you die. Oh, "how shall I give you up?"

What evil spirit possesses thee? What infatuation binds you? Where gettest thou the brawn and the muscle with which to battle the God that made thee, and the Christ who redeemed thee, and the Holy Ghost who piles up implorations before thee? How shall I give you up?"

I CANNOT! I CANNOT!

Between you and death I heave up to night a barricade made up of all the Christian deathbeds at which you have ever stood, of all the communion-tables to which you have ever been invited, of all the pulpits that have poured warnings into your ear, and then I climb up on the top of that barricade with the sword of God's truth, two-edged, and I strike right and left, fighting you back from the massacre of your eternal interests. Do not attempt to climb over that barricade. Get back! Get down! Why will ye die? "How shall I give you up?"

There is one thing that I forgot. While the text shows how hard it is for God to give a man up, it implies that sometimes He is compelled to do it.

You go on a little too far in experimenting with God's patience; you go along too far in the resistance of the Holy Ghost, and then there is a short and important record made in God's book of remembrance, recording the two words, "Given up;" and the Holy Ghost that has been striving with your heart closing the door of mercy cries, "Given up!" and the angels of God that have been watching for the return of your wandering spirit cry one to another, "Given up!" and the cheek-blanching, heart-killing announcement must be made that, notwithstanding all that God has done to save your immortal soul, you are—must I tell it? must I declare it?—"given up!"

Mrs. Baxter, who is now Holding Meetings at Stuttgart in Germany, adds in regard to the recent revival at Barmen: "Each evening those women who had already found the Lord went into the smaller hall to pray together and render thanks for God's rich blessing upon them. Those who were present say that their prayers were most touching, and it was like one great stream of praise and intercession. As all the seats were needed in the large hall, the lesser hall, where the prayer meeting was held, was without any seats, so that every one had to kneel on the ground without support of either chairs or benches. But this did not hinder their kneeling down. The Lord alone knows how many of those precious souls will be His when He comes to make up His jewels. The world was from beginning to end God's work and not man's."

Healing by Faith.—Miss Margaret Wintry writes to an English journal: "When a child I was an invalid, and my dear parents took me to Bad Goll, Germany, where Pastor Blumhardt received sick persons from all parts of the world to pray over them, and many left his house after a short stay, healed and blessed in body and soul. My malady was pronounced beyond the skill of one of the best doctors in Heidelberg, and yet I am now in comparative strength and health, and can, with a joyful, thankful heart, praise the Lord for his healing mercies for more than twenty years. One friend dying of consumption (according to the verdict of the doctors), whose case I made a matter of prayer, is now gaining strength daily; and another lady in great distress at having to undergo a second operation to prevent total blindness, told me a few days ago that the Lord had so markedly heard prayer that she can see better than she has been able to do for years, and that the doctors are amazed, and call it 'nothing less than a miracle.' So God is glorified and our faith increases; and to Christ alone be all the praise."

Lock's Paltry Gift—Inside the Prison—A Vindictive Prosecutor's Sudden Death—A Degraded Bargain—A Laughable Wedding—Mock Courts of Justice—Dandy Child's Wicked Exploits—An Irish Criminal's Capture.

WHEN Lock heard my story he burst into tears; at least, I thought he did so, for he averted his head and used his silk pocket-handkerchief. When he mastered his emotions he paid me the most flattering compliments I ever received as to my manliness and conscientious integrity.

"Graham," he said, "some money will be useful to you here," and he put some money in my hand. I looked at it. It was silver. I counted fifteen shillings exactly. I felt my blood boil. "Lock," I said, with a choking voice, "this is just the change exactly of my own five-pound note out of which you bought my coat and boots in Sydney." "That is it," he said; "good-by, Graham; God be with you."

Perhaps it was as well he did not leave me any more money or promise any. Whether he calculated the effect or not, his cool act of prudence and literal justice did produce in me an effect that has never left me since. I then and there resolved to apply to no living man for help in future, and to depend only on God's aid and on my own resources.

Alas! I also formed a resolution never to write home till I should have something really cheering to write; and the only favor on earth I would have asked of Lock was to maintain utter silence concerning me to my family till they should hear from me themselves. In regard to this I shall tell you more again; but from that day Lock and I did not meet for twenty years. But next for my experience in jail.

I believe it is not a pleasant thing to be sent to prison anywhere, not even to one of your best warmed, ventilated, and provisioned aviaries for English prison-birds; but it was most unpleasant to be sent to the vile, stenchful prison of Bathurst, which served justice before the present respectable one was built.

It was a long, low room where all the male prisoners herded together, without regard either to health or decency. There were a couple of cells at the end of it for female prisoners, who were generally much viler than the male, on the principle, I suppose, that nothing scalds more dreadfully than boiling honey, and that the fairest things in health are the foulest in decay.

I cannot tell you the depression that sunk like midnight on my heart when I found my vindictive employer had succeeded in getting me falsely condemned and imprisoned. Before I left prison, however, he suddenly expired of apoplexy. I had rather again go to prison than do as he did by me; for a man may have a clear conscience who is falsely sent to prison, but not so he who falsely sends him. Though he was my accuser, he sat on the bench with his brother magistrates when I was sentenced; and thus the decision was illegal as well as cruelly unjust.

But, through Divine mercy, I got over it all; and I now leave the whole affair to that tribunal of the Great and Glorious Judge where there is no partiality.

I felt my honor sadly sullied; and I felt it would be worse than death for my family at home in Ireland to hear I was in jail. I knew, however, I was innocent; and I tried, as schoolboys exhort each other before a flogging, to "keep a stiff upper lip." In this I was helped by a spectacle that made me laugh, though going to disappear in the "stone jug." It was in itself a ludicrous sight, and recalled one most pathetically laughable.

About four months prior to this there was at Baroo, in the capacity of stock-keeper, a loose haveril of a fellow called Walker. I forget what part of John Bull's land was his calf-ground. He had purchased from a black fellow a gin for three months, for six new clay pipes and a fig of tobacco. At the end of the stipulated three moons the black fellow came to claim his gin. Then a scene began that beggars description, and before it was over all hands at the station were round Walker's hut.

The black imperatively claimed his gin. She began to wail and scream, "Yackaday, yackaday!" and, throwing her arms around the white man, could scarcely be torn from him; he bellowing and clinging to her much in the same way. This made the blacks wild with mirth, and laughter; indeed, even Lock laughed heartily, as did we all.

We expostulated with Walker for setting his affections on a black woman, and she another man's wife. He could not see the impropriety of taking one wife, where her husband had several left. He was inconsolable, and proposed a fresh bargain for her. The black consulted with his friends, and demanded a fat bullock for giving her for three moons more. The bullock was given; and the blacks held a high feast and dance, in which the poor degraded woman was one of the merriest, and then went back to Walker.

The next time I saw Walker was on the occasion I have referred to. He was then in Bathurst, filling up the black void in his affections by getting married to a poor green immigrant girl. Such bridegroom and bride I never beheld before or since. He stood in a pair of white moleskin trousers, very stiff. They might have fitted a giant for size, but lay loose about him. He wore also a blue jacket and canary-colored waistcoat, equally large. His hat stuck on his head by a great pad of rags between it and his forehead. They were all borrowed, I think.

The bride was suitably dressed. She had an immense old Leghorn hat, the rim of which, being large and slack, hung down about her ears and swayed with the breeze, and yards of ribbon floated from it down her back. The rest of her bridal dress was in keeping with this. Had I been free I should have joined, I think, the crowd that followed them. I wonder how the parson could stiffen his face enough to perform the marriage ceremony. It was the most laughable wedding I ever saw; and, depressed as I was, this flash of the comic made me for a moment forget my own tragedy.

You have been in a prison, I dare say, but have never been a prisoner. I did not come out here to paint jail-birds; but if I could give faithful word-pictures of those sixty inmates of Bathurst old jail they would exceed any in the naturalist's portfolio. What a company of adepts in crime—and adepts in law too. For there they would pass hours trying, and pronouncing sentence on, each one; sometimes they would gather into separate knots, playing cards, chaffing, or yarning—anything to kill, time, keep up the spirits, and banish thought. Most of them were as merry as drunken skippers who had thrown aside chart and compass and laughed through the hour that preceded wreck on the breakers ahead. The fear of God was certainly not before their eyes.

One of the most sinister and notorious characters among them is Johnny Stutters, commonly called "Dandy Child." He has a strong Dublin accent. His face is as utterly without a shred of hair as his heart is without conscience. Nature denied the one and sin killed the other, and the absence of both facilitated his nefarious trade.

Then he was in league with a female pickpocket more accomplished than himself. She was finely dressed as a governess, and he as a gentleman's son. In this capacity they went through jeweler's shops, she looking at costly articles, and he quietly depositing them in his pocket or sleeve.

One day, as he tells, he professed to have lost his governess, and in great distress went into the shop of a jeweler, who took the distressed child into his parlor, and behind his counter, till his governess should be found. When she came, in the distraction of grief and joy, to take him home, he had stolen more than a hundred pounds' worth of costly articles.

When wishing to narrate one of his most dexterous and comic exploits, he relates how he robbed a blacksmith in the colony and was tried for it; but witnesses broke down and he escaped. When coming out of court he met the blacksmith, and said, "Let us have a glass together, and not part as enemies." The poor blacksmith consented; and while they took a glass together Johnny abstracted his purse, containing sixteen pounds—the price of his tools and forge, which he had sold with a view to removing to another part of the country.

The smith soon missed the purse after they had parted, and ran in distress to the magistrate to say Stutters had robbed him again. He was dismissed as a silly fool or an arrant knave. Pocket-picking was an art in which even colonial thieves—the first of their kind—yielded the palm to the flexible fingers and scheming brain of the notorious Dandy Child. He was a good hand at sheep-shearing, but he ever and anon relapsed into his more congenial trade of fool-fleecing. He had fingers so flexible that he could bend them back to his wrist, and a voice of great softness. Yet I do not, with some philosophic fellow-prisoners, believe in the conscience-drugging doctrine that he was as certainly made to be a pickpocket as the Duke of Wellington to be a general. He who made Johnny Stutters had said, "Thou shalt not steal;" and He did not make men to break His commands.

Irishmen, unhappily, have the pre-eminence here. The most notable and powerful man among the sixty in this dreary, filthy room is Christie Leonard, another Dublin man. The Irish capital is quieter without him. He is an erect, fine-looking, powerful man, about five feet eleven in height, and built in proportion. His countenance wears an habitual look of determination, though it has not an unpleasing expression. He was transported for robbing a man with violence in an unfrequented street.

He was in an iron gang in the Blue Mountains, and made his escape several times, but was recaptured, on every occasion getting so many hundred lashes at intervals as he could bear them, and so many additional pounds of iron. At length he escaped, and got fire-arms and took to the bush; and for months eluded the police and committed daring robberies. I do not think, however, he ever took a life; and he says he never would do so, except to save his own. A policeman once attempted to capture him single-handed. They exchanged several shots. One of Leonard's shots carried clean away the knot of the policeman's neck-handkerchief; then he ceased from the duel and let the bushranger escape.

At length he was taken very quietly. He was prowling along the Macquarie River, and fell into the fork made by the junction of the Turon River with it, where the Ophir and Turon diggings afterward broke out. The police tracked his horse among the gullies, and knowing that no stockman ever would ride in there they followed him; and, as he was coming out, they, with raised carbines, met and took him. He is sentenced to be hanged, for which purpose he is soon to be taken to Sydney. In the meantime he is as merry and witty as if his wedding were to come off in a week.

The morning came for Leonard and others to be removed to Sydney. A file of soldiers stood in the entrance before the inner gate, and in presence of the prisoners primed and loaded. They had flint guns. When Leonard's name was called he turned and said to us, "Now, boys, remember you'll hear of me being shot or in the bush soon."

He was handcuffed with another prisoner to a chain, and committed to two mounted policemen. They came to the hut on O'Connor's plains, at the entrance to the Blue Mountains, and stopped for the night.

At the next stockade there was a lock-up, but they were too late to reach it. The policemen dismounted and laid their carbines against a log. They went to light a fire. One of them retired to a little distance out of sight, and Leonard sprung at the loaded carbine, and had just liberty of hands enough to present it at the other policeman, declaring he would shoot him dead if he spoke. He compelled him to take out his key and unlock their handcuffs.

When the other policeman returned he was met with a presented carbine, and both were compelled to exchange clothes with the prisoners, who handcuffed them and rode off on their horses into the bush. The two policemen were degraded from ever wearing uniform again; but the triumph of Leonard was only very short.

In policeman's uniform he rode up to a house and asked had any strangers been there. Several policemen were in the house, and they wondered to see a constable they did not know. They rushed out and recognized Leonard. One of them seized the bridle of his horse, while three others covered him with their carbines. His horse was too tired to obey the spurs, and he had to give in. In a fortnight from the time he left us he returned to prison again, and in triumph told how sheepish the policeman looked when changing dress with him.

In fact, he was the hero of the prison while he stayed, and appeared as indifferent to his fate as if his heart had been stone. He despised all petty thefts and all supple-fingered thieves like Dandy Child. No doubt there was a bit of bravado in his bearing, and had he been in a solitary cell he would have felt very differently. He would have made a most daring, gallant soldier, but he was "lost" to God, to society, and to himself. He completely answered to the New Testament description of such as he, "without God and without hope in the world. He was hanged in Sydney, dying as impenitent as he lived.

THE LAST CHAPTER OF SATANIC HISTORY.

The Imprisonment of Satan—A Fallacious Idea—Three Classes of Sins—The Satanic Release—The End of His Career.

THE next act in the solemn drama will be of which we read in the twentieth chapter of Revelation: "And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the abyss, and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the abyss, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled" (verse 3). While Satan is still at large, and in possession of his great though not unlimited power to tempt, deceive, and destroy men, all hopes of any earthly millennium worthy of the name are baseless as a dream.

Hence an argument of irresistible cogency lies against the fallacious idea, still so fondly entertained by many, that by means of existing moral and spiritual agencies it is the Divine purpose gradually but surely to establish the kingdom of God upon earth. All experience, however, as well as all Scripture, points in the opposite direction. How can the progress of missions, the Christianization of society, or even the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in more than pentecostal abundance, bind Satan or consign him to age-long imprisonment? Yet without this there can be no deliverance for man or this world. But when Satan is once bound and confined in the abyss, though the world will not be entirely freed from sin, a great and blessed change will pass over.

There are

which we find in Scripture specially associated with Satan—those of pride, falsehood, and murder. In 1 Timothy 3:6, we have pride indicated as the peculiar cause of Satan's condemnation. In John 8:44, again, we find our Lord addressing this scathing denunciation to the Jews: "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will to do. He was a murderer (lit., a man-slayer) from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own, for he is a liar; and the father of it."

Accordingly it may fairly be anticipated that the millennial reign of Christ will be characterized by the almost utter repression of these sins. Apart from the absence of Satanic temptation thereto, the whole character of the dispensation will be eminently calculated to hide pride from men still in the flesh. There will be the abiding glory of the New Jerusalem ever visible to the eyes of the dwellers upon earth. The Lord and the King will be periodically manifested in the earthly Zion (Zechariah 14:16); and the risen and glorified saints, to whom the world will then be put in subjection, will be continually passing to and fro on their errands of mercy and judgment, the radiant messengers and vicegerents of the King of kings. And thus, in the words of the prophet in the manifested presence of these higher powers, "The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day."

Truth also will universally prevail, for who will hope to evade the judgment and the justice of Him who "shall not judge after the sight of His eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of His ears; but with righteousness shall He judge the poor, and give sentence with equity for the meek of the earth" (Isaiah 11:3, 4)? While as regards murder, not only is it expressly declared that men "shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation; neither shall they learn war any more" (Isaiah 2:4); but the reign of peace shall extend even over the animal creation; for it is written, "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them. . . . They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Isaiah 11:6–8). But the peaceful years of Messiah's happy reign are not to run an altogether uninterrupted course. Once again—though only for a brief period—as we learn from Revelation 20:3, where, after the announcement of his imprisonment in the abyss till the thousand years should be fulfilled, it is added: "And after that he must be loosed a little season." So, more fully, we read in verses 7–9: "And when the thousand years are expired Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down out of heaven and devoured them."

This is certainly in some respects one of the most startling and mysterious revelations to be found in the Scriptures. Why Satan, after he has once been safely bound in the abyss, and mankind have, during long and happy ages, been freed from his cruel machinations, should again be set at liberty to deceive and destroy, does seem to us hard to understand. We almost feel as though our faith in the Divine wisdom and love was put to an undue strain. But if we reverently consider the matter, we shall, perhaps, find light penetrating the darkness of our mind, and the purpose of God becoming in some degree apparent.

Is not that purpose to test the sincerity and genuineness of the allegiance which, in the coming age, men will universally offer to the Most High? Under every previous dispensation man has been tried and found wanting. Alike under the law and under the Gospel man has failed; but in both cases he had a twofold excuse to offer—he had to walk by faith, and he had mighty spiritual enemies to resist. Well, in the millennial dispensation all this will be changed. Men will then walk by sight, for Christ and His risen saints will be visibly present; and they will be free from external temptation, for Satan shall be bound in the abyss.

And what will be the result? Apparently good, for overt rebellion and open transgression will be almost unknown. But the Lord knoweth the thoughts of men that they are vain. Let but the test be applied, and at once man is found in mad and impious revolt against the manifested powers of the heavenly world; and once more the mournful verdict must be pronounced, "Man being in honor abideth not; he is like the beasts that perish." But judgment terrible and final speedily overtakes alike the tempter and the tempted. Of the latter it is said, "Fire came down from heaven and devoured them;" while the awful doom of the former is thus recorded: "And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, and shall be tormented day and night forever and ever" (Revelation 20:10).

SATAN IS CAST INTO THE LAKE, and so ends his strange and appalling history. Never more shall he regain his misused power; never more shall he be permitted to tempt; never more shall he succeed in ruining the souls and bodies of men. Oh! thou enemy, thy destructions shall at last have come to a perpetual end; and as hell opens wide its fiery portals to receive thee, a shout of exultant joy shall be heard—joy, not at the terrors of thy doom, but born of the knowledge that now, indeed, the long reign of sin is at an end forever; and the hope of the ages shall be realized in those new heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

ANOINTING WITH GOOSE-GREASE.

[THE following story is quoted from "The Parson of the Islands," by the Rev. Adam Wallace; a most instructive and entertaining biography of the late Rev. Joshua Thomas: price $1.25; obtainable at the office of The Ocean Grove Record, Asbury Park, N. J.]

During the period of which we now write, Brother Thomas was restored to health from a protracted and dangerous spell of sickness by a mode resorted to but rarely, if at all, at the present day. Various remedies had been applied, and no favorable indications of returning health appearing, he became restive under confinement, and troubled by the cares of the church and the exigencies of his family which pressed upon him, and greatly longed for deliverance.

Reading the pages of his Testament, he happened on some advice directly bearing on his condition. It was contained in the practical epistle of James, as follows: "Is any sick among you? Let him call in the elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up."

This, thought he, is a safe guide, and cannot fail to effect a speedy cure. "Elders" he supposed to be elderly persons of good report in the Church. His mind fixed immediately on Brother John Crockett and his brother Zachariah as answering the requirement. He sent for John in haste. On his arrival the matter was fully explained and the passage repeated. "Now, Brother John," said the sick man, "you must do exactly as the good Book directs. I have no oil, but yonder is plenty of excellent goose-grease, which I suppose will do as well. Use some of it, and then pray in faith."

"Brother John" was taken somewhat aback by this proposal, and confessed he had but little confidence that a cure could be effected in this way. He proceeded, however, with the anointing, and offered a fervent prayer for his beloved friend. There was no apparent relief obtained, and both agreed that the reason of failure was probably their weakness of faith.

"Go," said Brother Thomas, "and tell Brother Zachariah to come and try it." Zachariah soon arrived, and, after learning the particulars, goose grease and all, clapped his hands in a very decided and earnest manner and exclaimed, "Why, Brother Joshua, that is the very thing! I believe it will do you good; for it is the good Lord's plan."

"Go on, then," said the other, "and let us believe for a certain and speedy answer."

Brother Zachariah was of an ardent, impulsive temperament, and entered into this procedure with great zest. After an unctuous application of the goose grease, he knelt down and began to pray, telling the Lord what had been done according to His own Word, and how sick his "poor brother" was. "And now, Lord," said he, "raise him up. Send down the power."

The "power" came; first upon Zachariah himself, so that he became very happy and began to shout; then upon Brother Thomas, who leaped from his weary bed, cured in body and filled with the Holy Ghost, and joined in the rejoicing of his friend, praising God for the signal answer given and the verification of His holy Word, which thereafter more than ever was believed by both as an unfailing foundation.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Struggle at Albany Between the Aspirants for the United States Senatorships vacant by the resignation of Messrs. Conkling and Platt, was not marked last week by any decisive change of position. Mr. Depew gained a few votes, but the total administration vote given if it had been concentrated on one candidate, would not have attained the number necessary to a choice. Substantially the vote remained the same as between the Stalwarts, the Anti-Stalwarts, and the Democrats, as it did in the early ballots, and there were no indications of a compromise being effected. The Administration wing is still led by Senator Robertson, who though nominated and confirmed to the office of Collector of the Port, is allowed by the President to retain his seat at Albany that he may take part in the contest. The situation is a very significant one, and both parties may study it with advantage. A few months ago we were promised peace, harmony, and prosperity, now the leaders of the Republican party, in their effort to grasp their shares of the patronage of the government, have torn their party into sections, and have endangered its prospects of a continued lease of power. The spoils system is the rock on which the administration has struck. That rock should be marked on the political chart, so that future presidents may see the consequences of making nominations to reward personal service, and Senators may gain a new idea of the popular phrase "The courtesy of the Senate."

The Alleged Attempt to Bribe a Member of the New York Legislature has been the topic of all-absorbing interest in political circles during the past week. On Thursday last, Assemblyman Bradley, of Olean, in Cattaraugus County, rose in the House to make a statement. He said he had been paid two thousand dollars to change his vote in the senatorial contest from ex-Senator Platt to Mr. Chauncey M. Depew; that he had received the money, and had handed it to the Speaker of the House, and now asked for an investigation. Speaker Sharpe corroborated the statement as to having received the money, and a committee was appointed to investigate the charge. Before the committee Mr. Bradley repeated his statement on oath, and added that the bribe had been given him by Senator Sessions. Mr. Sessions demanded to be heard in reply and swore that in the conversations between himself and Mr. Bradley, which had occurred as stated, not a word was said about money, nor any payment made. Three other supporters of Mr. Conkling testified that overtures of a similar character had been made to them to change their votes. It is therefore obvious that either the supporters of the Administration are guilty of bribery or the Stalwarts have entered into a conspiracy to ruin a candidate by false accusation.

The question seems likely to be diverted into a party issue between the Conkling men on the one hand and the Administration men on the other. That would be a very unsatisfactory way of dealing with it. This is a question of fact, not of party, and it should be thoroughly investigated, no matter who may be hurt. The honor of the Albany Legislature, of the Republican party, and of American politics is involved, and it will be a national disgrace if the investigation is choked off. Should the committee fail to decide the question, it may be hoped that the Attorney General will take it in hand, for conviction and punishment ought to follow such a charge on the one side or the other. At present only one fact is clearly established, and that is sufficiently lamentable. Of two men selected from among their fellow citizens to legislate at Albany for the great State of New York, one has been guilty of wilful and deliberate perjury, for no explanation can reconcile the contradiction in the evidence of Messrs. Sessions and Bradley. Beyond that, the honor of others is implicated, for if Mr. Bradley's statement is true no one supposes that the briber was spending his own money; and if Mr. Sessions' statement is true, then Mr. Bradley must have accomplices whose names are more prominent in politics than his own. The issue is deeply humiliating, however it may be decided.

The Republican Convention of Ohio, which assembled on June 8th, was chiefly remarkable from a national point of view in the attitude and strength of the temperance vote. Observers noted that the subject of Temperance was the one most dangerous to the unanimity of the party. The managers were in the difficulty of having to conciliate total abstainers without offending the German voters, who would not support any ticket tending toward prohibition. Adroit management was needed, for the loss of the prohibition or German vote would involve defeat. Ultimately a plank was inserted in the platform adopted, stating that "The public interests require that the General Assembly should submit to a vote of the people such amendments to the Constitution of the State relative to the manufacture, sale, and use of intoxicating liquors, as shall leave the whole matter to legislation." The concession is of the smallest, but small as it is, it indicates a rapid growth of prohibition sentiment in Ohio, which will ultimately compel more decided recognition. Governor Foster was re-nominated by acclamation, and the policy of "Ohio's honored son, the chief executive," was heartily indorsed.

Some Anxiety is Expressed as to the Course the Republicans of Virginia may adopt in the fall campaign. The ticket nominated by the party led by General Mahone was framed with the view of securing the Republican vote, and many Republicans attended that convention; but some ardent sympathizers with the Administration are urging the nomination of a straight Republican ticket. Should such a ticket be nominated and actively or tacitly supported by the administration, General Mahone's action in the Senate might undergo a change as disastrous to Republican control as the election of Democrats in New York would be.

The Rapid Growth and Formidable Power even now exercised by Mormonism are not fully appreciated by the public generally, nor is the danger that menaces our institutions from Mormonism realized as it should be. It is, however, already doing serious moral harm, as an incident which occurred recently, demonstrates. A young man in one of our eastern cities had been visiting a family for some time in which were two sisters. He became attached to both, and both of them professed their love for him. He tried for some time to decide to which of the two he should offer marriage, but failing, he proposed that both should go with him to Utah and enter into a polygamous marriage. The two girls were persuaded to accept his offer and were duly received into the Mormon fold.

Professor J. M. Coyner, of the Salt Lake Collegiate Institute, has had opportunities of observing the political influence of Mormonism, and in the course of a recent sermon in the Seventh Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati, he made the startling statement that nearly one-third of the territory of the United States is virtually under the control of Mormons. "Over Utah as a centre," he said, "they hold absolute sway. They are masters in Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming. They are swiftly and surely moving on Montana and Washington Territories, and politically in Nevada and Colorado they hold the balance of power."

Mr. James S. Coleman has been Nominated by Mayor Grace and unanimously confirmed by the Board of Health as Commissioner of Street Cleaning for New York city. Mr. Coleman was born in 1843. His education was received at the public schools in this city. Since he became of age he has been engaged as contractor and superintendent of various important public works in different parts of the country. He was connected with the construction of the Morris and Essex, the New Jersey Central the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western and other eastern railways. He brings to his task considerable experience in practical work and a developed capacity for organizing and controlling large companies of men. If he is not hampered by the politicians hopes may be entertained that the metropolis may yet be cleansed before the summer heat comes upon us.

An Autograph Testimonial Album has been prepared for presentation to Mrs. Rutherford B. Hayes by the ladies of Illinois, as an expression of admiration of that lady's conduct in excluding intoxicating liquors from the White House during her husband's term of office. The album consists of six large volumes of six hundred and fifty pages each, elegantly bound in full Turkey morocco. All through the volumes are scattered India ink drawings.

The first signature is that of Mrs. James K. Polk, Nashville, Tenn.; the second, that of R. B. Hayes. Among the autographs in volume one are those of the members of the late "Hayes Cabinet," Chief Justice Waite and the Justices of the Supreme Court, and the Governors of nearly all the States and Territories, under the official seal of each, followed by Congressmen and prominent professional and business men. Volume two begins with the Representatives of the State of Illinois, including the city and county officials, and a large space is filled by the postmasters, followed by railroad officials and bankers. Volume three is devoted to authors and poets. Prominent among these are Oliver Wendell Holmes, Thomas Bailey Aldrich and Harriet Beecher Stowe. H. W. Longfellow subscribes his name, with a few appropriate lines. Then follow departments devoted to music, actors, painters, sculptors, science and education. Volume four contains autographs of scientific and professional men. Volume five, prominent business men and journalists. Volume six is devoted to the representatives of temperance and religion, both State and National.

A Strike Among Brewers' Employes is the latest trade dispute. On June 6th the brewers' employes of New York, Brooklyn, Morrisania, Staten Island, Newark, and Union Hill, N. J., struck for a reduction of their laboring hours to twelve hours a day, with no Sunday work; but the last clause of the demand was supplemented by an agreement to do the few hours' work necessary on Sunday morning for fifty cents an hour, a rate much higher than their usual pay. It is said that about twenty firms have acceeded to the demands of the strikers, while the remaining ones, about fifty in number, have formed an organization to take measures of self-protection against what they claim to be an unjust strike on the part of their employes. If this strike resulted in a decrease in the consumption of the beverage it would be a public benefit, and we might hope that the difficulty would not be adjusted.

The National Temperance Convention of the State of New York convenes at Saratoga Springs on June 21st. All associations of ministers and ecclesiastical bodies, and all temperance organizations, are invited to send delegates. The Convention will last two days, and prominent friends of the cause will prepare papers upon special topics, which will be put in type and presented to the Convention for discussion.

The International Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations held at Cleveland, O., fully realized the expectations of those who predicted for it a signal success. The regular convention was preceded by a four-days' conference of local, State, and International Secretaries, at which one hundred and fifty gentlemen who give their whole time to this work were present. The convention held its sessions in the First Methodist Church. John L. Wheat, of Louisville, Ky., was chosen president. Nearly six hundred delegates were present from thirty-one States, Territories, and Provinces, representing associations from Halifax to New Orleans and San Francisco. The report of the International Committee, showing the results of its plans for stimulating and developing Christian effort in regular and special work of the associations, attracted deep interest and profitable discussion. The convention decided to hold its next meeting at Milwaukee, Wis., in 1883.

Prayer for Sunday-schools.—In Accordance with a resolution adopted at their meeting in August, 1880, the Executive Committee earnestly recommend that Sunday, June 19th, 1881, the Sabbath immediately preceding the International Convention at Toronto, Canada, be universally observed as a day of united prayer for Sunday Schools throughout the world, invoking especially the manifest blessing of God to rest upon the Convention, that it may be fruitful in good issues to the cause in which we are engaged.

An Interesting Immigrant Arrived in New York recently in the person of Mrs. Margaret Hughes, the venerable mother of Thomas Hughes. She is so enthusiastic about the success of the colony her son has founded at Rugby, Tenn., that though eighty-three years of age, she has come to this country to spend the rest of her days there. She is described as being perfectly erect and even stately in her carriage. Her eyes are beautiful, so bright and clear are they, and her cheerful face is surrounded by thick, snowy curls. Her voice has the strength and music of youth.

Fishing for Nine Million Dollars is an Enter- prise in which the crew of a vessel which sailed from Philadelphia on June 6th has engaged. It appears that eighty-one years ago a Spanish man-of-war sank near the mouth of the Rio de la Plata. It was a vessel sent out to collect tribute from the different Spanish possessions, and was returning to Spain with $9,000,000 in Spanish gold when a storm arose. The ship sprang a leak and went to the bottom with every one on board. The money at the time was contained in a strong iron tank or safe, and is, it is supposed, to this day lying at the bottom of the sea undisturbed. The Fortuna has been fitted out by the speculators for the attempt to raise the vessel. It will be necessary to remove twenty feet of mud from the top of the wreck, which will be a work of immense labor and peril. The captain and crew are, however, enthusiastic in their effort, and are confident of success. The prospect of gaining gold, however dangerous and uncertain the enterprise may be, is sufficiently alluring to engage the best energies of worldly men, but a treasure which makes rich but adds no sorrow therewith is neglected, and the attempt to obtain it is often postponed as a disagreeable task until it is too late to seek it (Prov. 10 : 22).

Prayer for the New Version of the New Tes- tament is urged by a writer in a contemporary. The suggestion is practical and timely. It is evident that the work of the revisers will not receive unanimous approval, several eminent preachers in this country and in Great Britain having already expressed their objections to it. But there is no doubt as to the immense number of copies of it put in circulation and we may legitimately pray for God's blessing upon it.

One of the most remarkable scenes in connection with the issue of the book was the scene in Wall Street a few days after it was given to the public. Six enterprising street venders appeared in that temple of Mammon carrying trays loaded with small and neatly bound volumes and shouting "Bibles, only a quarter!" The pedlers, who were mostly active young men, were apparently very successful. Brokers and bankers, young clerks and Stock Exchange operators, were seen to walk away with a copy of the book in their hands or bulging from their pockets. Some of the dealers sold out all they had on their trays, and went away to return with a fresh supply. Altogether several hundred New Testaments must have been disposed of in the neighborhood of the Stock Exchange during the day. One old gentleman alighting from his carriage at his broker's door, stood amazed at the scene and exclaimed: "Well, I never expected to live to see the Bible sold in Wall Street. They need it here badly enough. Here, young man, I'll take two copies, just to set a good example."

Why Mr. Moody Always came in Late to his class when he was a young man was explained by a speaker at the recent Y. M. C. A. convention at Cleveland. In the course of a speech at the concluding meeting Mr. J. V. Farwell, of Chicago, said: "I remember that when Brother Moody began to come to the class in Chicago, to which I belonged, he used to come very late. He came in about a quarter of an hour before the meeting was out. I inquired the reason and found that he was out in the alleys south of our church for two hours in the morning getting the dirty and ragged children out of their beds, getting their faces washed and taking them around to the Sunday-school. I could not then understand why it was he wanted to do it, but it was the joy of the boy's life to get these ragged, dirty children where they could hear the Gospel."

A Secret was Carried to the Grave at North Attleboro, Mass., about six months ago. After the funeral of a well-known citizen his heirs commenced a search for documents known to be in existence, among which were his will and the record of his property. They could not be found, and for nearly six months diligent but unavailing search was made for them. At length it was resolved to disinter the body, and a permit having been obtained the casket was raised and opened. It was then found that the missing documents and a considerable sum of money were by inadvertence left in the pockets of the coat in which the dead man had been buried. It is seldom that dead men are interred with so much property in their pockets, and in this case it was only done through negligence, but many people act as if they expected to take their property not only into but beyond the grave. There is, however, a treasure we may lay up available in Heaven (Matt. 6 : 19, 20).

A Bride was Accidentally Shot at Denver, Col., on May 31st. The story of the shooting relates one of the most deplorable of recent crimes. The bride and her husband were dining with a real estate agent when a message was brought to the table that a gentleman was waiting to see the agent. He rose and went into the next room to meet his visitor, leaving the folding doors behind him partly open. As he entered the room he recognized the husband of a woman with whom he had had improper intimacy. This man opened fire upon him with a revolver as he entered, and emptied all the barrels, killing his enemy. One of the balls missed its mark and struck the bride as she was leaving the table with her husband. The missile went straight to her heart and she fell dead in her husband's arms. It is inevitable that crime should involve suffering for the innocent as well as the guilty, but this is one of the saddest and strangest instances of the rule.

Mr. Joseph Sabin, One of the Most Eminent of American Bibliopolists, died on Sunday June 5th, in Brooklyn. He knew so much about books that he was called a walking catalogue. Throughout his life he had been distinguished for his love of reading, and it is asserted that he was able to give from memory an intelligent summary of the contents of ninety thousand out of one hundred thousand books. His memory was so astonishingly retentive that he could recollect not only the exact title of any book he had ever seen, but could also tell its size, the author's name and the value of the book historically, commercially, and otherwise. Mr. Sabin compiled several works on his favorite subject, the principal one of which he had not completed when he died. It is the "Dictionary of Books Relating to America from its Discovery to the Present Time." Mr. Sabin was born in England in 1821 and came to America in 1848.

EVERYDAY RELIGION.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"The life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God."—GAL. 2 : 20.

The Influence of Faith on Life—I. It Inclines to Industry—The Vocation Should be Honorable—Its Sphere Directed of God—Suitable to Ability—II. It Leads a Man to Rely on God—For Requisite Qualifications—For Prudence and Wisdom—For Success—In Reference to Surroundings—III. To Serve God in Daily Life—By Obedience—By Manifesting Christian Spirit—Wesley's Advice to Sophia Cook—IV. It Reconciles to Discomfort—V. It Casts the Burden Upon the Lord—VI. It Moderates the Feeling as to Results—Two Gathered Roses—VII. It Enables a Man to Leave his Occupation Cheerfully When the Time Comes—Service Ended by Circumstances—By Weakness—By Death—An Old Puritan's Quaint Testimony.

I AM not about to preach from this whole verse, for I have done that before: this single sentence will suffice me. I shall not attempt to enter into the fulness of the spiritual meaning of this very deep and fruitful passage; I am merely going to bring out one thought from it, and to try to work that out, I trust, to practical ends. It has sometimes been objected to the preaching of the Gospel, that we exhort men to live for another sphere, and do not teach them to live well in the present life. Nothing can be more untrue than this: I venture to say that more practical moral teaching is given by ministers of the Gospel than by all the philosophers, lecturers, and moralists put together. While we count ourselves to be ordained to speak of something higher than mere morals, we nevertheless, nay, and for that very reason, inculcate the purest code of duty, and lay down the soundest rules of conduct.

It would be a great pity, dear brethren, if in the process of being qualified for the next life we became disqualified for this; but it is not so. It would be a very strange thing if, in order to be fit for the company of angels, we should grow unfit to associate with men; but it is not so. It would be a singular circumstance if those who speak of heaven had nothing to say concerning the way thither; but it is not so. The calumny is almost too stale to need a new denial. My brethren, true religion has as much to do with this world as with the world to come; it is always urging us onward to the higher and better life; but it does so by processes and precepts which fit us worthily to spend our days while here below.

The sphere of faith is earth and heaven, time and eternity; the sweep of its circle takes in the whole of our being—spirit, soul, and body; it comprehends the past and the future, and it certainly does not omit the present. With the things that now are the faith of Christians has to do; and it is concerning the life that we now live in the flesh that I shall now speak, trying, by the help of God's Spirit, to show the influence which faith has upon it.

There are seven points in which faith in Him who loved us and gave Himself for us will have a distinct influence upon the life which we now live in the flesh.

I. FAITH INCLINES A MAN TO AN INDUSTRIOUS LIFE.

It suggests activity. I will venture to say of any lazy man that he has little or no faith in God; for faith always worketh—"worketh by love." I lay it down as a thesis which shall be proved by observation that a believing man becomes an active man, or else it is because he cannot act, and, therefore, what would have been activity runs into the channel of patience, and he endures with resignation the will of the Most High. He who does nothing believes nothing—that is to say, in reality and in truth. Faith is but an empty show if it produces no result upon the life. If a professor manifests no energy, no industry, no zeal, no perseverance, no endeavor to serve God, there is cause gravely to question whether he is a believer at all.

Look at the prodigal, and note his early desires. The life of grace begins to gleam into his spirit, and its first effect is the confession of sin. He cries, "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son." But what is the second effect? He desires to be doing something. "Make me as one of thy hired servants." Having nothing to do had helped to make him the prodigal he was. He had wasted his substance in riotous idleness, seeking enjoyment without employment. He had plunged into the foulest vices because he was master of money but not master of himself. It was not an ill thing for him when he was sent into the fields to feed swine: the company which he met with at the swine trough was better than that which he had kept at his banquets. One of the signs of the return of his soul's sanity was his willingness to work, although it might be only as a menial servant in his father's house.

Every one should follow an honorable vocation. It was a rule of the old church, and it ought to be one of the present—"If any man will not work neither let him eat." It is good for us all to have something to do, and plenty of it. When man was perfect God placed him in a paradise, but not in a dormitory. He set him in the garden to "dress it and to keep it." It would not have been a happy place for Adam if he had had nothing to do but to smell the roses and gaze at the flowers: work was as essential to the perfect man as it is to us, though it was not of the kind which brings sweat to the face or weariness to the limbs.

The text says, "The life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God." Does faith in the Son of God, who loved him and gave Himself for him, suggest to the redeemed man that he should be industrious and active? Assuredly it does; for it sets the divine Saviour before him as an example; and where was there ever one who worked as Jesus did? In His early youth He said, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

HE WAS NO LOITERING HEIR

of a gentleman, but the toiling son of a carpenter. In after life it was His meat and His drink to do the will of Him that sent Him.

True faith in Him who loved us, and gave Himself for us, also seeks direction of the Lord as to the sphere of its action, and waits upon Him to be guided by Him in the choice of a calling. This part of our discourse may be useful to young persons who have not settled upon what they are to do in life. Faith is a great service to us here. Much depends upon the choice of our pursuits. Some people are trying to do what they were never made for, ambitious beyond their line. This is a grievous evil. There should, therefore, be a seeking unto God for guidance and direction; and faith leads us to such seeking.

This prayer may be used in many senses: "Show me what thou wouldest have me to do." In the choice of a calling faith helps a Christian to refuse that which is the most lucrative if it be attended with a questionable morality. If the Christian could have huge purses of that gold, which is coined out of the drunkenness, the lust, or the ungodliness of men, he would scorn to put them among his stores. Trades which are injurious to men's minds and hearts are not lawful callings before God.

Dishonest gain is awful loss. Gold gained by deceit or oppression shall burn into the soul of its owner as the fire of hell. "Make money," said the worldling to his son; "make it honestly if you can, but, anyhow, make money." Faith abhors this precept of Mammon, and having God's providence for its inheritance, it scorns the devil's bribe. Choose no calling over which you cannot ask God's blessing, or you will be acting contrary to the law of faith.

Callings should be deliberately chosen with a view to our own suitableness for them. Faith watches the design of God, and desires to act according to His intent. It had been ill for David to have lived in retirement, or for the prophet Nathan to have aspired to the throne. The law of the kingdom is—"Every man in his own order;" or in other words, "Every man according to his several ability." If the Lord has given us one talent let us use it in its own market; or if two, or five, let us trade with them where they can be most profitably employed, so that we may be found faithful servants in the day of the Master's coming.

We should also by faith desire such a calling as Providence evidently has arranged and intended for us. Some persons have never had a free choice of what vocation they would follow; for from their birth, position, surroundings, and connections they are set in a certain line of things, like carriages on the tram lines, and they must follow on the appointed track, or stand still. Faith expects to hear the voice behind it saying, "This is the way, walk ye in it." Trusting to our own judgment often means following our own whims; but faith seeks direction from infallible wisdom, and so it is led in a right way. God knows your capacity better than you do; entreat Him to choose your inheritance for you.

So, then, you see, faith has much to do with the force and direction of our life in the flesh. It provides impetus by giving a man something to live for; it shows him the far-reaching influences of the thoughts and deeds of to-day, and how they issue in eternal results; and faith also takes the helm and steers the vessel along a safe channel toward the haven of holy rest. Happy are they who in the early days of their youth believe in Him who loved them and gave Himself for them, and so begin their life-walk with Jesus.

II. Secondly, faith leads a man in his ordinary avocation. Here, again, it has a great influence over him. A believer may seek of God the qualifications for his particular calling. "What," say you, "may we pray about such things?" Yes. The laborer may appeal to God for strength; the artisan may ask God for skill; the student may seek God for help to quicken his intelligence. If you pray over your work I am persuaded you will be helped in it. If for your calling you are as yet but slenderly qualified, you may every morning pray God to help you that you may be careful and observant as an apprentice or a beginner; for has He not promised that as your day your strength shall be? A mind which is trusting in the Lord is in the best condition for acquiring knowledge, and getting understanding.

TO LOOK TO GOD FOR HELP

As to your behavior also in your work, there is room for faith and prayer. For, O brethren, whether qualified or not for any particular offices of this life, our conduct is the most important matter. It is well to be clever, but it is essential to be pure. I would have you masters of your trades, but I am even more earnest that you should be honest, truthful, and holy. About this we may confidently go to God and ask Him to lead us in a plain path, and to hold up our goings that we slip not. He can and will help us to behave ourselves wisely. "Lead us not into temptation" is one sentence of our daily prayer, and we may further ask that when we are in the temptation we may be delivered from the evil.

We need prudence, and faith remembers that if any lack wisdom he may ask of God. Godliness teaches the young men prudence, the babes knowledge and discretion. And so, dear friends, engaged in service or in business, you may go to your heavenly Father and ask Him to guide you with His counsel, and you may rest assured that He will order all your way, so that your daily calling shall not hinder your heavenly calling, nor your conduct belie your profession.

Faith bids you seek help from God as to the success of your daily calling. Know ye not what David says, "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it. It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows: for so He giveth His beloved sleep." It is a most pleasant thing to be able by faith to consult the holy oracle about everything, whether it arises in trade, or in the family, or in the church. We may say with Abraham's servant, "O Lord, I pray Thee send me good speed this day." You may expect success if you thus seek it; and peradventure some of you would have prospered more if you had more believingly sought the Lord. I say "peradventure," because God does not always prosper even His own people in outward things, since it is sometimes better for their souls that they should be in adversity, and then the highest prosperity is a want of prosperity. Faith quiets the heart in this matter by enabling us to leave results in the hand of God.

Faith acts also in reference to our surroundin We are all very much influenced by those ab us. God can raise us up friends who will be e nently helpful to us, and we may pray Him do so: He can put us into a circle of society which we shall find much assistance in this li affairs, and also in our progress toward heave and concerning this we know that "The steps a good man are ordered of the Lord."

III. Thirdly, faith exercises a power over man's life of a remarkable kind, because it le him in his daily calling. Never is life more ennob than when we do all things as unto God. T makes drudgery sublime, and links the poor menial with the brightest angel. Seraphs ser God in heaven, and you and I may serve Him the pulpit or in the kitchen and be as accepted they are. Brethren, Christian men are helped faith to serve God in their calling by obedience God's commands, by endeavoring to order eve thing according to the rules of love to God a love to men. In such a case integrity and u rightness preserve the man, and his business comes true worship.

Godly men exercise faith in God in their callin by trying to manifest a Christian spirit in all th they do. The spirit which actuates us may se to be a small matter so long as we are outwar right; but it is in reality the essence of the wh thing. Take away the flavor from the fruit, or t fragrance from the flower, and what is left? su is correct living without the savor of grace. T same thing can be done in several ways: you c do a right thing in so wrong a way as to make wrong. Even in giving to the poor, a churl w trample upon their feelings in the very act of l charity; while I have known others who have be unable to give who, nevertheless, have express their inability in so kindly a form that they ha comforted the disappointed applicant. Oh, to a in your trade and you calling as Christ would ha acted had He been in your place.

Furthermore, in all that we do, we should aiming at God's glory. We should do everythi as unto God, and not unto men. There would no eye-service if we left off being men pleasers a began to please God. Neither would there be i patience under injustice; for if men do not acce our service when we have done it with all c hearts, we shall comfort ourselves with the refl tion that our Master in heaven knows how little deserve the unrighteous censure. To live as kin and priests unto God is the cream of living. Th will you be the Lord's free men. Serve God serving men, and serve men by serving Go there is a way of working out those two sentenc even to the full, and thus rendering life sublin

Sophia Cook sought Mr. Wesley's counsel as what she should do in life, and he answered "L to-day:" a very short direction but one that is f of wisdom. "Live to-day" and to-morrow y may do the same. Plans for the whole term life many of you may not be able to construct, b mind that you work while it is called to-day. "Sc go work to-day in my vineyard" is the gr Father's word. How would a man live if he f that he was specially to live for God this da Suppose that to-day there was a vow upon you, some other bond, by which you felt that this wh day was solemnly consecrated to the Lord; h would you behave yourself? So ought you to b have this day, and every day; for you belo wholly to Him who loved you, and gave Hims for you.

IV. Fourthly, faith has a very beneficial inf ence upon the life that we live in the flesh, for of his calling. It is not every calling that is ea or lucrative, or honored among men. It is a hap circumstance when a man has espoused a busine which is so congenial with his taste that he wou not change it for another if he could: but sor find their trades irksome to them. This is an e under the sun. Some employments are despis by the thoughtless, and involve much self-deni and hence those who follow them need much fai to enable them to live above the trials of their po tion. Faith teaches the humble worker to see Jesus in all His lowliness, condescending to take upon Himself the form of a servant for our sakes.

Your faith ought to help you by arousing your gratitude for deliverance from a far worse drudgery. You did for Satan things of which you are now ashamed. Any work for the devil, and for his black cause, would be dishonorable : to rule an empire for Satan would disgrace us ; to wear the crown put on our heads by sinning would be a horrible curse, but to wash feet for Christ is glorious service. There is no degradation in anything that is done for God. Faith in God sanctifies the man, and his calling, too, and makes it pleasant to him to carry the cross of Christ in his daily labor. There are some who hold their heads high, who, nevertheless, do things that are disgraceful to humanity ; but surely you and I ought never to think anything a hardship which falls to our lot by the appointment of divine providence.

Faith is a great teacher of humility ; for it bids us think little of ourselves, and rest alone in God ; and because it fosters humility it renders a man's task pleasant when else it would be irksome. Pride makes a man stiff in the back : there are some works which he cannot do though he would be happy enough in doing them if he had not such foolish ideas of his own importance. Hard work is no disgrace to any man ; it is far more degrading to be leading the life of a fashionable do-nothing.

Faith also removes discomforts by reminding us that they will not last long. Faith says of trial, "Bear it ! The time is short. Soon the Saviour cometh, and the poorest of His followers shall then reign with Him." Toil on, O weary one, for the morning light will put an end to thy labor, which lasts only through the hours of darkness. The glory breaks : the night is wearing away, and the dawn appeareth. Therefore patiently wait and quietly hope, for thou shalt see the salvation of God. Thus faith takes the thorns from our pillow, and makes us learn in whatsoever state we are therewith to be content. Call you this nothing? Has not Jesus done much for us when by faith in Him we have learned to endure the ills of life with sweet content ?

V. Fifthly, faith has this further influence upon ordinary life—that

IT CASTS ALL THE BURDEN OF IT UPON THE LORD.

Faith is the great remover of yokes, and it does this in part by making us submissive to God's will. When we have learned to submit we cease to repine. Faith teaches us so to believe in God's infallible wisdom and perfect love, that we consent unto the Lord's will and rejoice in it. Faith teaches us to look to the end of every present trial and to know that it works together for good : thus again reconciling us to the passing grief which it causes. Faith teaches us to depend upon the power of God to help us in the trial, and through the trial, and in this way we are no longer stumbled by afflictions, but rise above them as on eagles' wings.

Brethren, if any of you are anxious, careworn, and worried, stop not in such a state of mind ; it cannot do you any good ; and it reflects no honor upon your great Father. Pray for more faith, that you may have no back-breaking load to carry, but may transfer it to the great Burden-bearer. Pray to your great Lord so to strengthen and ease your heart that your only care may be to please Him, and that you may be released from all other care.

What burden faith finds in her daily avocation she casts it upon God by prayer. We begin with God in the morning, seeking help to do our work, and to do it well. At His hands we seek guidance and prosperity from hour to hour. We pray Him to prevent our doing any wrong to others, or suffering any wrong from them ; and we ask Him to keep our temper and to preserve our spirit while we are with worldly men. We beg that we may not be infected by the evil example of others, and that our example may be such as may be safely followed. These are our great concerns in business ; we tremble lest in anything we should dishonor God, and we trust in Him to keep us.

To all this the example of the Saviour leads us, and His love within our hearts draws us. "He trusted on the Lord that He would deliver him," and "was heard in that he feared."

VI. Sixthly, faith hath a happy influence upon the present life, for it moderates a man's feelings as to

THE RESULT OF HIS WORK.

Sometimes the result of our work is prosperity, and here the grace of God prevents a surfeit of worldly things. There is a keen test of character in prosperity. Everybody longs for it, but it is not every man that can bear it when it comes. True faith forbids our setting great store by worldly goods and pleasures and enjoyments, for it teaches us that our treasure is in heaven. If we begin to idolize the things that are seen, we shall soon degenerate and turn aside from God. How easily we may spoil a blessing ! Two friends gathered each a rose : the one was continually smelling at it, touching its leaves and handling it as if he could not hold it too fast ; you do not wonder that it was soon withered. The other took his rose, enjoyed its perfume moderately, carried it in his hand for a while, and then placed it on the table in water, and hours after it was almost as fresh as when it was plucked from the bough.

We may dote on our worldly gear until God becomes jealous of it, and sends a blight upon it ; and, on the other hand, we may with holy moderateness use these things as not abusing them, and get from them the utmost good which they are capable of conveying to us. Many pursue wealth or fame as some eager boy hunts the painted butterfly : at last, after a long and weary run, he dashes it down with his cap, and with the stroke he spoils its beauty. Many a man hath reached the summit of a life-long ambition and found it to be mere vanity. In gaining all he has lost all ; wealth has come, but the power to enjoy it has gone ; life has been worn out in the pursuit, and no strength is left with which to enjoy the gain. It shall not be so with the man who lives by faith, for his chief joys are above, and his comfort lies within. To him God is joy so rich that other joy is comparatively flavorless.

But perchance the result of all our work may be adversity. Some men row very hard, and yet their boat makes no headway. When an opportunity presents itself the tide of trade suddenly turns against them. When they have corn in the mill the wind does not blow. Perhaps they lose all but their character, and then it is that faith comes in to cheer them under the disaster. I am deeply grieved when I hear of persons committing suicide because they were in difficulties : it is a dreadful thing thus to rush before one's Creator unbidden. Faith sustains the heart and puts aside all thoughts of such desperate attempts to fly from present griefs by plunging into far more awful woes. We shall bear up and come through our trials triumphantly if we have faith in God.

O brothers and sisters, faith is a precious preparative for anything and everything that comes ; mind that you have it always ready for action. Do not leave it at home in time of storm as the foolish seaman left his anchor. It is not a grace to be shut up in a closet, or fastened to a communion table, or boxed up in a pew, but it is an everyday grace which is to be our companion in the shop and in the market, in the parlor and in the kitchen, in the workroom and in the field ; ay, it may go into the workhouse with the poor, as well as into the mansion with the rich ; it may either cheer the dreary hours of the infirmary, or sanctify the sunny weeks of holiday.

Faith is for every place in which a good man may lawfully be found. "Should fate command you to the utmost verge of the green earth, to rivers unknown to song" yet shall a childlike faith in God find you a home in every clime, under every sky. Oh, to feel the power of it, as to all that comes of our labor, that the life which we live in the flesh may be lived by faith in the Son of God, who loved us and gave Himself for us.

VII. Seventhly, faith has this sweet influence upon our present life, that it enables a man when the time comes. A Christian may have to quit a favorite vocation on account of circumstances over which he has no control ; he may have to emigrate to a distant land, or altogether to change his mode of living, and this may involve many a wrench to his feelings. It is not always easy to leave the old house, and all its surroundings, and to take a long journey ; nor is it pleasant to change one's settled habits and begin life anew ; yet true faith sets loose by worldly things, and is ready to haul up the anchor and make sail at the divine bidding. The believer says, "Command my journey, and I go." I am but a tent dweller, and must expect to be on the move.

Sometimes our vocations have to be given up through weakness or old age. It is a hard pinch to many a busy man when he feels that he has no more strength for business, when he perceives that other and more vigorous minds must be allowed to step into the long occupied position. The workman cannot bear to feel that his hand has lost its cunning : it is a sharp experience. Faith is of essential service here. It helps a man to say, "My Master, I am one of the vessels of Thy house ; if Thou wilt use me I will be glad ; but if Thou wilt put me on the shelf, I will be glad too. It must be best for me to be as Thou wouldst have me."

And then comes at last the leaving of your vocation by death, which will arrive in due time to us all. Then faith displays its utmost energy of blessing. Brethren, may we meet death as Moses did, who when God bade him climb the mountain, for there he must die, uttered no word of sorrow, but like a child obeyed his father, went upstairs to bed, looked wistfully out at the window upon the promised land, and then fell asleep. How sweet to look upon the goodly land and Lebanon, and then to be kissed to sleep by his Father's own mouth, and to be buried man knoweth not where. His work was done, and his rest was come. Beautiful are the departing words of Samuel, when, laying down his office, he can challenge all men to bear witness to his character. Happy man, to depart amid universal blessing. O that each one of us may be ready to render in his account before the judgment-seat of Christ—let the last day come when it may.

Our Master, by whose love we have been endowed with faith, has taught us how to die as well as how to live. He could say, "I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do," and He would have us say it. Thrice happy man who, in laying down the shepherd's crook or the carpenter's plane, in putting aside the ledger or the class-book, never to open them again, can exclaim, "I have fought a good fight ; I have kept the faith ; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of life which fadeth not away."

A QUAINT ANSWER.

Good old Mede, the Puritan, when he was very old, and leaning on his staff, was asked how he was, and he answered, "Why, going home as fast as I can; as every honest man ought to do when his day's work is done : and I bless God I have a good home to go to." Dear aged saints, so near home, does not faith transform death from an enemy into a friend, as it brings the glory so near to you ? You will soon be in the Father's house and leave me behind ; and yet I cannot tell ; I remember that the other disciple did outrun Peter, and came first to the sepulchre, and so, perhaps, may I. You have the start of us in years, but we may be called home before you, for there are last that shall be first. Let death come when it may we shall not be afraid, for Jesus, who has loved us and given Himself for us, is the resurrection and the life.

Living this life in the flesh by faith upon the Son of God, we are waiting for the usher of the black rod to bring a message from the King to summon us to meet Him in the upper house. Why should we be loth to go ? What is there here that we should wait ? What is there on this poor earth to detain a heaven-born and heaven-bound spirit ? Nay, let us go, for He is gone in whom our treasure is, whose beauties have engrossed our love. He is not here, why should we desire to linger ? He has risen, let us rise.

Thus, from the beginning to the end of the life that we live in the flesh, faith upon the Son of God answereth all things, and all its paths drop fatness.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Matthew 6.]

MR. JOHN JAMES JONES, M.G.C., F.R.G.S.
The Christian Philanthropist.

His Early History and Marriage—His Conversion—How his Work Among the Cabmen in London came About—The Homerton Mission and Other Benevolent Works Conducted at the East of London—His Foreign War Experiences in Servia—At the Paris Exhibition.

THE life of a useful man is ever worth perusing, and it is pre-eminently the life of a useful man to which we have this week the pleasure of directing the reader's attention. Mr. John James Jones, Director of the "London Samaritan Society," better known under its former title of the "Homerton Mission," was the son of the late Thomas Jones, a builder and contractor in Chepstow. It was originally intended that he should be associated with his father in the business, and accordingly at the age of fifteen we find him entering upon that occupation, in which he soon attained a fair degree of proficiency. Four years later he occupied a position at Messrs. Cubitt's great building establishment in London; but being compelled to relinquish it on account of ill-health, he returned home. He was then offered a situation in the drapery and furnishing establishment of Messrs. Jones & Co., of Bristol, which he accepted; and on February 3, 1869, he married the only daughter of Abraham Board, Esq., of South Brent, near Bridgewater.

So far, Mr. Jones had led a careless life, and his heart had not been touched by the power of the Spirit. Like thousands of persons, then as now, he had a form of godliness without its living, vitalizing power; but that was soon to come. One Sunday the thought flashed through his mind, "I should like to hear George Müller preach." He had heard of his wonderful Orphanages, and of the miraculous manner in which they were sustained, and his curiosity was thoroughly aroused both to see and hear that remarkable man, to whom all Christendom points as having that faith which can do a more useful thing than remove mountains—feed, clothe, and house destitute orphans.

On the Sunday that Mr. Jones determined to go to Mr. Müller's church Mr. Müller was absent; but his pulpit was occupied by Mr. Benjamin Thomas. It is sufficient to say that an arrow from the Almighty struck the heart of the young man, and that night before retiring to rest he could say truly that he had found pardon and peace in Christ Jesus.

From that moment John James Jones was an altered man. He desired no longer to live for himself alone, but for the good that he could do to the perishing ones around him, whom he yearned to bring to a knowledge of the same peace that he himself had found. Having some private means, he no longer sought to aggrandize himself, but prayed for Divine guidance to show him what to do.

In the first place, like one of old, when converted, he went and told the good news at home at Chepstow, and soon arranged for a series of special services extending over two weeks. God so blessed the testimony he gave, that many professed to believe; and when he left Chepstow hundreds of persons accompanied him to the train to wish him God speed.

Mr. Jones found his first sphere of usefulness in the

of Bristol; and after a while in conjunction with Dr. Mackenzie, he took the "Theatre and Palace of Varieties" for special religious services, where he had for his associates Major Duncan, Major Tyerman, Mr. George Müller, and other Christian men of almost every denomination. Dr. Mackenzie and Mr. Jones decided to give up all their time to the Lord's service, and proceeded together to London to prepare for work in the foreign field. A very simple incident—and yet it is on these that often depend the great issues of life—occurred at the very end of the journey, which eventually completely altered Mr. Jones' intention. On his arrival at the house of his brother-in-law he spoke to the cabman, and gave him a small Testament, and was surprised to find how neglected that class was by the Christian community at large. He became greatly interested in cabmen, got up special meetings for them, and soon saw there was a vast field at home in which, though the harvest was plenteous, the laborers were few. This led him to relinquish the idea of foreign work. However, his friend Dr. Mackenzie went to China, and is now laboring in connection with the London Missionary Society as a medical missionary.

We now come to the leading feature in Mr. Jones' Christian life, viz., the organization of the Homerton Mission, but now known as the London Samaritan Society. The former title was inappropriate, inasmuch as the ramifications of the work extended all over London. It has been the writer's lot to attend the Early Sunday Morning Breakfasts in places far distant from each other, as Whitecross Street, Mile End New Town, and Camberwell. On inquiry we found that each of these was given through the agency of the Homerton Mission, of which Mr. Jones was the very life and soul, and without whom, under the blessing of God, it would never have had an existence. The extent of this work may be gathered from the fact that, during the last winter alone, no fewer than were given, in connection with sixty-eight churches, chapels, and mission halls, through the agency of this mission, to the most destitute poor of London. There are missionaries connected with Mr. Jones's work laboring among the cabmen, the fire brigade men, and a colporteur distributes his tracts all about East London.

Another outcome of the work has been the "Chepstow Castle" Coffee Palace and Reading Rooms, a favorite resort with the working people of Homerton, and one which pays its expenses, and is therefore no drain upon the general funds. There is a Mission Hall attached, at which the services are taken by the ministers and lay preachers of all denominations. In fact, from beginning to end Mr. Jones has sought to make his work unsectarian, and has perfectly succeeded. But the narrow confines of this Mission Hall were totally insufficient to accommodate the crowds of working people who wished to be present at the services, and the question forced itself upon Mr. Jones' mind whether the time had not come to build a far larger hall, which should be used mainly for the spiritual, intellectual, and moral well-being of those who do not attend any regular place of worship.

Mr. Jones is pre-eminently a man of action, and having found a suitable plot of ground, he at once caused building operations to be commenced, and on the 24th of September, 1879, "The Homerton Evangelical Hall," for so the building is called, was opened under the happiest auspices, at a cost of about £4,000. The hall is well fitted, and will comfortably seat about 800 persons. Since the opening all the Sunday services and miscellaneous meetings that are held throughout the week have been crowded. All seats are free, and all who frequent the hall are treated on the same level, viz., that of sinners needing the precious blood of a Saviour.

Later still Mr. Jones opened a Convalescent Home at Dover for the destitute sick. There are hundreds of lives lost for the want of a little change of air, rest, and nourishing food at the time of recovery from illness, and this Home is intended, as far as means will allow, to supply this want.

Not the least important feature of Mr. Jones' life has been the service he voluntarily rendered to the refugees during the late Servo-Turkish and Russo-Turkish wars, for which service he was decorated by Prince Milan with the Milan Grand Cross, and on his return he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society. In the first war he labored in connection with the Metropolitan Committee of London, and in the second with Viscountess Strangford's Fund, and exposed himself to perils to which it is needless to advert.

In 1878 Mr. Jones was asked to take the direction of some Christian work in Paris during the Exhibition, including the British Tea and Coffee Palace, and obtained for his supporters the Duke of Westminster, the Right Honorable Cowper-Temple, M.P., Samuel Morley, Esq., M.P., J. G. Barclay, Esq., F. A. Bevan, Esq., the Rev. Michael Baxter, London editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and others.

Mr. Jones left England on May 12th on behalf of the working classes of the United Kingdom and to make himself personally and practically acquainted with the large resources of Canada and the States, and their facilities for absorbing British immigrants, and as it is Mr. Jones's intention to take part in Christian work while in this country, if any of our readers wish to communicate with him or to send contributions for his work in England, they may address him in care of Mr. T. Board, Box 340, Windsor P. O., Ontario, Canada.

INCIDENTS OF THE FIVE POINTS MISSION.

A Woman in Cow Bay.

MY assistant and myself went out to visit the sick, and, among others, we called to find a woman in Cow Bay, who had sent for us. We entered one house and searched in every room without success. We then tried the adjoining one, and, after climbing the ricketty stairs and stooping along the low narrow passages, we reached the attic, at one end of which we saw a door, where we knocked for some time and at last opened it ourselves. Our hearts grew sad within us as, away in one corner, between a huge chest on one side and the brick wall on the other, we found the object of our search lying on the dirty floor. Her only covering was her birthday suit and a ragged cotton quilt, which formed no contrast in color with the floor.' She presented a fearful picture of humanity wrecked.

On inquiry we found she was suffering the results of crime the most awful. She had been for many months pursuing a course of most fearful intemperance, and was then living with a black man. The present sickness was occasioned in the first place by excess and had afflicted her about a year, but it had been greatly increased by shocking scenes in the room. A white woman, who had been horribly beaten by the black man with whom she was living, had died on the Sunday previous to our visit, and had not been buried until the succeeding Wednesday; the putrid body spreading contagion in every direction through the house and especially in this low narrow room.

Too weak to go out this poor creature lay in the room with the corpse three days and three nights—a situation horrible beyond description. Her decline was hastened by this; and the wretched creature lay before us writhing in excruciating agony. My assistant went for the doctor, and I talked with the poor woman about her soul. She had been piously brought up, and her parents still lived in one of the most aristocratic portions of the city, not knowing anything about her. She had often felt in her wildest revelry that she was a sinner, but intemperance and its kindred crimes had hurried her onward until she had been brought to her present position at the early age of twenty-three. I prayed with her, and found her to all appearance deeply penitent. Such fearful self-condemnations I never heard; such wailings of despair as my mind had fancied belonged only to the pit itself. I directed her to Christ who could save even from these abysses of sin, and felt great satisfaction in telling the poor lost one the blessed story of the cross.

Several men and a woman now came into the room and stood silently looking on. Alone as I was among so many who, from their looks, were adepts in crime, my position was not at all pleasant; when, as I arose to take my seat on the great chest, some pennies in my pocket jingled, and I noticed a quick look from one to the other, a thousand thoughts flew like lightning through my mind as I saw at a glance that I was so completely in their power that they might accomplish any purpose they saw fit and I could only by a miracle escape.

My suspense was soon ended by the appearance of my assistant and the doctor, who prescribed for the sick woman. Among other things ice was ordered. He sent the woman who had come in for it, and I shall never forget the look of mingled satisfaction and pain that spread over her face as she saw me with my knife break the ice into small lumps and put them into the poor woman's mouth. She said, as I arose from the pleasant task, "Well, sah, you is kind." This opened the way for some conversation between us; and following it up we exhorted the whole company to forsake the ways of sin. The exhortations were honest ones, and the audience a wretched one. We knelt to pray; the whole company knelt, and as my assistant poured out his prayer to God, groans and cries filled the room. The wretched creature in the corner cried, "O God, be merciful to me, a sinner," and the same prayer rolled forth from other lips, whose only prayers had been imprecations, and whose penitence despair. If angels ever weep, they must have wept then.

After a few days we had the sick woman brought to our building, and she began to improve; but the burning thirst for liquor seemed to haunt her like an avenging spirit. One day we missed her, and we were not able to find her again. From some information we gleaned we thought she went out to satisfy her craving thirst for the fiery stimulant, now become so fatally necessary to her, and met her companion in crime, who then locked her up.

SAVE THE CHILDREN.

THE Rev. Canon Farrar made an earnest plea on behalf of the children in a speech delivered recently at a meeting of the National Temperance League in Exeter Hall, London. He said. "In working for the children you are working for the future; you are working in a region which is a region of hope. Do not be frightened from this effort to rescue the children by the talk of those who say that it is an injury to children to make them take the pledge. Those are persons who strain at the very tiniest and most microscopical of gnats, while they will daily swallow the most monstrous of camels. We have in England, it is said, 600,000 drunkards. Well, now, as those unhappy drunkards go too often prematurely to a drunkard's grave, who is it that fills up the gaps?

"The gaps are filled up by those who are now sweet and innocent children—merry and honest boys and girls. God grant that no sweet and innocent children of ours shall ever go to add to the number of that fearfully recruited army.

"I will tell you for a few moments what it is to which children are exposed, and what it is from which we are trying to save them. In the first instance, they are exposed to the most shameful neglect. Go into the low quarters of Glasgow, the filthy back streets of Liverpool, the foul fever-slums of almost any of our great cities, and there you will see bright-eyed, tattered, ill-fed children growing up amid the reek of gin and amid scenes of blasphemy, in low, infamous rooms, and in low, infamous streets, dirty, dissolute, and depraved—the very seed-plot of our future criminals—growing up without any parental control whatever.

"It is not only shameful neglect to which they are exposed—they are also exposed daily and weekly to accident. Not long ago a driver was driving through Southwark in the heavy, brutal way in which drunkards do drive sometimes through the streets of London, and there was crossing the road at the moment a poor woman with a little babe of eleven months in her arms, and she was also leading by the hand a little girl of four years old. This drunken brute drove over them, terribly injuring the woman, killing the little babe, and breaking the leg of the little girl of four years old.

"And they are not only exposed to accident, but also to terrible cruelty. In this very city a week ago, in this civilized Christian society, a horrified spectator saw a woman holding up by the legs a little child of five months old, and when remonstrated with she dropped the child upon the pavement and ran away. And they are not only exposed to accident and cruelty, but also to absolute death. I believe that every single year in England dozens—more than dozens—scores, ay, and even by being overlaid by their drunken parents. And the 'accident wards,' as they are called, of hospitals will tell you how frequently little boys and girls are brought in terribly burned over neck and face and hands because they have been intrusted to drunken women or neglected by drunken mothers. I do most deliberately declare that in my distinct conviction more children are sacrificed every year in England to the awful Moloch of drink than were ever burned alive in the worst days of Judean apostasy to Moloch in the Valley of the Children of Hinnom.

"Now, let us ask whether there can be anything worse than all this neglect and accident and cruelty and disease and death? Yes: there is something worse than all this—there is sin. Disease and accident and cruelty and death may maim and torture the body, murder and suicide may end the life, but sin blasts and corrupts the soul, and many and many a drunkard's child in England is being trained up deliberately in the habits of sin. How unspeakably distressing was the case which occurred only the other day at Lambeth. A woman of twenty-six, with her child, was brought up before the court for stealing glasses from a tavern. In the court the father was present. The little child ran to its father's arms. The father burst into tears, and said, 'I have always been an honest man, and I have worked for my bread. It has all been of no use. My wife has drunk away all my earnings. She has trained my child, as you see, and has left me overwhelmed with debt on every side."

"Save the children! Go home, and remember that these little children are of the same flesh and blood, and the same hearts and nature, and as full of eternity and immortality as those little children on whose rosy and innocent faces you look when you go to your abodes.

THESE LAST TIMES.

By Robert Anderson, LL.D.

TO living men no time can be so solemn as "the living present," whatever its characteristics; and that solemnity is immensely deepened in an age of progress unparalleled in the history of the world. But the question arises whether these days of ours are momentous beyond comparison, by reason of their being in the strictest sense the last? Is the world's history about to close? The sands of its destiny, are they almost run out, and is the crash of all things near at hand?

Earnest thinkers will not allow the wild utterances of alarmists, or the vagaries of prophecy-mongers, to divert them from an inquiry at once so solemn and so reasonable. It is only the infidel who doubts that there is a destined limit to the course of "this present evil world." That God will one day put forth His power to insure the triumph of the good, is in some sense a matter of course. The mystery of revelation is not that He will do this, but that He delays to do it. Judged by the public facts around us, He is an indifferent spectator of the unequal struggle between good and evil upon earth. "I considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun; and beheld the tears of the oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power, but they had no comforter." And how can such things be, if indeed the God who rules above is almighty and all-good? Vice and godlessness and violence and wrong are rampant upon every side, and yet the heavens above keep silence. The infidel appeals to the fact in proofs that the Christian's God is but a myth. The Christian finds in it a further proof that the God he worships is patient and long-suffering—"patient because He is eternal," long-suffering because He is almighty, for wrath is a last resource with power.

But the day is coming when "our God shall come and shall not keep silence." This is not a matter of opinion, but of faith. He who questions it has no claim whatever to the name of Christian, for it is as essentially a truth of Christianity as is the record of the life and death of the Son of God. The old Scriptures teem with it, and of all the writers of the New Testament there is not so much as one who does not expressly speak of it. It was the burden of the first prophetic utterance which Holy Writ records; and the closing book of the sacred Canon, from the first chapter to the last, confirms and amplifies the testimony.

The only inquiry, therefore, which concerns us relates to the nature of the crisis and the time of its fulfilment. And the key to this inquiry is the Prophet Daniel's vision of the seventy weeks. Not that a right understanding of the prophecy will enable us to prophesy. That is not the purpose for which it was given. But it will prove a sufficient safeguard against error in the study.

No words ought to be necessary to enforce the importance of the subject, and yet the neglect of the prophetic Scriptures, by those even who profess to believe all Scripture to be inspired, is proverbial. Putting the matter on the lowest ground, it might be urged that, if a knowledge of the past be important, a knowledge of the future must be of far higher value still, in enlarging the mind and raising it above the littleness produced by a narrow and unenlightened contemplation of the present. If God has vouchsafed a revelation to men, the study of it is surely fitted to excite enthusiastic interest, and to command the exercise of every talent which can be brought to bear upon it.

And this suggests another ground on which, in our own day especially, prophetic study claims peculiar prominence; namely, the testimony it affords to the divine character and origin of the Scriptures. Though infidelity was as open-mouthed in former times, it had its own banner and its own camp, and it shocked the mass of mankind, who, though ignorant of the spiritual power of religion, clung nevertheless with dull tenacity to its dogmas. But the special feature of the present age—well fitted to cause anxiety and alarm to all thoughtful men—is the growth of what may be termed religious scepticism, a Christianity which denies revelation—a form of godliness which denies that which is the power of godliness.

What concerns us here is the indisputable fact that rationalism in this its most subtle phase is leavening society. The universities are its chief seminaries; the pulpit is its platform. Some of the most popular religious leaders are among its apostles. No class is safe from its influence. And if even the present could be stereotyped, it were well; but we have entered on a downward path, and they must indeed be blind who cannot see where it is leading. If the authority of the Scriptures be unshaken, vital truths may be lost by one generation and recovered by the next; but if that be touched, the foundation of all truth is undermined, and all power of recovery is gone. The Christianized sceptic of to-day will soon give place to the Christianized infidel, whose disciples and successors in their turn will be infidels without any gloss of Christianity about them. Some, doubtless, will escape; but as for the many, Rome will be the only refuge for those who dread the goal to which society is hastening. Thus the forces are marshalling for the great predicted struggle of the future, between the apostasy of a false religion and the apostasy of open infidelity.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Etta's Visit to Lady Isabel—The Secret of Successful Work—The Dying Saloon-Keeper—A Visit to the Sick Man—A Terrified Wife—Anxiety for the Visitor—A Miserable Death.

"MY pet!" the Rector said, as he went into Atleth's room and saw two bright eyes looking at him from the sofa.

"Papa!" the child echoed jubilantly; and in a moment her soft little arms were tightly twined round his neck, and warm kisses were being pressed upon his cheek.

"What's the news?" at last he asked, disentangling himself. "Any news to-day?"

"Mrs. Fennecker came and she brought me a little tiny musical-box! Look here. It can play some tunes. Isn't everybody very kind to me, papa?" the child continued. "Even old Michael is good to me. Say 'yes,' papa; say 'yes!' Aren't they kind?"

While he said, "Yes, darling, yes!" and kissed and petted his little treasure, she drank in the sweetness of his love, and smiled back again, and gently stroked his face. She little knew how, as she lay there from day to day, she was gradually forming a passive medium for the inflow, and outflow too, of higher and holier, and larger and warmer, thoughts and affections, through the somewhat rigid channels of her father's heart.

"I want you to be kind to Michael, father, and give him a shed," she continued. "You know his was burnt down. And he has given me so many things."

"You funny little girl!" said her father, kissing her once more; and then walking to the window he stood looking out, till, seeing the gardener stooping over a flower-bed, he turned round and said,

"I see your friend examining the oval rose-bed."

"My friend!" said Aleth. "I have got so many friends! Is it dear Mr. Hutton?"

The rector smiled.

"You are such an absurd child!" he said. "Never mind. The doctor says we shall soon have you well again now. Won't that be nice? And then you will go out and see them all."

Aleth clapped her hands.

"What shall I go in, papa?" she said.

"Oh, perhaps a wheeled couch at first," he said; "and if God will, then on your own little feet."

"God grant it may be so!" he added fervently, returning to his seat by the couch.

"You pray for everything, my darling! Do you ever pray that you may soon get well again?" he asked.

"Oh, yes, papa, either here or in heaven; and that I may be very good too. And I'd like to be a comfort to you."

Thus they talked till the sweet gloaming set in, and the birds hushed themselves to sleep in whispered twitters amid the trees.

Sometimes Mr. Habershon impatiently wished that Aleth were a little older, that she might be able to enter into his parochial as well as his private interests; but then, again, he longed to keep his little sunbeam forever and ever unchanged.

Miss Habershon could not participate in his fatherly feelings regarding the school-children. Her natural mental mould was a harsh one. Though kind and brave and good in many ways, there was a soured asperity, singularly unlike her professed Master, in the general tone of her life. This was the "fly that spoilt the ointment." As love and sorrow were unitedly, by their gracious influence, softening her brother's heart, she became less and less a companion to him.

The entrance of such thoughts as these—such doubts as to past ideas—were likely to benefit his pulpit ministrations. And it is a strange thing, that as we find our feet more and more firmly resting on the Rock that never changes, we begin more and more to doubt the expediency of always crawling along in the old ruts of prejudice, or red-tapeism, or human regulation, whatever we may call them. While we cling more tightly than ever to the unalterable lines of Divine revelation, we sit more and more loosely to the shreds of that unreliable garment, human opinion.

When Etta finally visited Lady Isabel in her home near Thornham, she was enchanted to find that she had entered a region of the most systematic, zealous work. Each department was organized with military precision, while at the same time the whole was kept fresh, and full of life and freedom, by the earnest spirit of prayer that pervaded the minds of all the principal agents in Lady Isabel's projects.

"How can you succeed so wonderfully in all you undertake?" she asked.

"How can we not succeed?" was Lady Isabel's answer, "when GOD works in us and through us! It would be impossible that He could fail! would it not?"

"Oh, of course! if you look at it in that way. It is impossible."

"If we attempt even an isolated effort in our own strength, we fail; that is, the most persuasive or eloquent appeal, the most untiring labors, are useless, if performed apart from the present power of the Holy Ghost, or in the slightest degree independent of Christ Himself. I say 'independent,' not alluding to theory, but a practical state, even for that particular hour, of non-dependence upon Him who is absolutely and solely the source of life to us, and therefore to our work."

Like Mary of old, Etta "kept these things and pondered them in her heart." Bright illuminations of former difficulties flashed each day upon her mental vision. Mysteries were cleared up, vails were lifted; and she began to realize with joy the boundless wealth into which, as a Christian, she had entered by right of another. Taking His name as her plea, she might demand and be satisfied—"satiated" as the promise told her.

By common consent the subject of the "shed" was banished from the conversation. But when, at her departure—rather a sorrowful morning, to tell the truth—Lady Isabel said:

"I have no doubt all that matter will come right; and when it is so you must come back again to me, and we will all have a discussion on the subject."

Lady Isabel was left to pursue her own devices. It was not a week after her friend's departure that, passing by a low saloon, a gaunt female darted out upon her, and in the most abject manner implored her to come in and see the "old man," who was "very ill," as she said.

Lady Isabel promised to comply with the request, and, returning home, she arranged that a trusty servant should wait outside, while she explored the interior of the little public-house. When she reached the door she found the gray-haired female, weird and forbidding still, amid all her terrors, straining her eyes "to see for the lady." When she went in they ushered her past the bar-parlor, along a narrow passage, up a low stair that creaked beneath her feet, into a low-roofed room, and from thence to another and inner room.

"Talk to him, pray to him!" hoarsely whispered the saloon-keeper's wife, for such the elderly woman proved to be. "He won't get no better, p'raps. We can't tell. He's very bad now."

There in a four-post bed lay a little wizened old man. Shrunk into brown wrinkles, his face distorted with pain, and his hands fiercely clenched, lay the unhappy master of the house. The attention of the visitor was arrested by the extraordinary, and as she thought, unusual collection of delicacies that lay by his bedside. Jelly, grapes, wine, iced water, lemonade, and flowers were piled together in untidy confusion; and these apparently for the benefit of the sufferer, who lay almost unconscious of his strange surroundings. The room began to fill with various members of the family, barmaids, and others, while Lady Isabel softly talked with him.

"Louder! speak to him louder, lady!" muttered the old woman in her ear, as she laid a cold, heavy hand upon her shoulder. "He's been wicked. Can't you pray to him? There ain't no time to lose. I am afeared he'll get insensible."

Bending over the patient, the woman continued shaking him, and almost screaming into his ear:

"Can't you hear, can't you? The lady's talking to ye. She'll make yer good; she will."

Lady Isabel shuddered. It was a new scene to her. She felt convinced that the gaunt woman was herself the worse for drink; and of this she felt more certain when a younger woman stepped forward, saying:

"Come back, mother. Let the lady do as she likes. She can talk to father;" as she imperatively drew the wretched creature back from the bedside.

The Scripture was read and prayer offered, while the attendant group maintained a respectful silence. Suitable texts were selected by the gentle lady, who first sat and then knelt at the bed-side. Like David on his way to the giant's stand-post, she had chosen from the Living Stream some ammunition for her sling, and, like him she ventured before the foe in that divine strength alone, "making mention of His name," whose power is unalterable, and whose willingness to save changeth not!

"Oh, my pain is so bad!" groaned the poor creature. "Oh! oh! oh! . . . and I'm that miserable! Oh dear!"

"Hark to him!" said the gaunt woman, trying to struggle back from her post at the bottom of the bed to a nearer position.

"Stop that noise!" she called out. "Can't you have no manners about you?"

Once more they quieted her.

"Now I must go," said Lady Isabel in the softest tones, laying her hand gently upon the sick man's. "When shall I come again?" she said as she went out.

"Soon!" gasped the dying landlord.

"As often as ever you can!" said the woman, stretching forward and hissing into her ear, her eyes shining with terror; she looked like a wild animal at bay.

Then, seeing Lady Isabel cast a parting and perhaps surprised, glance at the accumulated luxuries on the table and chest of drawers, she said—

"We tries to get him all we can. He don't want for nothing. But that won't do for by and by!" And then she laughed loud and long.

The scene and sounds were hellish. Downstairs mirth and rioting were vying with the clatter of glasses and calls for "a pint."

When Lady Isabel reached home she found that her visit to, and prolonged stay in, such quarters had given rise to a domestic commotion. The pompous butler was all in a flutter, his excitement being proved by the unwonted event of a remark from his usually silent lips.

"My Lady!" he said—and there was a portentous gravity on his brow as he said it—"does your ladyship know that that place is the house where a man was stabbed lately?"

A sweet smile and silencing nod cut short his comments, while his lady merely said,

"The landlord is ill there; I went to read to him."

Her maid was in something very like hysterics when she came into Lady Isabel's room.

"We've all been in such a way, my lady!" she said, "to think you was down in such a dreadful place. They say there's fighting, and murdering, and nobody knows what, going on there."

The only person who did not disapprove was her husband. His sympathy was enthusiastic.

"Perhaps if she succeeded in this case, she might get invitations to other places of a similar kind," he said.

He referred continually to the visit and asked many questions about it. They prayed together for the man and his family.

Twice she visited him the following day; three times the next.

How each one of those visits in turn haunted Lady Isabel's thoughts She thought of the squalor and luxury; she thought of the money and misery, the anguish and sin, the stony hardness and the cringing terror, the mirth and madness; and her heart bled for the countless myriads of victims to a deadly traffic.

One day she arrived only to hear the death-rattle in his throat, and to know that he was insensible at last.

"Quite deaf!" said the old woman; "we can't make him hear a word. But perhaps he may know you."

And it was true! Though apparently past the ergent line that thinly separates time from eter-y, he knew her touch, and was aroused by it to nething like recognition. Wildly he stretched his hands, . . . stared into vacant space. . . . l was gone!

The scene was terrific. The women shrieked; y screamed. The men tried to keep order; and n sank down sobbing by the bed. "Glasses" re called for, and in the confusion Lady Isabel led out and into her carriage.

THE GOSPEL FOR THE WORLD.

S. Lesson for June 26. Luke 24 : 44–53; Golden Text, Mark 16, 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR golden text for to-day says of the apostles our Lord, "They went forth and preached everywhere." Again and again we find in the Acts of : Apostles a confirmation of this statement. For tance, immediately following upon the persecion headed by Saul of Tarsus which is mentioned the 8th chapter it is written, "Therefore they ich were scattered abroad went everywhere eaching the Word." Philip, one of the seven acons who was elected to preside with the other over the temporal affairs of the church in Jeruem, went down to Samaria, and the blessing ich followed his labors was a universal turning the Lord. When the apostles at Jerusalem ard of this work of grace they sent unto them ter and John, not to forbid the work because it s not done by the apostles, but to further and nfirm it. "They prayed for them that they ght receive the Holy Ghost," and then only d they their hands upon and they received the oly Ghost.

On their journey back to Jerusalem, Peter and hn could not pass by with indifference the popula-n of the places through which their journey lay—They preached the Gospel in many villages of the maritans." The Spirit of God having come upon e converts in Samaria they no longer needed ilip as a teacher; God had other work for him do, and led him in contact with the Ethiopian nuch; and when he was converted the Spirit of e Lord caught away Philip, who "was found at zotus," and passing through "he preached in all e cities till he came to Cesarea."

In the entire history of Paul's ministry there is e same feature; whether in Damascus, immedi-ely after his conversion (Acts 9 : 20), or at An-ch, when called upon by Barnabas to assist in the eat awakening which began by the labors of me who were "scattered abroad upon the perse-tion that arose about Stephen" (Acts 11 : 26); nether as a missionary chosen and "sent forth the Holy Ghost" (Acts 13 : 2–4); whether in the agogues of the Jews or among the heathen: nether as a free man by the riverside at Philippi cts 16 : 13), or as a prisoner before his judges, estus, Felix, and Agrippa—this was the burden of s soul, "necessity is laid upon me, yea woe is to me if I preach not the Gospel" (1 Cor. : 16). It was no heavy duty to these first disciples our Lord, no heavily imposed obligation, for ey said, "We cannot but speak the things which e have seen and heard" (Acts 4 : 20).

Was zeal such as this intended to die with the st generation of Christians? Are we to look on them as exceptional men, and upon the power God's Spirit in them as an extraordinary endow-ent which God withholds from His children in e present day? God forbid. The Lord Jesus in is last priestly prayer bears upon His heart, not e disciples alone, but "them also which shall lieve on Me through their word; that they all ay be one" (John 17 : 20, 21). The Lord Jesus akes no distinctions among His followers as re-rds the Spirit of power and zeal which is to ani-ate them." These signs shall follow them that lieve: "In my name they shall cast out devils, ey shall speak with new tongues; they shall take serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the ck and they shall recover." In office He made a fference, all were not to be apostles, in responsi-lity to win souls all were to be alike.

Thus in our subject for to-day the Lord addressed Himself, not to the apostles alone, but to the eleven and them that were with them (ver. 33), probably the women and the brethren of Jesus, on whom, in common with the twelve apostles the Holy Ghost came on the day of Pentecost (comp. Acts 1 : 13–15 with 2 : 1–4). And He said to them all, "Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, and ye are witnesses of these things." "Ye," i.e., all the company, not one was exempt. It is the responsibility of every man who has been plucked as a brand from the burning that he pluck others out of the fire. It is the most unpardonable selfishness if a man whose eyes are opened, and who is turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, who has obtained forgiveness of sins and inheritance among all them who are sanctified by faith which is in Christ, if he accept so unspeakable a gift, and yet leaves hundreds of thousands around him to perish. Jesus said, "He that gathereth not with me scattereth" (Matt. 12 : 34).

By the very passing from darkness to light, and from death unto life, at the time of our conversion, all of us who are converted are constituted watchmen of the house of Israel; and this is God's call to us, "When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand" (Eze. 3 : 18, see also to ver. 21).

But in order to bring home the Gospel to others we must first be ourselves permeated with its truths and with its power. The disciples were now in very different circumstances from that time when the Lord had repeatedly sought in vain to make them understand His death and resurrection. His death was now a fact, His resurrection also. Their unbelief, because they had not formerly understood Him, also was a fact; their having forsaken Him, the denial of Peter, all these were facts. And now when "He showed unto them His hands and His feet" and "opened to them the Scriptures," their own need of atonement and His actual risen body present with them, made the whole truth a glorious, precious reality to them, and they could speak now from a deep personal experience of sins forgiven and put away; if ever they knew repentance it was now, but it came with the joy of reconciliation.

His Word and His person, these were the great necessities to fit these first missionaries for their work, and so it must be in all ages for all real preachers of the Gospel. He who will preach without a deep knowledge of the Scriptures will soon find that he has said all he has to say, and will begin to borrow from other men instead of himself drawing water from the wells of salvation (Isa. 12 : 3). The Lord Jesus in opening to them the Scriptures showed them what they were to search for. He said "All things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me." O how full of light is the Old Testament! When we search for Christ we find types of Christ, prophecies of Christ; Christ the Offering and Sacrifice, Christ the Guide in the desert; in Isaac and Joseph, Christ the Son; in David and Solomon, Christ the King; the shadows take substance, and the figures take life when Christ is seen in the Old Testament.

But in order to preach aright the disciples must have the motive power. Jesus said, "Behold I send the promise of my Father upon you; but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." When, through the incoming of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, they became like a well of water springing up unto everlasting life, like rivers of living water, then an irresistible force was urging them. When this force carries a preacher he cannot help preaching, and souls cannot help being conscious that they have to do with another power than that of man. And this power we need, not only for pulpit preaching, but for street preaching, for Sunday-school work, for house to house visitation, in order to be faithful in our own homes; it is the life power of God's children; do we possess it? After His charge to His disciples, the Lord was parted from them, with His hands lifted up in blessing; and surely the act of blessing is left unfinished and He is blessing us still. Let us be faithful to our charge, and carry His message or send His message "to every creature" so far as He enables us, remembering that we "are witnesses of these things."

HOW TWO SUICIDES WERE PREVENTED.

"How it rains! I think I will not go out with my tracts this afternoon," said a gentleman to himself one wet Sunday. Then, retiring from the window, he threw his bundle of tracts upon the table, and, yawning, dropped into his easy chair.

There he sat idly musing while the sacred hours fled. By-and-by his little daughter came in from Sunday-school. Seeing his tracts on the table, she said—

"Why, pa, haven't you been with your tracts?" "No, my dear." "Are you going with them, pa?" "Not to-day, my dear. It is so very wet." "Oh, pa, let me go with them. I've got my bonnet on and can soon take them round." "No, no! It's too wet for any one to go out. We must stay at home, my dear." "I won't get wet, pa. I'll take the big umbrella. The people will want the tracts. Do please let me go, pa."

These and similar pleas conquered the reluctant father. The little girl started. She knew the district and was soon at her work. A few steps led her to a large old house with a big knocker. She rapped again and again, but no one replied. The poor child's patience was almost exhausted when she heard a sound in the house. Another knock, and the door was opened by a woman who wore a good dress, but whose face the little girl thought looked very unhappy. The child smiled upon her, gave her a tract, finished her round, and went home, little thinking that by her walk in the rain that afternoon she had snatched a soul from ruin, and a body from the jaws of death. And yet it was even so; for the woman at whose door she had waited so long was in the act of hanging herself when the child first lifted the knocker. The rope was fastened to the high post of an old-fashioned bedstead, the noose was round her neck, and she was about to launch herself headlong into darkness. The knock disturbed her. She waited. It came again. She waited longer. It came again and again, until to get rid of the annoyance, she slipped the rope over her head, and went to see who might be the disturber. The loving look of the child disarmed her anger. She took the tract, read it, was convinced of sin, led to Christ, and the next Sunday told her joyful story to the little girl's father.

Thus did a little girl's hand armed with a tract pluck a brand from the burning.

Here is another case. A young man having been robbed of a sum of money by the nimble fingers of a gang of gamblers, was bent on putting an end to his own life. While on his way to execute his desperate purpose, a gentleman traveller put a tract into his hand, entitled "On the Worth of the Soul." It startled him, shook his purpose, and, to relieve his distress, he resolved to take a journey. In the carriage he met the giver of the tract, who, though ignorant of his character and purposes, gave him another tract entitled "The Suicide." The coincidence startled the young man, and during a pause in the journey he went to the giver of the tract and in very earnest tones said: "Pray, sir, give me a few more of your tracts, for they have saved my life!" He then gave the foregoing recital of his case, listened to much serious advice, and on parting with the tract distributor gave assurance that he would not neglect the salvation of his soul. Here was another brand plucked from the burning by a tract!

Courage, O laborer, in the field of tract distribution. Who knows but that you too may save souls, and having sown with tears the precious seed, may return again with joy, bringing your sheaves with you?

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Riots, Outrages, and Conflicts with the Police and the military continue to form the staple topic of intelligence from Ireland. In county Cork, serious disturbances occurred at the races, resulting in the arrest of forty-three desperate characters. The entire Skibbereen district is in a state of anarchy. The O'Donoghue and Mr. Warburton, the stipendiary magistrate at Skibbereen, have reported to the Executive that life and property are not safe, and large drafts of constabulary will shortly be despatched there. At Schull the mob wrecked the police barrack and post-office, cut the telegraph wires, and tore up the Cork and Bandon Railway. At Skibbereen the rioters attacked the house of a car owner who had supplied cars to the police, and cut the wires. The bridges have been destroyed or tampered with. The government have now over 30,000 picked soldiers in Ireland, besides the police, who are drilled and armed as soldiers.

An Attempt to Blow Up the Town Hall of Liverpool was made on June 10th. Two men were found sitting on the Town Hall steps, and when the policeman on the beat approached them they fled, leaving a bag containing a length of gas-pipe charged with powder and gun-cotton. The pipe, to which a lighted fuse was attached, exploded a moment afterward on the policeman throwing it into the street, breaking some of the windows in the Town Hall and in the buildings near by. The men were captured and taken to the Central Police Office. On being searched a large sum of money and a revolver were found on each. Both claim to be American citizens. Sir William Harcourt said in the House that they had recently arrived from the United States. They probably belong to the gang known as "the skirmishers," whose aims and methods O'Donovan Rossa recently lauded in a speech at his own house in Brooklyn.

Mr. Gladstone's popularity in England has suffered through this and similar lawless proceedings of the Land Leaguers. It has been recalled to the memory of the public that when Mr. Gladstone was conducting his electoral campaign in Midlothian and denouncing Lord Beaconsfield and his colleagues, he said that the explosion at Clerkenwell Prison in 1867, by which Michael Barrett and his fellow-conspirators killed twelve and lacerated one hundred and twenty innocent people, led up to the Church Disestablishment bill of 1869 and the Land bill of 1870. His opponents now say that in making the statement, he suggested to the Irish agitators a way to obtain fresh concessions.

The French Senate Rejected the Measure known as the Scrutin de Liste on Thursday last by a vote of 148 to 114. This step was unexpected, as it was supposed the Senate would consider the Chamber of Deputies had the right to regulate the methods of its own election. The senators however, occupy a logical position. There is to be a general election shortly, and by rejecting the bill they contend that the question is submitted to the decision of the people, who really constitute the proper tribunal in such a matter. The rejection of the bill is believed to have been caused by the fear that M. Gambetta is intriguing for supreme power. If the Scrutin de Liste became law the candidates would probably be selected by a central committee, which one clever manipulator might subject to his own control. It is feared that this division in the Republican ranks will give an advantage to the Royalists and Imperialists. Gambetta, when he heard the news, said: "The Senate wants to set itself above the Chamber, and fight both me and universal suffrage; so be it. I prefer open war to masked enmity; I was not the first to draw the sword and shall not be the first to sheathe it now that I am thrust, in spite of myself, into the heat of battle."

A Speech Delivered by Mr. Parnell in Hyde Park, London, on Sunday, June 5th, has been recognized in Ireland as the signal for seditious violence, and has been accepted by the government as sufficient evidence of the impossibility of making any compromise whatever with the Land League. He dwelt on the power of combination and the irresistible force of general and united opposition to the government. The irreconcileable attitude assumed by Mr. Parnell and his dupes is at length wearing out the patience of the Liberals, who are the advocates of a policy of mildness and conciliation to Ireland. Even the Spectator, one of the most pronounced organs of the Liberal party, which has advocated a generous Irish policy in season and out of season for years, is discouraged, and exclaims in a wail of despair: "Is it any use even to attempt to benefit a people so irrational?"

The irrationality consists in the fact that if the Irish members of Parliament succeed in their efforts to overthrow Mr. Gladstone's Administration, the government will be confided to the Conservatives, who make no secret of the course they would adopt if called to power. Agrarianism would be summarily stamped out, the League would be suppressed as an illegal organization, public meetings would be prohibited and Leinster, Connaught, and Munster at once placed under martial law. Mr. L. J. Jennings, the well known correspondent in England of the New York World, says: "I heard a prominent Tory exclaim the other day: 'Oh, for a week of Lord Strathnairn at Cork!' His lordship, who was in command of the forces in the Cork district in 1867, when the Fenians of that city marched out fifteen hundred strong, was asked by the authorities to report on the state of his district, and the old 'Bengal tiger,' as the Corkonians dubbed him, briefly replied that he was ready to reduce the city to ashes at a moment's notice and to sweep the county from Youghal to Bantry in two days." That this would be the Tory method of dealing with Ireland their journals frankly avow. The policy of opposition to Mr. Gladstone which must, if successful, issue in a Tory government may, therefore, well be called "irrational."

The Centenary of the Birth of George Stephenson, the originator of railroads, was celebrated in England on June 9th, the chief observance being at his birthplace, near Newcastle-on-Tyne. The day was also celebrated among railway employees in various parts of Europe. There was a procession of railway locomotives, near Newcastle, nearly every railway company in the United Kingdom being represented in the line by its most powerful engine. In the afternoon there was a procession of trade societies to the Town Moor in which 100,000 persons participated.

The Basuto War.—Sir Hercules Robinson, having been asked to mediate between the Basutos and the British Government, has given his award. According to this the Disarmament Law is to be maintained, but any Basuto may retain his rifle by obtaining the sanction of a magistrate, and paying a yearly fee equivalent to five dollars.

A Disastrous Conflagration Raged through the city of Quebec on Wednesday, June 8th, and the following day. Over six hundred and fifty buildings, including the noble church of St. John, were totally destroyed, and five lives are known to have been lost. The fire originated in the stable of a master carter named Lapériere, at the corner of Latourette and St. Marie Streets. The alarm was not promptly given, and the surrounding buildings, being all of wood, rapidly fell a prey to the flames. The firemen being divided into so many bodies, owing to the rapid spread of the flames, lost all control of the conflagration and became quite bewildered. St. Olivier, Latourelle, St. Marc, and Richelieu Streets were quickly a mass of fire for some hundred feet of each in extent, the flames from both sides of the streets overlapping in the middle and completely closing them to all traffic. From Geneviève Street west to the city outskirts nothing has been saved but a few low buildings.

One hour after midnight the clanging of the bells of St. John's Church in rapid and alarming tones told of danger threatening that edifice, and summoned assistance from all who had it to give. The whole efforts of the fire brigade were immediately bent on saving the church, but to no avail. Nothing was saved but the communion vessels and some of the most valuable of the plate and furniture. The fire had possession of the noble structure, and the finest and largest church in the city was doomed to destruction. It was a thrilling sight to witness the angry flames climbing the steeples of the church and to see their fall a few minutes later. The more northerly one of the two was the first to go. It gradually tottered over and then fell right over into the roof of the structure. The other steeple gradually sunk and "telescoped." The church must have been worth at least $100,000. The two bells in one of the steeples cost $6000, and the same amount could hardly have paid for the two organs in the interior.

Daring robbery was carried on during the progress of the fire by the lawless portion of the citizens. Stores and private dwellings attacked by the flames were ransacked for liquor, which was drunk openly by disorderly people. A band of these marauders entered one house while the owner and his family were busy removing the furniture and books. The robbers were ordered to quit the house, but instead of doing so commenced their search for valuables, but the owner shot the leader of the thieves and his followers fled.

When the flames were got under control, a search was commenced for the dead. In one ruined house a charred body was found, almost unrecognizable, but which was eventually discovered to have been that of a gentleman named Hardy. Further search revealed the body of Mrs. Hardy, or all that was left of it Their children had been saved. The body of Charles Marois, a joiner, of Richelieu Street, was also found among the ruins, and soon afterward that of Mrs. Laperierre and her two children, all lying in a heap, as though the mother had made a frantic but unsuccessful effort to save them.

Conflagrations are of Frequent Occurrence in Quebec. In May, 1845, a terrible fire devastated the faubourgs of St. Roche and St. John. Nearly three thousand buildings, most of them constructed of wood, were burned to the ground. About thirty people, aged, infirm, and sick, were known to have perished in the flames. Since then, in 1865, in 1866, in 1870, and in 1876, large fires have occurred, yet in spite of these calamities the authorities do not appear to have organized measures for the protection of the city. An observer says the extent of the present calamity is primarily due to the want of water. The city is supplied with only one main pipe from its source of water-supply ten miles distant at Lorette. The supply is so inefficient that when the city water is turned on at full in one ward it must be turned off in other wards. A delay always thus occurs whenever a fire breaks out in a ward having no water at the time.

Legislative Independence for Ireland has been pressed on the consideration of the English public by a conference recently held in London of English members of Parliament. Mr. Justin McCarthy, whose works are widely read in this country, was one of the speakers, and his address is attracting much attention. He said that what Irishmen most wanted was a domestic Parliament. Ireland, he asserted, would be a willing partner in an imperial parliamentary system, with the right to make her own domestic laws. She had asked for such a system as that which prevailed at present in the great American Republic. He contended that the block of legislation exclusively English, by Irish questions, would necessitate an Irish Parliament to decide Irish subjects. He said his English friends must wait for years without the legislation they required. So long as they attempted to legislate for all the countries of the empire in one Parliament the machinery must be suited to the work. If not great enough, greater machinery must be got and that must be in Legislative independence for Ireland. Thus the separation of England and Ireland, which prophetic students have so long believed would be made, is no longer a subject of scoffing but of serious consideration.

THE REV. C. P. HARD, M.A., B.D.*

Born in 1846—Converted at the Age of Five Years—Graduates at Syracuse—Enters the Ministry—Becomes a Missionary to India—His Arduous and Successful Work There—Failure of his Health—Return to America—His and Mrs. Hard's Popular Lectures on India.

THE Rev. Clark P. Hard was born on the 12th of August, 1846, in Rochester, N. Y., and from his childhood showed a devotion to books. His father, the Rev. Amos Hard, was through a long course of years a faithful and successful evangelist in the Methodist Church, who had no wish or ambition in life beyond serving his Master.

Brought up amid the best associations, Clark was able at a very early age to understand the character of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world; and when five years old, when his conscience had little more than begun to waken, and before he knew what consuming sin and overwhelming temptation were, he intelligently accepted the pardon which God offers, and believed that Jesus Christ, though invisible, was able and willing to be his guide through life. He thus verified the Word of God, where it says, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise."

Young Clark took in with a child's simplicity all he was told about the person of God and the history of Christ, and, before he knew what life was, believed that Jesus was a stand-by for every emergency. In time a knowledge of the world dawned upon him, but his experience never falsified his faith. Now he has reached the prime of life, but he has found that the Ark in which his boyhood took its start can be neither wrecked, nor swamped, nor put out of its course.

This great crisis in every Christian's life—namely, conversion—took place in the case of Clark Hard at a family prayer-meeting on Christmas Day, 1851.

The next event to record in the life of the subject of our sketch was his matriculation and entry upon a college course at the age of thirteen. Five years later he graduated as Master of Arts at Genesee College of the Syracuse University. During that time he made his first essays as a preacher of the Gospel under the M. E. Church.

Having thus early gained distinction as a scholar, and exhibiting other rarer qualifications for the post, he was, more than a year before attaining his majority, appointed Principal of the Western Home of Refuge at Rochester, which had within its walls. He held that important place for one year, and then resigned it to enter upon the duties and responsibilities of a minister of the Church of Christ. He first preached regularly for six months, and having proved himself worthy and passed the usual tests, he received the degree of Bachelor of Divinity at the Garrett Biblical Institute, Chicago. That was in 1867, when Mr. Hard was twenty-one years of age.

Mr. Hard then joined the travelling connexion, and was appointed in succession to the following pastorates: Hornellsville, one year; Corning, three years; Rochester, six months; Cleveland, six months; Castile, two years.

In the beginning of 1874 an important change took place in his life and work. His thoughts and sympathies had for some time been drawn to the state of the heathen in foreign countries, and while he was looking in another direction for an opening to take him among them, the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church asked him to go out to their rapidly widening field in Southern India. He accepted the offer, and in doing so not only resigned prospects that would have been most tempting to a man with a different temperament, but also overcame home affections of too deep a nature to be appropriately described here. Some idea of what the parting from home must have cost him may be conceived from expressions in the letters he received from his parents after arriving in India.

His father wrote: "I don't pretend to tell what it cost me to give you to this work. It seems as though a part of myself were gone. I try to be resigned, and to say but little; but oh, the depth of my loss God only knows! No words can tell our love to you. Much prayer is offered everywhere for you." His mother's words were: "I am trying to be cheerful and happy, but, oh, how I miss you! But it is all for Jesus."

Mr. Hard was never to see his father again in this life. On the 5th of November, 1877, the Rev. Amos Hard fell into a culvert while walking beside the railroad near Corning, New York, and sustained injuries from which he died ten days afterward. He was aged sixty-five years, and had been an earnest and faithful minister of the Gospel for nearly half a century.

ARRIVED IN BOMBAY,

the commercial capital of India, soon after the middle of December, 1874, and crossing the peninsula by a railway journey of 792 miles, he reached Madras, the oldest British possession in India, on the 25th of the same month, the twenty-third anniversary of his conversion. He found the work of the Mission started, but not organized, among a large population of Indo-Britons, speaking the English language and professing the Christian religion, but with so little real godliness that they exerted no influence as a people on the surrounding heathen community. The work was being carried on purely by lay agency, and Mr. Hard was to get no ordained help for a year to come. The Sabbath and week-day services were held in a spacious pandall, such as is much used for public assemblies by the natives of that warm climate. We give on another page an illustration of the identical pandall Mr. Hard used to preach in.

At the end of a week, writing to the superintendent of the Mission, who was in Northern India, Mr. Hard said: "The Lord makes me glad in the work; and has, in the eight days just passed, permitted me to preach eleven sermons, lead five fellowship bands, make pastoral calls four hours per day, see the plan through the press, revise the leaders' books, prepare and write the church register of members and probationers, address three Sunday-schools and one day school, revive the (Methodist) Tract Society, sell some dozens of books, hold one watch-meeting (and arrange for four others), hold three love-feasts, administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper three times, receive twenty-one into full membership, and sixteen on probation out of the twenty who have been converted within these eight days—most of them being men."

Mr. Hard began to study the Tamil language as soon as he arrived in the country, but the impossibility of apportioning a fixed time to the purpose, together with the likelihood that the English field would occupy him fully for several years, caused him to abandon for the time the idea of being a missionary to the Hindoos with which he had left America.

There was no check and no falling off in his work, which steadily grew in extent and stability, till what began as an unorganized circuit, under one pastor, became a great district of including 2 that were independent circuits when Mr. Hard entered upon his work, and embracing the stations along four hundred miles of railway. Five churches were erected before Mr. Hard left the country, and two others have been completed since. There were also nine ordained ministers in charge. Of this district Mr. Hard was appointed presiding elder at the end of 1875. The three circuits within his daily reach contained 332 full members, 68 probationers, and five Sunday-schools, with 600 scholars and 60 teachers, using 350 International Lesson Leaves, and supplied with good libraries and music books—a splendid showing for India.

As may be imagined, this wonderful success was not achieved without a severe strain upon the pastor's nervous energy. A strong man could scarcely have stood the regular neglect of food and rest, and the unremitting activity of mind, while Mr. Hard had not a vigorous frame or constitution. So it happened that when he had been two years at Madras his friends began to see that he must either relax his labors or break down. The former was impossible with his temperament, so, after vainly struggling against weakness for another year, he gave in, and sailed for America, via London, on the 22d of April, 1878, accompanied by his esteemed and truly Christian wife.

The step, however, was not decided upon till it had been rendered imperative by a physician's certificate in these terms: "I hereby certify that the Rev. C. P. Hard is reduced to such a low condition of health that immediate return to his native land is essentially necessary to its restoration. A sojourn of some months on the hills [in India] would and could effect only a temporary improvement; for although Mr. Hard's present low state of health is very much the result of overwork, the extreme nervous depression he presents is characterized by so much impairment of recuperative power as to render the most complete and radical change necessary."

Before his departure a crowded

was given by the members of the congregation. Three addresses were delivered by gentlemen representing the congregation, the official board of the church, and the general public. The speaker on behalf of the congregation, said: "It would be difficult to exaggerate your zeal and self-denial. Like the apostle Paul, you have not accounted your life dear unto yourself, but by precept and constant example have taught us not to live unto ourselves, but unto Him who died and rose again for us." In conclusion he said: "We earnestly pray that God's blessing may be on you, and that He will speedily restore you to your wonted health and strength, and bring you back to labor among us in Madras again."

Enough has been said to show this missionary's complete self-denial and almost constitutional habit of ceaseless work from early morning till late at night. He carried out schemes at Madras which appeared Utopian to experienced men, because he systematically closed his eyes to difficulties and refused to be deterred by failures. Moreover, his restless and fertile brain found openings for new work, and contrived means for organizing it, which with God's blessing were crowned with success.

As a preacher Mr. Hard is always able to draw a full congregation. His style is neither declamatory nor practical, but purely doctrinal and expository. His remarkable success in arousing sinners to repentance is therefore due to his clear statement of Gospel truth and visible earnestness. His flow of speech is marvellous, and his manner of preaching animated. Having acquired the habit of occupying all odd intervals of time in reading, he is able to enrich his sermons with a great variety of matter. No species of work is more Mr. Hard's forte than

SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

There he displays a fund of anecdote and illustration which keeps up the life and attention of the little folks.

He is also a favorite writer for the religious press. He ventured his first contribution at the immature age of seventeen, and not a month, and scarcely a week, has passed since without something from his pen appearing in print. He has written largely for Sunday-school teachers' journals and children's papers, chiefly in communication with his friend Dr. Vincent, the prince of Sunday-school workers. He has also been a contributor to periodicals on the higher life of Christian holiness.

Mr. Hard's health rapidly improved after his return to this country, and he received pressing invitations to give missionary addresses. He responded to as many of them as he was able, and in four months, from June to October, 1878, travelled four thousand miles, and delivered sixty addresses at Thousand Islands and Ocean Grove, at the Cazenovia Sunday-school Assembly, and at several District Conferences and camp-meetings; also in Ithaca, N. Y., where his elder brother, the Rev. Manley Hard, was Presiding Elder, and other towns and cities. Three of these addresses were announced in the Chautauqua Assembly programme as "The Men," "The Women," and

* By B. Aitken, who was a resident in Madras and Bangalore during nearly the whole of Mr. Hard's period of labor there.

James firmly refused, but with glowing gratitude. Green then took out one pound, and throwing it at Graham's feet, affirmed if the latter did not lift it he never should. Graham did lift it; and it helped him on his journey in a direction where his friend assured him he would find work enough. That act of kindness Graham never forgot. It reminded him of the good Samaritan in the Gospel. It helped to redeem human nature, or rather colonial human nature, in his estimation, and taught him to do similar acts to others.

Without stopping more than a night by the way, he went right down through Bathurst county, crossing the head-waters of the Belabula, an affluent of the Lachlan.

AN ADDRESS ON PROPHECY.

By Mr. H. Varley, at the Y. M. C. A., at Aldersgate Street, London.

ON Tuesday, May 24th, Mr. Henry Varley spoke on "The Purpose of the Second Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ in relation to the Church and to the world" at the Young Men's Christian Association Lecture Hall, in Aldersgate Street, London. There was a very large attendance.

Mr. Varley said: The theme of this evening naturally divides itself into two parts. On former occasions I have very clearly shown the truth of the Lord's coming again, and notably by two passages, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus that is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as you have seen Him go into heaven;" and again, "God shall send Jesus Christ which before was preached unto you, whom the heavens must receive until (mark the limit) the time of the restitution of all things."

Is it not time, with Europe simply an armed camp—a pretty issue, indeed of the Christian era, nearly nineteen centuries elapsed—and the great powers glorying in war, and holding banquets to commemorate its triumphs? It is said that within six months ten millions of men can be put upon the battle fields of Europe. A strange outcome of the Gospel dispensation, is it not? We have not yet come to the reign of the Prince of Peace. However men with common sense could think that we have is astonishing to me. When the Prince of Peace was here, the world said He was not fit to live, and they crucified Him; and is He more likely to be tolerated in such a state of society as we see today? Wars will go on to the end. They are the outcome of men's own corruption and sin, the result of their own rejection of Jesus Christ.

It is my wish this evening to show the first purpose of Christ's coming in relation to His Church; the first, as distinguished from His coming to the world. Have you ever noticed the distinction between Christ's coming for His people, and with His people! When He comes for His people, He comes to receive them unto Himself (John 14: 2, 3). Mark this, that when He comes for His people, there is no reference to the wicked dead, or to those who in the world at that time are living without knowing Him (Rev. 20: 4, 5). The spirit of every lost man whose body is dead is in Hades; that is, not in the place of full suffering and punishment, but in a position like that of a man charged by the police but remanded—not sentenced, though suffering meanwhile the loss of liberty, and knowing that the sentence when it comes would be heavier than the remand. Such is the condition of

THE SPIRITS OF THE DEPARTED WICKED.

I am not my body. There is a man living in this body. My head is not talking to you, but the man, and if the man were out of the house I should have greater energy than I have now. The body curtails my energy. You know how often we see people whose spiritual force exhausts the body, and if I were to leave this place by what is called sudden death, and you were to meet me (not my body) a week hence, you would expect to find me (and your expectation is a true one) exactly the same man that I am to-night. Death will make no difference to you. You are not going to cease sinning when you have done with life here. The fact of your going out of the body won't stop the operations of evil. Hence the solemn reality of eternal punishment. It is not the best way of presenting the truth of eternal punishment to say a man suffers for the sins he commits in this present condition. It will be seen in the age to come that if a man continues a sinner, in the necessity of the case punishment must continue; and you have a striking illustration of that in the appeal of Dives, that some one should be sent to warn his relations on earth. Sceptics often say, "No one has come back to tell us;" but, stop, Jesus Christ came back, and the first thing done was to bribe the Roman soldiers to say the disciples stole Him away while they slept." The manner of

TAKING AWAY THE LORD'S PEOPLE.

First of all, it will be a very solemn taking away. It is remarkable that almost every chapter of both epistles to the Thessalonians is about this subject (1 Thess. 1 and last). That is our present position in the world (1 Thess. 2: 19; 1 Thess. 3: 13; 1 Thess. 4: 13). The allusion in this last is to those believers whose bodies are in the grave and who have "fallen asleep." Death is an impossibility to the Christian. I have eternal life now; eternity has begun with me. I don't want the meeting to accept my statements, but I want to challenge and send people to the Bible to know whether what I say is true.

Well, I declare on the authority of this Book that with those who are really regenerate, eternity has really begun. They can no more die than the sun can fall from its place or fail to shine. If they are Christians they are now heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ.

What did Christ say? "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word and believeth on Him that sent me hath everlasting life." How can a man have everlasting life and lose it? It is a contradiction in terms. If a man says he has lost it, it is a clear proof he never had it; "and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life"—not shall pass—not an assize at the end of this life. What the Christian is waiting for is, to be presented without spot, faultless in the presence of the Father's glory with exceeding joy (1 Thess. 4: 14). Absent from the body, they are present with the Lord.

Some of us have lost loved ones, I confess to this day my intense joy and conviction that I should see my own precious mother, who was the means in early boyhood of leading me to value these precious things. She is with God I know, and as surely as Jesus will come she will come, for He has promised it: "Those that have fallen asleep in Jesus, will God bring with Him;" and that which follows shows clearly that there will be many upon the earth when Christ comes, and that His coming will be a time of crisis. Not a word about the wicked, but, "the dead in Christ shall rise first," and then "we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air." This will constitute that the world has ever known, and which will stand unparalleled in the history of the universe—the sudden and immediate resurrection of every one that has fallen asleep in Christ from Abel down to the last that will have died. They will be all changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and then this corruptible, this clay house, will drop off. How? I don't know, but in a moment this corruptible will put on incorruption, and this mortal, immortality, and they will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air. The law of gravitation keeps us here now, but what is gravitation? Attraction to a centre, and Christ is the centre, and the very moment He comes, all that are His will be caught up to meet Him in the air. And the world will be left for a brief space to the bad men and women that are in it. My hearers may ask, "What is that?" to which I reply, "It is a world with not a Christian in it. The light gone, and the salt of the earth withdrawn—a lawless era; and personally, I say I would not be in the world then if you put the world with all its riches at my feet."

What the direful and ever-memorable revolution in France was at the close of the last century, when they did their best to obliterate the name of God, and took an harlot from the stage and put her on the altar in the church of Notre Dame, and bowed down before that almost nude woman (bear with me). "Veil her over," they said, "this is the only god the world knows." Be in Christ before that solemn hour comes, for come it will, as certainly as this book is true.

In support of these statements, I strongly urge you to read Luke 21; Rev. 3: 10, 11, and 1 Cor. 15: 51. In the millennial age death will be scarcely known in the world. Men will live as in the antediluvian period to six, seven, eight, and nine hundred years—a thousand years. The lengthening of human life is one of the blessings identified with the government of our Lord Jesus Christ, but how terrible would longevity be if men's characters were like those of Napoleon I., Alexander the Great, and Robespierre. I have no doubt the limitation of human life after the antediluvian age was just for this reason: God knew, what we know also, that very little change takes place in men's characters after their fortieth year. There is nothing easier than to develop into a state of permanent moral evil. The devil himself is a free agent, but he has lost the last shred of power or desire to be anything different from what he is.

There are many minor details which had better be left open questions. Some, for example, hold strongly that after the Lord has taken His people away, human history will go on in the earth for a short period, certainly not longer than seven years, and some think not more than three and a half. The removal of the Christians is not incompatible with the continuation of the world's history; just as if all present were to go to America, English history would still continue. I am by no means certain that the government of the universe is not delegated to men in unison with Jesus Christ. "Know ye not that the saints shall judge the world." "Know ye not that ye shall judge angels." "Father, the glory which Thou gavest me I have given them." There is not an angel to-day reserved in chains until that final day upon whose sentence Christ's ransomed ones will not be the adjudicators.

Two Brave Firemen were Presented with the Bennett Medal on January 6th in New York. Their names are Bauer and Levins. The heroic deeds which won for them this mark of distinction are still fresh in the memory of the people. Fireman Paul Bauer was at a fire in the buildings Nos. 405 and 407 West Fifteenth Street on the night of December 27th, 1879. He was at the scene before any company arrived and discovered Mrs. Avilla Staniford standing at a third story window with all the means of escape from the flames cut off. A ladder twenty-four feet in length was raised, but it did not reach to the third story. Bauer called upon some men in the crowd for assistance, and by his direction they mounted the stoop with the ladder on their shoulders and held it while he ascended to the topmost round. While in this perilous position he invited Mrs. Staniford to drop into his arms and she was thus rescued. In October last John Levins, of Hook and Ladder Company No. 2, while at a fire at No. 112 Easty Fifty-fifth Street, saved Mary L. Frey from a terrible death. The woman was asleep in a rear room at the breaking out of the fire, and escape by the stairway was cut off before she was aroused. Levins went into the adjoining building and climbing out of a window reached the room in which the woman was. A rope was thrown to him and by this means she was saved. Few who witnessed the action of the fireman expected to see him descend alive.

As Mayor Grace concluded his address and fixed the medals to the breasts of the gallant men two women pressed through the crowd. They were Mrs. Staniford, who was rescued by Bauer, and Mary L. Frey, who had been rescued by Levins. They bore handsome baskets of flowers which they presented to the heroes. It was a touching sight, for the women were acknowledging their debt of gratitude to their preservers. How many ministers of the Gospel and workers for Christ will be welcomed to Heaven with greater demonstrations of gratitude by those whom they have been by God's blessing the means of saving from a far worse fate than death in a burning house.

The Ballots taken Daily last Week at Albany for the United States senatorships gave no indications of a break in the deadlock. The stalwart Republicans and the Democrats continued to vote solid for their candidates, while the efforts to combine the administration vote so as to give to any candidate the number necessary to a choice, ended in failure. During the latter part of the week a boom was raised for ex-Vice-President Wheeler, and he advanced from 16 votes cast for him on Monday to 38 votes on Thursday, after which date the attendance of senators and assemblymen of all parties began to drop off as usual. On Thursday Mr. Wheeler was six votes ahead of Mr. Conkling for the short term, and thirty-four administration votes were scattered—79 being necessary to a choice. For the long term Mr. Depew headed the administration list with 54 votes; Mr. Platt received 27, and twenty votes were scattered; the Democrats being solid for their candidate as in the ballot for the short term. General Grant has arrived in New York from Mexico, and has had several conferences with the ex-senators. It is reported that he will visit Albany this week and exert all the influence he has, on behalf of Messrs. Conkling and Platt.

The Committee Appointed to Investigate the alleged bribery at Albany was in session every day last week. No evidence has been obtained, however, directly proving or disproving the charge brought by Mr. Bradley. Whether Senator Sessions paid the Assemblyman two thousand dollars to change his vote to Mr. Depew, or Mr. Bradley has made himself the agent of a conspiracy to ruin a candidate by making a false charge, still remains undecided, but it is certain that one or other of those alternatives, humiliating as both are, must be a fact. There is no explanation possible which will exculpate both men.

At the interview in the Delavan House where it is alleged the money was paid to the Assemblyman, no witnesses were present, it is therefore evident that the truth can only be discovered through circumstantial evidence. Examination and cross-examination of witnesses has consequently been directed mainly to an effort to cast discredit upon the Senator and Assemblyman. The past record of both has been brought up against them with this object. On the one hand counsel have endeavored to prove from Mr. Bradley's admissions that he is capable of entering into a conspiracy as base as this, and of committing perjury to support it; and on the other they have questioned Senator Sessions with the object of showing that he has on previous occasions been directly or indirectly concerned in paying bribes. On this latter point the Senator admitted that before he attained the dignity of State Senator he was for six or seven years a regular lobbyist at Albany, and that he received large sums of money—$5500 in one case—for "promoting legislation." On being pressed to describe the methods he adopted for promoting legislation, he said that he influenced legislators "by argument" to vote for the measures he was paid to advance. He also acknowledged that both he and Mr. Depew are on intimate terms with Mr. Barber, a well known lobbyist, and that he frequently played at cards for money in his rooms, but he strenuously denied ever having offered a bribe to Mr. Bradley or any one else. An attempt was made to trace the notes in the possession of Speaker Sharpe which Mr. Bradley alleges were paid him as a bribe, and the bankers of Senator Sessions were examined to elicit information as to the checks he had drawn upon them lately, but no testimony was elicited connecting the Senator with the identical notes.

The Resignation of the Hon. J. A. Bentley, Commissioner of Pensions, has been tendered to the President, who has accepted it and appointed to the vacant post Colonel W. W. Dudley, of Indiana. That the resignation was not a voluntary act may be inferred from the ex-commissioner's letter to President Garfield, in which he says, "In compliance with the desire intimated by you at our interview yesterday that I vacate the office of Commissioner of Pensions in order that you may be able to appoint another person to the place, I have the honor to tender my resignation." Mr. Bentley was appointed by General Grant and held office throughout President Hayes's term, but he has latterly been the subject of complaint from the claim agents. It is alleged that he was more intent on protecting the national treasury than in satisfying just claims. The new commissioner, who at present holds office as United States Marshal of Indiana, took an active part in the war, in which he lost one of his legs.

The Changes and Reductions Already Made in the star routes by Postmaster General James, it is now stated will amount to about $1,000,000 a year in the expenses of that class of service. It is said at the Post Office Department that not one single complaint has been received from any quarter affected by these reductions that any necessary postal service or convenience has been taken away. The estimate of last year would, it was anticipated, leave a deficit of $1,376, 642, but if Mr. James's expectations as to the star routes are realized, and other alterations made fulfil his intention, the deficit for the coming year will be little over $200,000.

Where do the Immigrants Come From is a question often asked when strangers visit Castle Garden and see the immense numbers of foreigners arrive there.

The following statistics from the records kept at the Custom House, show the arrivals, by nationalities, during May at this port: Germany, 27,109; Ireland, 13,596; Sweden, 12,563; England, 7797; Norway, 3189; Holland, 2682; Austria, 2599; Scotland, 1697; Italy, 1694; Denmark, 1649; Switzerland, 1509; Poland, 630; France, 544; Hungary, 372; Russia, 218; Wales, 204; Belgium, 164; West Indies, 33; Spain, 31; Canada, 27; Finland, 18; Java, 8; Portugal, Roumania and "born at sea," 6; Malays, 3; South America, 2; Japan, China, and Isle of Man, 1 each; total, 78,359, of which 47,316 were men and boys and 31,043 women and girls.

One of the Most Destructive Tornadoes ever known swept over the Western States on Saturday, June 11th, and the following day. From St. Paul, Minn., and Des Moines, Iowa, distressing reports are sent of the injuries inflicted on crops, houses, and public buildings. A report from Northfield says, The wind blew at the rate of seventy-five miles an hour. The streets in many places were impassable by reason of fallen trees, many of which were fourteen inches in diameter. The steeple of the new Congregational church, which was 119 feet high, was blown down, and the whole building backed six inches out of plumb. The wind blew the windmill belonging to the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul Railroad into a hundred pieces, threw the tank-house about two and a half feet out of plumb, and carried one empty car standing on the side track a distance of twenty-five feet. In portions of Kansas and Missouri the wind raged with almost unexampled fury. In some places many lives were lost, and the tracks of the storms were littered with the fragments of property of all kinds. The hailstones are represented in many places as of the size and shape of door-knobs, weighing over a pound apiece, and covering the ground to the depth of six inches. Physicians from Melvern, Olivet, and Lyndon, are on the ground attending to the injured people, many of whom it is feared will not recover, and hundreds of people are helping to alleviate the general suffering.

The Seminary at Trinity College, N. C., has among its students a young Chinaman, Hann Card Soon, who was born at Icow, Canton, in the year 1863. His father's name was Hann Hong-jack; his mother's Bo-buey. Hong-jack was a ship chandler by trade, and had five children—three boys and two girls.

Accompanied by a young friend, Hann Card arrived at Boston, in 1878. During the fifteen years he lived in China he had never heard the name of Jesus. After a while he went on board the United States Revenue Cutter Colfax, Captain Gabrielson commanding, which was assigned to duty on the coast of North Carolina. The boatswain, Captain Jones, a member of the Fifth Street Methodist Church, Wilmington, N. C., a pious and devout man, became deeply interested in young Hann Card, and often took him to church.

In October, 1880, the Rev. T. Page Ricaud, pastor of the church, preached a sermon at Smithville, thirty miles below Wilmington, when young Hann Card was deeply convicted of sin, and presented himself as a subject for prayer. In the following month Hann Card was converted at Wilmington, and was baptized by Mr. Ricaud, and took the name of Charles Jones Soon. On Sunday, the 10th of April, 1881, the case of the young man was laid before the Trinity Methodist Sunday School, at Durham, N. C., by the Superintendent, Mr. J. S. Carr, with the suggestion that the School establish at Trinity College a scholarship to be known as the "Marvin Scholarship," and that Hann Card be placed there and properly educated, with the understanding that he would return to China as a missionary from the M. E. Church South. In about fifteen minutes the School had adopted the suggestion and raised the necessary fund, and now Hann Card is a student of the College. May He that is able to keep him from falling prosper him in his course and spare him to become a true missionary to his own countrymen.

Citizens of all Political Parties Will be pleased to learn that Mrs. Garfield is recovering rapidly. She dined at the family table on Sunday, June 12th, for the first time since her illness began. The President and his family expect to spend the next few weeks at Long Branch, where it is hoped that the sea air will impart to the lady, now happily convalescent, renewed strength and vigor.

Mr. Tom Hughes's English Colony in Tennessee has now a contemporary in Iowa. Mr. Close, representing some English capitalists, bought 10,000 acres of land, divided it into farms of 160 acres each, brought tenants from England, and now has it all under tillage. "Our system," Mr. Close says, "is not to hold virgin land on the chance of a rise in value, but, by building houses and ploughing the sod, to improve the property we buy and make it productive of income, wherein we conceive lies the distinction between legitimate business and speculation in land. Each 160 acres is let, as a rule, to one tenant, who provides labor and machinery, paying us rent for wheat lands in kind, on the half-share system, and for Indian corn lands at about $2 per acre. The tenant's own labor, with one assistant, usually a son, is enough, except at harvest time, to cultivate 160 acres, if divided between wheat and Indian corn.

A Suit which Deserves the Attention of trades unions, and may have an important influence on the tyrannical proceedings of some of those societies has been instituted. The wife of a puddler in Pittsburg has turned the tables on a trades union there, by bringing a suit against its officers for driving him from a situation because he did not belong to their union.

A Liquor Dealers' Trick Frustrated.—Eleven saloon-keepers in Constable Hook, a section of Bayonne, have been unable to procure licenses because there were not a sufficient number of property-owners to sign their applications, each application requiring ten signatures, and no property owner being permitted to sign more than one application. An ingenious scheme was hit upon to surmount the difficulty. John Van Buskirk, an ex-councilman, who owns a large amount of property in that section, transferred two acres to his son, and he transferred the two acres to 108 persons, taking mortgages for the full value of the property. This enabled every applicant for a license to get the necessary number of signatures. The plan did not work, however, for the City Council decided that property acquired in that way did not constitute the nominal owner a freeholder in the sense required by the law.

Leprosy in the United States.—The Annual report of the Louisiana Board of Health recently issued, contains a report of the progress of Asiatic leprosy in that State during the last century. In the Hospital for Lepers, at New Orleans, the majority of the inmates are white, of French, Russian, and German extraction, although in 1780 the only sufferers known, were colored people who had either been brought from the West Indies or were descended from those who had come from there. The President of the Board of Health has made a personal investigation into the extent of this disease, even venturing into the deathly swamps of the lower Bayou Lafourche. This whole district, he states, is several feet lower than the turbid bayou, sloping back into cypress swamps, liable to constant overflow from crevasses. He found Asiatic leprosy existing in different generations of six families. Some of these wretched creatures have been driven out from human habitation, and are living apart in the swamps, dying of decay. In some instances their flesh has become as insensible as bone, and they were able to handle fire with impunity. It was impossible to make a correct estimate of their numbers, as a rumor spread among them that the searching party had come to carry them off to an uninhabited island of the sea, and they hid themselves, their friends, too, refusing to tell their names or number.

The Return of a Long Lost Son Gladdened a home in Gloucester, Me., a few days ago. Eleven years ago a young man left Lewiston, Me., for the West, and since then no tidings of him had been received. Recently a gentleman arrived at a Lewiston hotel who said he came from Leadville, and stated that he formerly lived in Lewiston city. Making inquiries about his people, he found that they had removed to Gloucester. Hiring a team he drove to that town and found his father's house, and, without informing him who he was, inquired if he might stay to dinner. At dinner he drew his father into conversation. He asked his father about his son who had gone to Leadville. The old man replied with tears in his eyes, that he supposed George was dead, as he left for the West eleven years ago, and since then he had never been heard from. The scene can be imagined when the stranger said: "No, he isn't dead, father." Christ tells us that such joy as that father manifested is occasioned in Heaven when one sinner repents (Luke 15 : 7).

A Heart-Breaking Cable Message was Despatched to Scotland from New York on Saturday last. It was addressed to an aged couple living near Glasgow, and it contained the intelligence that John Arnott, their beloved son, twenty-seven years old, who landed in this city June 8th, had committed suicide at Earle's Hotel, where he boarded. Since the day of his arrival he had been drinking heavily, spending the greater part of his time in his room in a drunken stupor. Being denied liquor in the hotel, he took it to his room in a bottle from the nearest bar-room. On Friday he was found dead in his room with his throat cut. A farewell letter was found directed to "my dear son, John Arnott, on his leaving for America, signed by both his parents, which made it plain that the suicide, having led a riotous life in Scotland, and emigrated to make a future for himself in this country. The letter was full of encouraging wishes for the success of his effort. The father and mother said that they freely forgave him. Another letter, signed "your ever true and loving Bella," was from the suicide's affianced bride. "I will count the weeks and months till you return," she wrote; "but O John! take care of yourself, for I think that if anything should befall you now it would kill me. No one will pray more earnestly for your success than I will."

The young man must have had some good qualities or he would not have been so patiently and tenderly loved, but he had become a slave to Satan, who held him in one of his most potent bonds. His fate should be a warning to those who are commencing a similar evil course. How God regards the son who breaks his parents' heart by vicious habits may be inferred from the fact that under the Mosaic law he would have been publicly executed (Deut. 20 : 19–21).

An Ohio Minister's Song in Prison Recently, gave evidence of the power of the Gospel to sustain the Christian under very distressing circumstances. The Rev. Benjamin F. Leonard, an aged local minister of Caldwell, O., was put in jail on Saturday night by United States Marshal Miller, of Columbus, on a charge of perjury in procuring a pension seventeen years ago. The old minister spent the entire Sabbath day in a happy mood, praying, reading his Bible, and singing in his cell. Later an affidavit signed by his army surgeon, Dr. Cotton, of Marietta, Ohio, was received, fully establishing the aged clergyman's innocence of the charge, and the feeling of sympathy already evoked among his flock changed to one of intense indignation against the Marshal.

A Fall from the Window of a Theatre caused the death of a young man in Brooklyn last week. He occupied a back seat in the gallery of the Broadway Theatre on June 13th, and during the performance he was seen to fall backward through a window which had been opened on account of the heat. He died the next morning from his injuries. The cause of his fall was not elicited at the coroner's inquest, but it was supposed that he was flung through the window in the course of a scuffle which occurred near where he was sitting. The awful solemnity of death seems increased by the circumstances of this young man's end. To be summoned from such a scene to give an account of himself to God is a situation terrible beyond description. As we think of it we realize the truth of the inspired words (Eccles. 7 : 4).

The Morgue is Recommended as a Preacher whose voice ought to command attention, in an editorial in one of our secular contemporaries. It says, "By far the strongest temperance lecture of the season is the statement made by the keeper of the Morgue that four-fifths of the five thousand bodies that reach the city dead house every year are sent there by drunkenness. The jolly fellows who make fun of the anti-liquor agitation as they stand at bars and drink good old whiskey—for of course no other kind is sold—know only the beginnings of what rum can do; but the rough pine boxes, filled with what once was clear-headed, bright-eyed humanity, are just as directly the work of drink as bar room fun is. There may be cities in the world where men can drink spirits without injury to body and brain, but New York is not one of them. In a city where everybody, from the millionaire to the day laborer, is being continually impelled to begin more work than he can finish, whatever increases physical or mental excitement is a positive curse."

A Sum of Money as well as Direction was received in answer to prayer in this city recently. A Christian man was appl ed to for a loan by a friend whose necessities were pressing. The Christian had a sum of money in his possession sufficient for the purpose, but which he had laid aside to meet a payment of his own. He was anxious to assist his friend, but timid at incurring the risk on account of his own liability. As he sought guidance from God he felt that he had received the needed direction in the portions of Scripture which were impressed on his mind after praying. He gave the money, and that very day received twice as much from one who had owed it to him for six years, and whose debt he had considered bad.

THE JUDGMENT SEAT OF GOD.

"But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ. For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God."—ROMANS 14 : 10–12.

An Argument for Christ's Divinity—Why Paul Wrote of Judgment—A too Common Habit—Judging Each Other, a Frivolous Amusement—Unnatural—Anticipatory—An Intrusion—It is Needless—Unprofitable—The Tribe of the Danites—Why Omitted in the Apocalyptic List—The Judgment to Come—I. NO doubt there is an error in our version, for where in the tenth verse we read, "the judgment seat of Christ," it should be "the judgment seat of God." I suppose the word "Christ" slipped into certain manuscripts because Paul had been speaking of Christ, and it was thought to be natural that he should continue to use the same name. Paul did not say "Christ," but "God," but by that word he meant the same person. Paul knew that Christ is God, and when he was speaking of Christ it was no deviation from the subject for him to speak concerning him under the title of "God." It was necessary here for him to use the word "God," because he was about to quote from the Old Testament Scripture a passage which speaks concerning the sovereignty of God, which is to be acknowledged and confessed by all mankind. The passage runs, "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of God; for it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. So, then, every one of us shall give account of himself to God."

I beg you to notice how strongly this passage goes to prove the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ; because the whole run of the passage is concerning Christ. "To this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living." And then the apostle immediately, without any break in the sense whatever, speaks of God, because he was speaking of the same person, and he quotes a passage which relates to God Himself, and uses it as relating to Christ. It does, indeed, relate to our Lord Jesus Christ, for He is "very God of very God," and God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ.

The doctrine of eternal judgment, upon which I shall speak this morning, is introduced to us for a certain reason. Paul saw among Christians of judging one another. I suppose if Paul were to come among us now he would not see any remarkable difference upon that point. Just then the bulk of the converts were Jews, and as such they brought into the Christian Church their former religious habits; those men who had devoutly kept the ceremonial law felt as if they would violate their consciences if they did not continue to keep its more prominent precepts; and though they gave up certain of its observances which were evidently abolished by the Gospel, they kept up others, such as special days for religious fasts and feasts.

At the same time the church had in her midst men who said, and said correctly, "The coming of Christ has done away with the old dispensation; these holy days are all types and shadows whose substance is in Christ. Has not the Lord shown to Peter, who is the minister of the circumcision, that henceforth nothing is common or unclean?" The men of strong faith blamed their weaker brethren for being superstitious, and by their superstition bringing a yoke of bondage upon themselves. "No," replied the weaker sort, "we were not superstitious; we are conscientious, while you go much too far in your liberty, and cause us to stumble." Thus while the strong looked down upon the weak, almost doubting whether they could have come into the liberty of Christ at all, the weak condemned the strong, almost charging them with turning their liberty into license. They were both wrong, for they were judging one another.

Paul, who was himself most strongly opposed to the Judaizing party, and in every respect came out clear and straight upon the bold lines of Christian liberty, was, nevertheless, so actuated by the spirit of his Master that he was ready to be all things to all men, and seeing grave peril of dissension where all should be love, he rushed into the breach, and he said, "Do not judge one another: what have ye to do with judging? There is a judgment yet to come." He mentioned the future judgment on purpose that by its powerful influence upon their minds they might be taken away from the frivolous amusement, for it does not come to much more—the frivolous amusement, the mischievous meddlesomeness of judging one another, when already the Judge is at the door.

Let us linger a minute over this practical point, and see how Paul rebukes the spirit of judging one another. First, he says in effect that it is unnatural. "Why dost thou judge thy brother? Why dost thou set at nought thy brother? He whom thou judgest or despisest is thy brother. Thou hast called the weak one superstitious, but he is thy brother: thou hast called the strong man licentious because he enjoys his liberty; but he is thy brother." If we must needs judge, certainly it should not be those who are linked to us by the ties of spiritual relationship. Are not all believers one family in Christ?

This judging among Christians, then, is, first of all, unnatural; and, next, it is an anticipation of the judgment day. There is to come a day when men shall be judged—judged after a better fashion than you and I can judge. How dare we, then, travesty God's great assize by ourselves mounting the throne and pretending to rehearse the solemn transactions of that tremendous hour? Judgment will come soon enough: may the Lord have mercy upon us in that day. My brother, why needest thou hurry it on by thyself ascending the throne?

CANNOT GOD DO HIS OWN WORK?

"Vengeance is mine: I will repay," saith the Lord.

Moreover, we not only anticipate the judgment, but we impudently intrude ourselves into the office and prerogative of Christ when we condemn the saints. "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ:" that is the true throne of judgment. How many times I have had to appear before the judgment seat of my fellow-men! Sometimes one's motives are impugned; another time one's actions, or mode of speech, or way of managing church affairs. Well, it is a small matter for us to appear before men's judgment seat: we may very well refuse to put in an appearance at all, for man is not our master, and we are not bound to answer to his summons.

Why is it that so many brethren seem to think that they are masters, and have a right to judge the Lord's servants? I know some Christians who not only form judgments, and very severe judgments, upon all that are round about them as to the facts that come under their notice; but they, also, without any facts whatever, conceive notions concerning persons whom they have never seen, and are full of obstinate prejudices against them. Many twist words into meanings which they were never intended to mean by the person who used them; and others, even without so much as the excuse of misunderstanding words, sit down and imagine evil against their brethren. They dream that they are slighted, and then hard judgments follow. Once imagine that you are badly treated, and then you will think that everything is done out of spite to you, and the next thing is to think spitefully of others.

There are persons about who are liberally gifted in the line of gossip, who by their talk would make you think you were living in Sodom and Gomorrah, if not in Tophet. You are made to fear that every one you have trusted is a vile deceiver, that every man who is zealous is mercenary, that every minister is preaching in public what he secretly disbelieves, that every generous subscriber only gives out of pride; that, in fact, you are living in a place where the race of Judas Iscariot is to be seen, reproduced ten thousand times over. One goes to bed and cannot sleep after talking to these talebearers. The consolation is that there is no truth in their wonderful discoveries. These slanderous statements are a base burlesque of judgment, and nothing more.

The apostle argues strongly against this evil spirit of censoriousness in the Christian Church; and to give to it he says, "It is all needless; you need not judge one another, for both your brother and yourself will stand before the judgment seat of God. There is no need of your condemnation, for if any man be worthless the judge will condemn him: you may not interfere with the business of the great Supreme; he will manage the affairs of men far better than you can."

Yet more, your judgment is unprofitable: you would spend your time much more profitably if you would recollect that you also who can be so exact and severe in pointing out this fault here, and the other fault there, will be yourselves examined by an unerring eye. Your own account books have to be sent in, and to be examined item by item; therefore look well to your own matters. So the apostle winds up by saying, according to the most forcible rendering of the original, "We must each one of us give an account of himself to God,"

Brothers, sisters, I bring these truths before you because they are meant for brothers in Christ, and not so much for the outside world. It is to those who have faith, and are in the family of love, that the word of warning is given that we do not judge, and to us the argument is addressed that we shall each one give an account for himself to God.

I read the other day, in an interesting pamphlet upon the Apocalypse, a note which furnishes me with an illustration. The writer endeavors to explain why the tribe of Dan is not mentioned in the Book of Revelation as having its chosen twelve thousand. All the other tribes are there, but Dan is missed, and Manasseh is put in his place. The author says it is because Dan signifies "judgment," or "one that judges." He says: "These 'judges of evil thoughts' have been sad troublers in Israel in all ages; not fearing to judge their brother and set at nought their brother, they have judged everything and everybody but themselves. And so in the place of Dan, The Judge, we get Manasses, One who forgets, one who, though cast off by his brethren, forgets and forgives their injuries, and we account it a good exchange; and in the New Jerusalem home, where failure will be no more, Dan, 'a serpent in the way,' or 'a lion's whelp,' would be as much out of work as out of place." If any of the Danites hear or read this, let them pray for grace to change their habits and natures.

I. Now I come to the doctrine itself, the solemn doctrine of judgment to come. May God make it impressive to our hearts. Our thoughts are now directed to the future judgment, and we notice concerning it, first, that

THE JUDGMENT WILL BE UNIVERSAL.

"For we shall all stand before the judgment seat of God."

The man of one and the man of ten talents must alike be reckoned with. Weak Christians are exempted from many trials by the gentleness of God, but not from the ultimate trial, for we shall each one of us give an account of himself unto God: the strong and the weak. The men who bore office in the church will have to answer for it, even as saith the apostle Paul, in Hebrews 13:17, "They watch for your souls, as they that must give an account." And again, "It is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful: he that judgeth me is the Lord." I could on bended knees ask your pity for myself, having to minister to so large a congregation, and with so much larger a congregation outside to whom I weekly minister through the press. Ah me, who is sufficient for these things? Who shall be found faithful in such a position?

I think all ministers might with tears in their eyes cry to you, "Brethren, pray for us." It will be the height of my ambition to be clear of the blood of all men. If, like George Fox, I can say, in dying, "I am clear, I am clear," that were almost all the heaven I could wish for. Oh to discharge one's ministry aright, and to be able to render an account like that of Paul, who said, "I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith." This is my soul's longing.

What a motley throng will gather at that assize, of all nations and peoples and tongues! Persons of all ages, too. You boys and girls, and you who have lived through a long life. Kings and princes will be there to give in their weighty account, and senators and judges to answer to their judge; and then the multitude of the poor and needy, and those that live neglecting God, and forgetful of their souls—they must all be there. It is a universal judgment.

Saints and sinners too, only on what a different footing, are all to be judged out of the books, and out of the Book of Life. Thus saith the word of the Lord: "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in His body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." To the saints the judgment of the things done shall be according to righteousness, for these things shall be taken in evidence that they were indeed reconciled to God. The Judge will say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from before the foundations of the world." And then shall come the evidence: "For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; thirsty, and ye gave me drink," and so on. These fruits shall be the evidence that they were in Christ, the evidence of their being justified by faith; while on the other hand the sour and bitter fruit of the ungodly shall be an evidence that they were not planted of the Lord: "I was an hungered, and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; sick and in prison, and ye did not minister unto me."

We need have no fear of the judgment to come when we know that we are in Christ, for who fears to enter a just court when he knows that by the highest authority he has already been cleared? How complete the Christian's safety! For there will be no accuser. So bright will be the righteousness of a saint through faith that no accuser will appear. Hark, the herald gives forth the challenge! "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" All through the court it rings; and God is there—the faithful and all-seeing God. Does He lay anything to their charge? Far from it. "It is God that justifieth." Who, then, need fear to enter the court when every accusation is silenced and a reward is expected?

Ah, how unwillingly will rebels come before that throne! Pharaoh! you must see a greater than Moses. Herod! you must see the young child upon his throne. Judas! you hanged yourself to escape the judgment of your conscience, but by no means can you escape the judgment of your God. Though four thousand years have elapsed since men died, and their bodies may have melted quite away, yet when the trumpet ringeth out clear and shrill their bodies shall live again, and they must all come forth, each one to answer for himself at that grand assize before the Judge of all the earth, who must do right with each of them. Let us, then, bow before the solemn truth that God hath appointed a day in which He will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained.

II. The second truth, which we must make as prominent as ever we can, is that for each one. This is the pith of what the apostle is saying: "So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God." The judgment will not proceed in a rough, indiscriminate manner, as upon a race or tribe, but each man will have to stand apart, and the account reckoned will not be of a family or a band, but of each individually for himself. Note this carefully, O men: We shall have to give an account each man for his own actions, for his own thought, for his own words, for his own intention; nay, not only of that, but of himself. We shall each man have to give account of the state of his own heart, of the condition of his mind before God, whether he repented, whether he believed, whether he loved God, whether he was zealous, whether he was truthful, whether he was faithful. If it only dealt with actions, words, and thoughts, the account would be solemn enough, but we must each one give an account of himself, of what he was as well as what he did, of what was in his heart as well as of that which came out of it in his deeds. Oh, what a trial will this be!

We shall then have to give an account of our judgments of others. We shall not have to answer for what they did, but for our daring to judge and condemn them. Did you ever think of this, you that judge others, that you are laying down the standard by which you will have to be judged yourselves? I generally find that those who are most severe toward others need and often expect great leniency toward themselves, but it will not be so at the last, for thus it is written: "With what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged." How easy it will be to judge the fault-finding at the judgment day. The Judge will only have to say, "They have already condemned themselves: they have condemned their own faults as they saw them in others; they have used the sharpest judgments against less faults than their own; out of their own mouth let them take the sentence and depart." You will have to render no account for other people, but you will have to render an account of yourself and how you judged other people. The last account will be wholly personal; therefore see ye to it.

That account will, according to my text, have connected with it full submission. "As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me." You may to-day say, "I do not care about God:" you will have to care about Him. As truly as God lives you will have to bow. You may say, "What matters it to me what Scripture says?" It will matter to you, as certainly as God lives, which is putting it on the most solemn certainty that can be. God has taken an oath about it, and declares that you shall own His sway.

YOU HAD BETTER BEND AT ONCE, for you must either break or bow. God means to have His sovereignty acknowledged by all mankind.

Next, you will have to confess; so the text saith. By this I understand that you will have to acknowledge that God is your Lord and Master, and had a right to your services; that you ought to have kept His law; that in sinning you have done unrighteously, and acted as you ought not to have acted. That confession you will not be able to withhold.

When God pronounces sentence, and the ungodly are sent down to hell, they will give their own assent to His righteousness in condemning and punishing them. The verdict of the castaways in hell is that they deserve it; and this is, indeed, the hell of hell, that they cannot deny the justice of those pains which come upon them as the result of their disobedience. God will see to it that we shall justify Him either in life or in death, by confessing that He is righteous.

I appeal to you, my dear hearers, whether you are ready with your account which you will have to render to God: have you kept one at all? Sometimes when men appear before a court they plead that they have no books, and it is always a bad sign. You know what the judge thinks of him. Can you dare to examine yourself, and answer questions? Can you give an account of your stewardship? Have you kept it correctly, or have you credited yourself with large things where you ought to have debited yourself? Your fraud will be discovered, for the great Accountant will read it through, and will detect an error in a single moment. Is your account kept correctly, and are you ready to render it in at this moment? Christian brother, you and I might hold back a little before we could say, "Ay" to that, and yet I trust we could say it, for we know ourselves to be accepted with God.

As for those who have scarcely thought of their God, their Maker, what will they do? what can they do, when each one of them must give an account before God, and they have no account except that which will condemn them for having wasted their Master's goods for having defrauded the eternal God of that which was justly His due, and having spent upon their lusts that which ought to have been dedicated to their God? This judgment, then, will be personal. You cannot put your godly mother into the scale with yourself; you cannot associate your dear old father with yourself in judgment. O children, you cannot be judged by your ancestry, but by your acts; for it is written: "The Son of man shall come in the glory of His Father with His angels; and then He shall reward every man according to his works." Oh, see ye to it; God help you to do so.

III. Thirdly,

THIS JUDGMENT WILL BE DIVINE.

"We shall stand before the judgment seat of God." The judgment will be universal, personal, divine; and because it is the judgment seat of God, it will be a judgment according to truth. God will make no mistakes: He will not impute any wrong to us undeservedly, and He will not give us credit for right because we bore the appearance of it. He will search to the very core and essence of the matter.

Are you ready to be tried as by fire? Trial by fire is but a scanty figure of trial by the searching eye of the Most High God. He will test us by the supreme standard of perfect justice. We judge by one another, and if we are as liberal, or as prayerful, or as gracious as others, we consider that it is all right. But the balances of the sanctuary are far more exact. It will not be you in one scale and I in another; and if I am as gracious as you, we shall both be accepted. Ah, no; there is another standard than that, the standard of truth and grace in the heart, and real love to God, and conformity to the image of Christ. Judge ye whether ye can stand that test.

That judgment will be most searching. "The Lord pondereth the hearts." He will not judge after the sight of the eyes, but search out our secrets. Then shall the foundations be tested, then shall all that the man rested on and stayed himself upon be tried, whether it be the Rock of Ages or whether it be the mere sand of presumption. There will be no such trial day before or after as that day of the assize of God.

That judgment will be impartial. You and I are always partial in weighing ourselves. We generally give the most lenient verdict except when we happen to be despondent in spirit, and then we are morbidly sensitive. But God will judge us without partiality. Rich friend, that diamond ring will answer no purpose in that day; my ladies, those fine garments will make no impression in that court. My learned friend, that handle to your name will be of no avail; and you, fine sir, with your knighthood, earldom, or dukedom, will be none the better off; for coronets, and even imperial crowns all go for nothing before the throne of God, who is no respecter of persons.

This judgment will be final. The sentence of the Supreme Court will settle all. Doth He say, "Depart ye cursed"? They can do no other. Doth He say, "Come ye blessed"? Oh, how blessed to enter into the eternal home. May none of you ever hear Him say, "Depart"; for He will never reverse the sentence: you will have to depart, and keep on departing, going farther, farther, and farther away from Him who is hope and life and joy. There is no hope held out that He shall ever say, "Come back again, ye cursed;" but no, "Depart into everlasting fire in hell." God save us from such an ultimatum as that.

At the last judgment

CERTAIN SINS WILL PROVE TO BE OF HEAVY WEIGHT.

I will do no more than mention a few of them. There is one that is never treated leniently by any judge: it is contempt of court. God will speedily condemn those who have despised His authority. Are there any such here who have despised the Lord their God, and set at nought His counsel? They seldom or never think of God or His law, or even regard His day; but they say, "Who is the Lord that we should obey His voice?" Beware, ye despisers, and wonder and perish, for the Lord our God is jealous of His great name, and He hears the voices of them that scoff at Him.

Rejection of mercy is also a high crime and misdemeanor. The Judge who shall sit upon the throne has already presented mercy to all of you, and the unconverted among you have refused it. Surely they deserve the deepest hell who slight eternal love. If the Judge can say, "The prisoner at the bar has had the glad tidings of forgiveness presented to him, but has refused to listen to the gracious message, or having listened, and being almost persuaded, he nevertheless put it off to a more convenient time, and here he stands a trampler on the blood of Christ." This sin will be a millstone about the soul forever.

Then there is the crime of wilful, deliberate sinning, with intent so to do. Have any of you been guilty of this fact, and have you not fled to Christ? Did you choose sin, knowing it to be sin? Are you still choosing sin, and living in it against the voice of conscience? Ah, believe me, sin repeated, sin continued in will bring swift and sure destruction. These sins go beforehand to judgment, and there lodge solemn plaints against the guilty.

I cannot close amid these clouds. Break forth, O sun! Turn to the passage from which Paul quoted; for there you shall hear a sweet gospel word which may fitly end my discourse. Paul's mind was at Isaiah 45:23. He did not quote the words literally, but he gave the sense. Here is the passage: "Surely I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear." Now, what words do you think come before these? You shall look for yourselves I will wait while you open your Bibles. Do you see the blessed lines? God declares that every man shall bow before Him, and confess His authority; but what word of exhortation stands before that oath of His? I wish I could make it flash out at this moment in letters of light right round the building: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else."

stands side by side with the judgment prophecy.

Come, then, dear hearts, you that are guilty, come and bow before your God ere He ascends the throne of judgment. Come and do willingly what you will have to do by and by unwillingly. Come now, and confess that He is Judge and ought to be honored; confess that He is King and ought to be obeyed; confess that you are His subject, and are bound to serve Him; confess that you have done wrong, grievous wrong, in having broken His law; come and make out your own indictment; come and be your own accuser; come and condemn yourself; come and bow your head when God's law condemns you; come and own that you deserve divine wrath, and submit yourself to the Lord's justice.

Then give another look to your God and Saviour and say, "My Lord, I know thou art my Judge; but thou art also my Redeemer; I accept the place of condemnation, but I see that thou didst stand there in my behalf, the just for the unjust, my substitute, bearing my sin and punishment. Blessed Lord, I accept thee as my substitute; I yield myself up to thee; I stand now tried, condemned, punished, dead, raised again in thee, and therefore pardoned, acquitted, justified, beloved, accepted for Jesus' sake." Oh, is not this a blessed ending to a solemn sermon?

> "Bold shall I stand in that great day,
> For who aught to my charge shall lay?
> While through thy blood absolved I am
> From sin's tremendous curse and shame."

God bless you. Amen.

REV. CHARLES SPURGEON.

His Birth and Early Education — His Conversion — His First Evangelistic Work in Chatham Road, Wandsworth Common— He Enters the Pastors' College —Called to be a Pastor at Greenwich.

THE Rev. Charles Spurgeon, one of the twin sons of Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, was united in marriage to Miss S. A. Jacob, on April 11th. He was born in Nightingale Lane, Balham, near London, on September 20th, 1856. Thomas, the other twin son, is now on a second visit to Australia for three years for the benefit of his health.

Mr. Spurgeon.

Mrs. Spurgeon.

Charles Spurgeon was educated at Camden House School, Brighton. Here he was noted as a cricketer, and one of the most active in every sport. He acquitted himself honorably in the scholastic department, and succeeded in obtaining some handsome prizes.

After a creditable course of study, school was quitted by the brothers in 1874. They returned to Balham, and prepared for the great business of life. Here their pathways, which had hitherto run from infancy in the same direction, began to diverge. Thomas adopted art as his profession, and attained some considerable proficiency in engraving; while Charles, whose perseverance was combined with a firm will, entered the office of a city shipping firm.

Charles Spurgeon's conversion took place under the following circumstances. He was riding a blind pony, and was accompanied by a Christian friend, when their conversation turned into a religious channel. Rain came on, and they sought shelter under a tree. Charles dismounted, and they both knelt down upon the grass, while his friend offered up a prayer. It was during this short season of communion that the glorious sunshine of truth broke in upon his young heart, and his warm affections and services were henceforth devoted to the Lord. This was the turning-point to which his religious and prayerful home-training had long been leading up.

The cry raised from Macedonia, long ages past, "Come over and help us," was raised from a little mission in the densely populated neighborhood of Chatham Road, Wandsworth Common, and reached Nightingale Lane, where it was readily responded to by the twin brothers.

They visited this place and found that meetings were being held in the cottage of a gardener, Mr. Rides, who was somewhat at a loss to find speakers. Here they labored together, and soon the project of erecting a chapel, formed originally by Mr. Rides, was taken in hand by the two brothers. It was nearly completed when ill-health compelled Mr. Thomas Spurgeon to sail for Australia.

Left to pursue this work alone, Mr. Charles Spurgeon felt the increase of labor it entailed. He was then in business, and besides the services on Sunday he held two and often three, week-night meetings. At last the commodious and comfortable building now in use was finished, and duly opened by a sermon preached within its walls by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. The labors of his son Charles were thus augmented. He had the sole care of this chapel; the only assistance he received being that rendered by a young friend in some minor affairs.

Although his father never sought to persuade him to become a preacher, doubtless it was an answer to many prayers breathed by the parents when Charles felt constrained to withdraw from commercial pursuits, to enter the Pastors' College, with a view to the ministry, in 1877.

Here, on account of his superior education, he speedily became one of the first scholars, adding to the Latin and Greek in which he was already proficient, Hebrew and general theological studies.

In the meanwhile it became evident that he was pre-eminently suited for a wider sphere of Gospel work than that of Chatham Road Chapel. The congregations could not be large in so small a chapel; and although he did not use long words or eloquent similes which were above the intellectual capacities of his hearers, yet his sermons were manifestly suited for a more educated class. Occasionally he had preached sermons in different parts of England, which were attended with great success, very many souls being converted. Among other places he visited were Cambridge, Oxford, Isle of Wight, and several of the large manufacturing towns.

In 1879 he received a call from the congregation at South Street, Greenwich. He had preached there once or twice, and at each service the commodious structure was crowded. The call was, after prayerful deliberation, accepted, and Mr. Charles Spurgeon entered upon his first pastorate there at the age of twenty-three.

The church to which he was called had relapsed into a lukewarm and indifferent state, the numbers being few and no pastor at its head. These difficulties Mr. Charles Spurgeon saw and grappled with. The battle against indifference was gained, and he has been greatly blessed by the Holy Spirit to the salvation of many souls in Greenwich. The building, which was almost empty, is now filled with nearly a thousand hearers. A debt of £1000 which incumbered the chapel has been paid off, and the church rejoices in many tokens of spiritual prosperity.

MRS. C. SPURGEON.

MISS S. A. JACOB, with whose portrait also we have the pleasure of presenting our readers, and to whom the Rev. Charles Spurgeon was married on April 11th, in South Norwood Congregational Chapel, by his father, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, is the only daughter of Mr. Philip Jacob, of South Norwood. Miss Jacob, who is now twenty years of age, first met her future husband at her father's house, where he had become a visitor through being associated with her brother in mission work.

At a very early age Miss Jacob became a decided Christian, and was baptized by the Rev. Frank White when she was not more than twelve years old. Prepossessing in appearance, intelligent, pious, and in all respects suitable for the position of a minister's wife, there is every reason to hope and believe that she will add materially not only to the happiness, but to the usefulness of her husband.

In wishing, as we do most heartily and sincerely, much happiness for the youthful couple, it is pleasant to remember that every respect paid to them is indirectly paid also to the honored and beloved pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle and his noble-minded wife.

Seldom has it fallen to the lot of a bride to exchange her name for one more renowned than that by which Miss Jacob will henceforth be known. May bride and bridegroom both be true to the God of their fathers, and have their earthly union consummated by the everlasting joys of heaven!

THE BOYS OF CITY STREETS.

EVERY city has its troop of vagrant boys. Various causes lead to the formation of these troops and recruit their ranks. Of these causes the principal one is that one or both parents are under the power of the intoxicating cup. The natural result of a father being a drunkard is to make the home miserable, and when drink has led to crime and imprisonment, as it frequently does, the wretched home is broken up and the children are left to pick up a precarious subsistence by selling matches or newspapers, or something of the kind in the streets. In too many cases they fall into the hands of vicious men who teach them to become pickpockets.

A lady in London who has taken a deep interest in these waifs of the pavement, and has been very successful in rescuing them from vice and sin and procuring employment for them, has recently sent an interesting account of her experience to a trans-Atlantic contemporary, from which we quote the following incidents:

It is 7 P.M., and the area bell has been rung several times, so I must hurry down to the front kitchen—which does duty as meeting-room—and receive my lads, as they are beginning to drop in. On opening the door, indeed, I find that three of them are there already—"Jumbo," "Rags," and "Tubby." * "Good evening." "Good evening," from the three.

Presently "Shwanky" comes in, and seats himself as close to the fire as he possibly can. He looks very cold, poor lad. Five minutes later, and "Parrot," "Ginger," "Croppy," and "Flamer," have arrived. There is an approach to a scuffle for the seat nearest to the fire, and the usual rubbing of hands in delight at its warmth. Then, with a few remarks, such as "Now, Billy, look wot yer a doin.'" "Can't yer let a feller have a smell o' the fire!" "Ye'r almost a-roastin' a'ready!" etc., they settle into their seats, there is peace, and all stare at the fire for a minute or so, as if they had never seen one before. On the table there are copies of a good many illustrated journals and periodicals, as well as some copy-books. But the fire is, at present, a superior attraction, and they prefer to sit round it.

By-and-by they begin to talk together and discuss. At times politics will have a turn, especially if there has been a battle lately, or if one is likely, but their favorite topics concern horses and their own daily life.

Sometimes discussion becomes so hot that I find it necessary to interfere by changing the subject, or stopping it altogether, as otherwise I should be afraid to say what might be the consequence. The simplest way in such a case is to get the hymn-books, name a hymn in a firm tone, start it at once, and then before the first line is ended every one of the lads will be singing, and the discussion is at an end.

After a few hymns have been sung, some of the lads go off to the table to read or write, or to look at the pictures and periodicals. By about half past eight a dozen more lads have come—"Buster," "Jog-along," "Raspberry," and others—most of whom have been at work until now as butcher-boys, or at fishmongers' or other shops, though one owns a donkey and barrow and sells vegetables for himself. These also have a good warm, and then some take their seats at the table and try their hands at drawing, or write a page in a copy-book. Close to the fireside I see "Shwanky" now fast asleep, and one or two others nearly going off. Poor "Shwanky's" face looks as if it had had no soap on it for several days; but, dirty as he is, he has shown his love for this little evening meeting by coming straight from work—if he had gone home first he would have lost the greater part of it. Soap and water, and his evening meal too, have therefore been sacrificed in order to spend a quiet time with his young associates, and to enjoy a warm fire, which is a luxury not only to him, but to most of the lads who attend.

The evening having been spent in this way, ten o'clock draws near, writing and books are put away, and all sit in a semicircle round the fire to sing a final hymn. "Mayn't we sing 140th?" says one. "No," says "Croppy," "let's have 20th." Jack says very quietly to me, "Missus H——, 27 is a nice 'un." At last the favorite hymn is decided upon and is sung, then another, and then a third. The hymn-books are put away, and the chairs also put back into their places, and now comes the most difficult task of all—the final parting—the "good-night."

It is difficult for most of them, for they much prefer being here to going to their homes, and it is particularly trying to my feelings to part with them.

A DANGER SIGNAL.

A Sermon by the Late Rev. W. M. Punshon, LL.D.

"Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth."—JAMES 5 : 19.

An Interrupted Letter—I. The Danger of Intellectual Error—Connection Between Faith and Practice—The Large Charities of Our Times—Melancholy Progress of the Victims of Error—A Wonderful Conversion—II. The Danger of Moral Error—The Deadliest Heresy—The Backslider's Past, Present, and Future.

THESE are some of the last words of the general Epistle of James. From the abrupt nature of its conclusion, and from the absence of the ordinary salutation and doxology, some have supposed that the original intention was to write at greater length, but at this part of the epistle the apostle was surprised by the tumultuous Jews, and suddenly hurried off to martyrdom. If this supposition be true, how solemnly the words stand as the last of a wise and generous spirit! With what worthier words than these parting counsels would any one wish to die? In any case, whether this supposition is true or not, there is very much instruction and encouragement couched in them, which will well repay our careful study.

The main reference, as you will perceive by the context, is to the case of one who had known the truth, who was once devout in spirit and congenial in fellowship, but who, by the seducing influences of false teachers, had been led astray. Such an one is by implication commended to the compassion and the guardianship of the faithful, who are urged by the remembrance of the grandeur of the moral results which shall follow their holy toil thus to recover the fallen out of the snare of the devil.

THERE IS INDIVIDUAL DANGER—

the awful possibility of erring from the truth. This danger may be either intellectual or moral; either the darkening of the understanding, or the corrupting of the heart. The allusion, evidently, is to one who, having known the truth, had departed from its safe and pleasant paths, and had come under the entanglements either of erroneous notions or of vicious life. And this twofold danger is in existence still.

I. There is now-a-days, I need not remind you, a danger of intellectual error. If, when the apostle wrote—in the very childhood, so to speak, of Christianity—the tares sown by the enemy were so rank in their luxuriant growth that there were some who denied the divinity of Jesus, and some who allied impurity to devotion, and some who dreamed that they had had a release from the obligations to personal obedience—surely the danger of intellectual error is not the less imminent now, when nearly every man has some form or theory of his own.

And when we consider the almost inevitable connection between faith and practice, we cannot join in the sentiments of those who deem it a matter of indifference as to what may be the peculiarities of creed. We cannot forget that because of his opinions the Moslem enters upon fierce wars of extermination; and that because of his opinions the Hindoo, personally merciful, defends infanticide, and mourns that widows are no longer burned nor captives immolated, as over some lost privilege. We cannot forget that in the Japanese who, amid barbarous rites, hold festival to uproot the Cross; and in the Thugs, who strangle from principle, and whose great merit is in the multiplication of murders—the

OPINIONS PROMPT THE DEED.

That man, I take it, must be a man of very eminent piety who can preserve himself constantly blameless when he believes in the Romish doctrine of indulgences. Even where the sentiments have no direct influence upon the practice, they are collaterally and always influential, leavening the nature of the entire man. We cannot, therefore, think it a trifling matter thus to err from the truth by a departure from the faith that was once delivered to the saints.

By many we know this would be considered as an old and groundless apprehension, and altogether inconsistent with the great liberality of the present times. There are some among the teachers of religion who denounce creeds and denominations almost as vehemently as they denounce infidelity and sin, and whose special mission appears to be to advocate the extinction, not only of the middle walls of partition, but of those old and venerable landmarks which guard the poor man's heritage.

Now, if by attachment to creeds you mean a blind and formal adhesion to a system of unrevealed truth, a thing of rubrics and genuflexions, but which holds not the truth in love; and if by denominationalism you mean that churlish narrowness which stands upon its own fleece, and can see neither goodness nor worth beyond the curtains of its own tent, then have at them with all your might as things which must pass away, and which are unworthy utterly of the Christianity which they disfigure. Root them out of our churches if you can.

But if creeds be, as they ought to be, expressions of an inner life, forms of sound words draping the living truth; and if denominations be, as they ought to be, towers of strength for combined resistance and aggression, then, in proportion as we value our Christianity, these, its expressions and its habitations, must be accounted and sustained.

We are quite jealous, brethren, of that Pantheistic false benevolence which holds all religions in equal esteem, which will render its sentimental adoration whether the creed be libertine or holy, whether the altar be crowned with flowers or draped with the dripping blood. That equal esteem springs, we take it, from a conviction of equal worthlessness existing in the one and in the other. The man who professes that universal attachment without some central affection—suspect him when you meet him; he has a selfish and a cruel heart within him.

THE LARGE CHARITIES OF OUR TIME, the tireless compassions whose feet are swift in the relief of suffering, and who are open-handed in the abundance of their generosity—whence do they spring, and who are the men who support them? Not the lounger at the café and the club, whose life is an eccentric migration of universal activities, and whose affections are too fickle for an interest in any central direction. No; but the men who have domestic ties and happy homes; the men who know from the preciousness of their own family treasures the worth of such blessings to the world, and from their own agonizing anxiety in some crisis of perplexity and trouble, know how to sympathize with the homeless and with the desolate.

And so it is in the development of the religious life. It is a dangerous thing, believe me, to loose off from safe anchorage on matters of Christian belief or of Christian communion, or of Divine fellowship. We have seen men in our own day who have imbued themselves with the sentiments of Pope's hackneyed but heretical couplet—

> "For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight:
> He can't be wrong whose life is in the right;"

and in their privileged or fancied intellectual freedom they have cast off the restraints of creed, and they have belonged to a class, and gathered to themselves a company as motley, and almost as equivocal, as that of David in the Cave of Adullam, and for a while they have bounded and leaped in the very intoxication of their liberty.

We have followed these men in their

MELANCHOLY PROGRESS.

One by one they have shifted from the foundation-truths of Gospel faith and hope, and have rushed into the most holy place; that looseness of thought has induced laxity of life, and by-and-by they have become as the wild Bedouin of the desert, about among the churches, spiritual Ishmaels, their hands against every man, and every man's hand against them. It is no light thing, brethren, believe me, in this way to err from the truth, for in the heart of every error there is sin.

And in this wondrous age of ours—this age of enormous publicity, this age of bold thinking, this age of unbridled revelry and speculation—this danger assails us all. Some—here and there one, perhaps—but very, very few, from honest inability to understand the truth, more from intellectual pride, more still from very stubbornness of will, and, most of all, from sheer love of evil, have thus erred from the truth and made shipwreck of faith and of a good conscience together.

Brethren, the great source of infidelity, believe me, is not in the head, but in the heart; it is not because men are bewildered by the feebleness or the lack of evidence, but because they love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil. Are any of you thus in danger? Do I speak to one now upon whom a cloud of doubt has darkened, or who by listening to the blind suggestions of some infidel acquaintance has had his faith in Gospel verities unsettled and shaken. My brother, haste thee to cast out that demon; fling it away as a serpent, for there is death in its grip and in its fangs!

Aye, it behoves us all in the impending struggle of the times—a struggle, if I mistake not, fiercer far than we have hitherto known—to be rooted in the first principles of the Gospel of Christ, and to hold fast to the form of sound words. We do not ask—the genius of our religion would rebuke us if we did—your blind and traditional submission to its authority. It is a poor and sandy foundation for any man to build his faith upon an ancestral reverence, or an educational bias, or upon customary orthodoxy, or upon a minister's inspirations. Search the Scriptures for yourselves, only take care that you come to the investigation stripped of pride, prejudice, and preconceived hostility—with your spirits softened into a docile trust, with your hearts humbled to the obedience of the truth, and, above all, with fervency of prayer for the guidance of the good Spirit from on high, and that Spirit shall be given to the man that shall inquire, and you shall know of the truth or doctrine whether it be of God.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Lady Isabel's Visit to the Hardcastle Family—Lucy's Comforting Words—Etta at Lionel Court—Her News of Home Changes—Money for the Shed—A Consultation—Aleth's Communication—Robson's Advice—A Fatal Step.

"DRIVE round by Hardcastle's!" Lady Isabel called to the footman as she left the house in which she had witnessed the terrible death-bed scene.

The quiet, swift motion of the easy carriage, the cool air, and, above all, the half-hour alone with her Lord, soothed and composed her; and when she alighted, it was with perfect calmness that she entered the latticed room and took her seat by Lucy's chair.

She talked about the sunshine, the birds, Lucy's health, and then, covering her face with her hands, she burst into a passion of tears.

Lucy had seen quite plainly that her lady had something on her mind, but, with her usual tactful delicacy, had refrained from anything but direct answers to her visitor's own remarks. Now she stretched out her hand, and laid it upon the cold and trembling one beside her; then she said—

"Dear Lady! I knew something was the matter, but it will all come right. I know it will. We will ask Jesus to make it right."

"Oh no, Lucy!" sobbed Lady Isabel, her composure fairly gone: "it is too late—too late—it is all over now. He is dead—dead! what a dreadful word!" and she shuddered as she said it.

Lucy made no answer, but sat with clasped hands, the sympathetic tears streaming down her cheeks.

"Who, my lady?" at last she faintly asked.

"The old man I have been visiting. I am afraid he was wicked. Oh! I tried—I tried to talk to him. But perhaps I did not do it right! What shall I do? It is all too late now!"

"Did you tell him things, my lady? or did you read to him verses from the Bible? Was it your word or God's Word?" said Lucy.

"Oh! the Bible chiefly," said Lady Isabel.

"Then, my lady, you have made no mistake. If it was God's Word it was a living power. HE, the Great Jehovah, can and will use His own Word in His own way. It is 'the savor of death' to some, and of 'life unto life' to others."

"Thank you, Lucy, that is a great comfort!" said her guest. "It was just my duty to give the word, and I must leave the rest to God, to Him who sent it in fact."

"Yes! Lady Isabel! you and I can't do more than carry the message. It's as you once told me yourself—you are the 'errand-boy' taking the message. You take it direct from Him to the people, and then leave it with them, watered by your prayers. Isn't it so, my lady?"

"O Lucy! you have comforted me so. You always know exactly the word I want. Thank you many times. It was all such a dreadful shock. It quite upset me."

When she left the cottage Lady Isabel felt that her eyes had been opened, as never before, to see the realities of our twofold existence. Life and death, time and eternity, sin and purity, iniquity and yearning love, had, as an opened page, been clearly spread before her.

The wonderful peace of her pleasant home seemed inexpressibly sweet to her heart that evening; her husband's fervent interest and tender sympathy, her children's bright faces and innocent prattle, the pretty drawing-room so luxuriously fitted to her very taste—all seemed to draw forth her renewed thankfulness.

Had Lady Isabel spent that bright day in self-pleasing, her evening, so quietly passed, would not have brought with it the happiness it did. In pursuing pleasure, we miss it! the object of our search eludes us. But in following duty pleasure meets us at every turn!

As the bright spring days heightened into summer ones, and the shadows fled away, and sunny blue took the place of watery gray, and the birds chorussed into full rich sound the silent beauty wrapped before them, then it was that Etta returned once more to visit Lionel Court. Her beloved hostess gave her the radiant welcome on which she had so long been counting; and as she drew her to the sofa by the window overlooking the emerald slopes of lawn, she said—

"So, dearest Etta, you bring us good news this time! Is it all settled?"

"Yes!" said Etta, with a new look of happy animation in her face: "it is all settled! When I last parted with you, I was obliged to leave everything on trust."

"Obliged!" Lady Isabel interrupted, smiling; "but never mind, dear. Forgive me!" she said, taking her hand. I am longing to hear."

Etta smiled in return, and said, "I mean, that it all looked rather dark. But to give the brief epitome of the news you have already heard in detail from my letters. It was Edgar Harcourt's visit that did it. Father and mother both like him so much, and feel that they owe him such a debt of gratitude for his comforting talks with Arthur in his illness, that his opinion goes a great way in the house."

"What he said to them I never could exactly find out. But certain it was, that after worming out of me all my hidden schemes and projects, and some of my sundry little troubles—much to my shame and confusion of face!—he threw himself a good deal with my mother, and then with my father; he talked with Mr. and Mrs. Clemence several times, and, to make a long story short, through his means, everything was brought comparatively right."

"That is to say," she continued, seeing Lady Isabel's questioning glance fixed upon her, as though she were eagerly drinking in her simple story, "mother has begun to like Mrs. Clemence, and I may go to see her as much as I please; and my father has withdrawn his objection to 'the Shed' plan. Isn't it wonderful? Every one has to be thanked for that! Little Aleth, Mr. Habershon, Mrs. Clemence, your own dear self, Lady Isabel! my sisters and all. And last, but not least, the One who has so graciously heard and answered my prayers!"

"I am glad!" said Lady Isabel delightedly. "But how did your sisters come to help it? I am astonished to hear you say that."

"That also may possibly have been Edgar's influence. I am not sure; but I believe they told my mother that they all had their little pleasures, and they did not see why I should not have mine; or something of the kind. And so—and so—it came about!"

What they had really said, was—

"There is not the least fear of Etta's becoming strong-minded, Mother; if that is what you are afraid of. For that is not at all her line. Indeed it never was. And really she is so good and kind to every one, and takes such pains to help us in everything, that we should be quite sorry if she did not have her little wishes gratified."

It was all quite true. Etta had become every one's friend. Her loving gentleness had won its way. No sooner had her heart yielded to the Will of Peace than that blessed rule began to be Omnipotent in her heart. Her own will relinquished, His accepted, the cross was removed, for the opposing lines ran parallel. The victory thus won, each crooked fragment of her life began to shape itself into a perfect mosaic, beneath the eye and hand of her gracious, guiding Friend.

Her interview with Albert Eldridge the following evening was thoroughly satisfactory; for as they sat, with Lady Isabel, and Mr. Hamilton, in close conclave—pen, ink, and paper arranged before them—the summed-up items amounted to a total that could quite be accomplished, leaving a margin for extra, or unexpected expenses. Fifty pounds was to be the outmost bound of expenditure—so Etta's father had said; and Albert said this outlay would be sufficient. But when the next morning a letter of warm congratulation from Mr. Habershon arrived, inclosing a cheque for £20, in a small envelope which was accompanied by a single line,

"With Aleth's love,"

Etta was indeed thankful; particularly when Mr. Hamilton insisted on "clapping on," as he called it, "a ten-pounder." Then Mr. Eldridge was resummoned, and the council of war was renewed, the result being, that, were an economically-minded carpenter to be found at Shenstone, the adviser thought Etta might indulge herself in the complete larching of the shed throughout, which would not only smarten its interior, but perfect its warmth of temperature. A small stove at each end was to supply such artificial heat as might be thought necessary; though, as Lady Isabel remarked, the summer was already beginning, and no doubt the piece of grass outside, which, in his spare hours, Hutton had volunteered to put in order, would be the favorite resort of the men.

With so many willing contributors, Albert Eldridge for her gratuitous architect, and every present difficulty finally removed, Etta returned to her busy home-life, not a little cheered.

On her first solitary expedition into the streets of Shenstone, which now bore so different an aspect, because of the harmonized ray of hope and love that gladdened her own heart, and individualized into personal identity so many of the cottages and their inhabitants—before, alas! despised, at best overlooked—she met Mr. Robson. It was a pleasant interview, for his smiling face was always a cheering sight, but especially now that so strong a tie as spiritual relationship bound their hearts together in a common friendship.

Taking his hat off, Robson said—

"Good evening, miss!"

A few sentences passed between them about the town, the people, her visit, and then Robson said—

"You are doing a good work, miss. Don't let anything discourage you. I know you have difficulties; but don't you mind 'em, miss. Look above 'em all, right up to Him," he continued, suiting the action to the word, and looking straight up to the blue, softly-flecked sky above him.

"My difficulties are vanishing, in a wonderful, miraculous way, Robson," she said.

He smiled—"I knew they would," he answered. "We've been praying for you; we've been praying about it all."

"Oh, thank you!" said Etta. "I do value the prayers of that warm little meeting. Dear old Michael! I am sure he prays about the Shed! and everything else!"

"That he does!" said Robson. "You go on in faith, miss!" he ended, as their lines diverged.

He was soon out of sight; but he had left his sentences of bright trust ringing as chimes of hope through Etta's heart. Blest zeal! how little she knew that it was already sounding forth the first notes of a heavenly anthem—an anthem that would reverberate through higher vaults, ere another night should close. But so it was. Truth, ever stranger than fiction, supplies the sad detail.

Early the next morning, Robson went through the wood, to examine a small mill that had been put ready for use the night before, after a short season of enforced idleness.

Everything was in perfect order. Each screw, and wheel, and axle was oiled, and cleaned and in its place.

The sun had risen, and all nature was in its freshest glow of preparation for a beauteous day, when Robson, with quick step and upright gait, trod the little path that skirted fine old trees, standing in majestic groups, and forming an outline between the grassy park and fields of ploughed soil. Then, crossing a tiny wooden bridge that united the smooth little valley with its picturesque surroundings, to the bolder and more rugged forest slopes, he wended his way beside the gurgling river, over a wide green meadow, and into the land of a farmer, known well by name in Shenstone as a moral, money-loving, successful man.

This farmer's name was Archibald Macintosh. He was building a new house on rented ground, and had asked Mr. Robson to "call and pass an opinion upon it" at his earliest opportunity. He did as he was requested, inspected each portion of the premises, looking into the plans with the eye of a connoisseur; and then, at the close of business, as he ended his visit, standing there beneath the full light of a summer morning's sun, Robson: ever true to his Heavenly Master's work—said—

"Friend! do you remember hearing of the man who 'pulled down his barns and storehouses to build greater?' that very night his 'soul was required of him.' Are you ready? Can you face those bright mansions above, and say, 'I have a place there?' 'Here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come.'"

They were his last words to him. How little either of them thought it!

On he went, re-crossing the meadow, re-traversing the river path, until he reached the little mill, the special object of his workman-like solicitude. Standing on a slight eminence, in close converse with a friend who by agreement had met him there, Robson stood and gazed admiringly on the prospect before him, reserving his chief praise for the little mill that formed its foreground.

One moment more, and he had descended the steep bank that flanked its wall. Yet another, and his foot was on the wheel. Its slippery surface yielded in one huge turn, as he was testing its screw, and dragged him into its vault. In less than a second of time—in far less time than I can take to tell it—poor Robson lay a bleeding, headless, mangled corpse beneath the gory, dripping wheel.

His friend stood petrified! It was but for an instant. He ran, he called. The deep-brooding silence on every hand answered him in echoes. There was none to help, and had there been an army of willing hearts and hands, their aid would have been as powerless as his own. That earnest, loving soul was in his Father's presence, face to face with the Saviour, who for many a long year had been literally the "all in all" of his life. His labors were over. He had entered the "continuing city."

Bright moment to him! Who can picture it? But who can describe the agonizing wail that rang out from his bereaved home during the after hours of that eventful day, and many long days to come? It was, indeed, a desolating stroke. The whole neighborhood felt it.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT.

S. S. Lesson for July 3, Ex. 1 : 1–14; Golden Text, ver. 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ALL the sons of Jacob were already dead, and his descendants, the children of Israel, were still in Egypt. God's word to Abraham was in course of fulfilment: "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years" (Gen. 15 : 13). During the life of Joseph the Hebrews had prestige among the Egyptians; but it soon came to pass that the world gained the upper hand, and they who were called by the name of the Lord had learned to suffer. They had the promise of deliverance; Joseph had said unto his brethren, "God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land unto the land which He sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob" (Gen. 50 : 24); but many long years had elapsed since the words were spoken; generations had come and gone; and unless some had learned the date of their sojourning in Egypt from the words of God to Abraham, they might well have been hopeless and undone. Yet God's promises were being fulfilled in them: "The children of Israel were fruitful, and increased abundantly and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them." Yet it would seem as though they were altogether unconscious of their own power, and alive only to their heavy trials.

What a picture this is of the children of God in the world! Oppressed, misrepresented, ignored or persecuted—this is God's will for them. "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer: I have overcome the world" (John 16 : 33); "We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Acts 14 : 22). Perhaps there is no greater trial for a child of God than that of being constantly surrounded with worldly people whose aim in life and whose principles of action differ in every respect from His, and who nevertheless is in a position in which he can neither explain nor justify his own principles. To a worldly mind Christianity is incomprehensible. "What, love your enemies! they deserve to be hated; and to love them is to encourage them in their wrong-doing." So speaks the world, and when a Christian does love his enemies, worldlings suspect some other motive than simply obedience to God. "What, not fight for your own rights? This is poor-spirited cowardice. Every man for himself." So speaks the world, while Jesus teaches us to "resist not evil," to seek not our own, to "endure grief, suffering wrongfully" (Matt. 5 : 39; 1 Cor. 13 : 5; 1 Pet. 2 : 19).

The world can prove by argument that it is in the right; the Christian is shut out from argument; he knows that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2 : 14). Thus God leaves His children as "sheep in the midst of wolves" (Matt. 10 : 16), utterly defenceless if they "war after the flesh." But just as it was with God's ancient people of old, there is a strength with them which they fail to realize: "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me" (Heb. 13 : 5, 6). The children of Israel were mighty on account of their numbers; Christians are mighty by the presence of God with them. Let us be conscious of the power of God with us, and we shall be untouched, unconquered by the outward oppression of the world.

The Egyptians took account of the strength of the children of Israel better than they did themselves. "There arose up a new king over Egypt, who knew not Joseph;" and then commenced a system of oppression much more marked than before. This new king sought to impress his people with the increase of the children of Israel, and said of them, "Behold, the people of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we; come on, let us deal wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it is come to pass that when there falleth out any war, they join also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and so get them up out of the land." Just like the tactics of politicians in our own day: they not only provide for the present, but seek to arm themselves with defences which they imagine would make them secure against any future contingency, ignoring that all things are in the hands of the Lord our God, ignoring that no fortress is impregnable to Him; one shock of earthquake and all is destroyed; that no mighty army can withstand His will; an epidemic, and they fall like the mown grass. Oh, how many millions of money are spent in this providing against contingencies, putting God altogether out of the reckoning.

The Egyptians little knew that the political oppression which they thus planned for the children of Israel would be the very occasion of their losing this part of their population. Their increase was in fulfilment of the word of God, and so would be their deliverance. The Egyptians "set over them taskmasters, to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithom and Raamses." This is a piteous picture—the children of God strengthening thus the hands of their oppressors, and increasing their power and their riches! Yet so it is that believers who do not live in the power of Christ's redemption, who do not overcome by faith the difficulties of the way, become a gain to the world and to its prince. Every time a Christian is overcome or falls into envy, selfishness, impatience, or any other sin, the kingdom of darkness is a gainer by it. God keep us from thus strengthening the hands of our great enemy!

But God did not allow the counsels of Egypt to succeed against His people. The Egyptians sought to weaken and diminish the people. But "the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew." God does not give His people a prey into the hands of the ungodly. He carries out His purposes. "The Lord of Hosts hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed, so shall it stand. . . . For the Lord of Hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it? and His hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?" (Isa. 14 : 24–27). And these words may be a strength to us in all suffering which we may receive at the hands of the unconverted. Truly suffering in itself has nothing purifying or elevating, but suffering in our Father's hands is the precious means of our education. He has pledged Himself that we shall not be tried above that we are able (1 Cor. 10 : 13), and He chastens us, not as earthly fathers, "after their own pleasure," but "for our profit that we may be partakers of His holiness" (Heb. 12 : 10).

The Egyptians "were grieved because of the children of Israel." Oh, how many nations have been grieved because of them! How many have sought to destroy or drive them out! but they could not do it. God's hand has been over them, and God works out His purposes through them. "The Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigor: and they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, in brick, and in all manner of service in the field: all their service wherein they made them serve was with rigor." God waited but for one thing—that His children should make an appeal to Him. No doubt they spoke to one another, and mourned over their oppression; but this was not enough: they must claim the help of Him who was their Father. And so, with every burden of God's children: He waits to be appealed to; He is ready, oh, so ready to help, but we must make the claim upon Him.

The Persecution of the Jews in Southern Russia continues unabated in its fury. A writer in a Russian periodical says: "I went to visit Petschersk, where I was told that the Jews who had been plundered had found a refuge. In an inclosure that serves as an ammunition store for the arsenal, I beheld, packed together like ants in an ant-hill, more than eighteen hundred Jews with their wives and children—many of them were infants. They were clad in rags and barefooted. Many of them bore traces of ill-treatment, and a number of them had bandaged heads. All mere ghastly pale and terror-stricken. As I approached them I saw a boy of ten dying in terrible agony. His mother sat by him, tearless, as if too deeply afflicted to weep. A little further on I came across another mourning group. Then I penetrated into their midst. There was hunger and cold, weeping and gnashing of teeth. A heart of stone would have melted, and I could not withhold my tears.

"I was told that among these wretched beings awful scenes had been witnessed. Mothers had lost their children, and there had been fights and struggles for the limited space allotted to them. All this had taken place at night in bad weather. Many of them told me their tale of woe. One of them said, 'I had 20,000 roubles and a small farm, now I have nothing but the rags on my back.' Another addressed me thus: 'My two brothers were killed in the wood last night, and I do not know what fate has befallen my son.' A third said, 'They wanted to hang my mother, but she escaped with the rope round her neck.' A fourth stated the case thus: 'They have robbed us of everything, even our clothes, leaving us naked.'"

A Vessel Struck by a Swordfish.—The Liverpool bark Junak, Captain Fred M. Woodhouse, now lying in Brunswick Graving Dock, Liverpool, where she has been docked to be recoppered, was found, upon examining the vessel's bottom, to have a large rupture in the copper, which, on closer examination, was found to have been caused by the sword or spear of a large sea monster. It must have struck the ship with terrific force, as it is deeply imbedded in her timbers, under the counter and abaft the waist, where it has penetrated through wood of Italian oak to a great depth. This encounter of the ship and the gigantic fish must have occurred in the Indian Ocean, for one evening, about eight o'clock, while about the latitude of the island of Mauritius, an unexplained shock aroused every one. Every such instance of the perils of the deep ought to deepen the gratitude of all who, in the midst of similar dangers, have graciously been preserved. All of us in sailing over the ocean of life have to maintain prayerful watchfulness against the attacks of sin in its varied forms, and whatever formidable aspect it may assume, we can find adequate protection in Christ alone.

The Irish Land Bill Narrowly Escaped Defeat in the House of Commons on Thursday night. The aristocratic members of the Liberal party, aided by the Conservatives, supported an amendment moved by Mr. Heneage, liberal member for Great Grimsby, which proposed to take from under the operation of the bill all holdings which had been improved by landlords or their predecessors in title. This proposition, though seemingly fair, would have defeated the whole object of the bill if accepted, because it would have led to universal litigation. There are few estates on which the landlord has not effected some improvement, and if all those which have been so improved had been ruled out of the operations of the bill, it would have been of little value to Ireland. The amendment was supported by 200 members, only 225 voting against it. So great a reduction in Mr. Gladstone's majority indicates the spirit with which the Land Bill is regarded even in the ranks of his own party. Mr. Parnell and his friends supported the government on this occasion, or the majority would have been still smaller than it was.

A Second Important Temperance Victory was won in the British House of Commons on Wednesday, June 15th, by Sir Wilfred Lawson. He introduced a resolution expressing the opinion of the House that "it is desirable to give legislative effect to the resolution previously passed in the House which affirmed the justice of local communities being intrusted with power to protect themselves from the operation of the liquor traffic." The resolution was passed by a vote of 196 to 154. Mr. Gladstone voted against the resolution, though recent reports should have convinced him that the drinking customs of England are in pressing need of reform.

The two Men Arrested for Attempting to blow up the Town Hall of Liverpool were examined on Saturday, June 18th, and committed for trial. An analytical chemist had ascertained that the bomb used in the attempt was filled with nitro-glycerine. It is reported that they have made overtures to the government to surrender valuable information as to the plots of the skirmishers if they are promised a pardon. An attempt was made to rescue the prisoners on Sunday, June 12th. At daybreak three hundred men marched to the prison where they were confined, but a policeman gave the alarm, and the warders assembled, armed with loaded carbines and revolvers. When the men saw the warders they separated, going in various directions. Since the attempt to rescue the men, sentries have been placed around the prison, and warders, armed to the teeth, are patrolling outside.

The Island of Cyprus, which Great Britain acquired from Turkey to enable her to fulfil the obligations incurred under the protectorate of Asia Minor, has, it appears, involved the British Government in a pecuniary loss. During the past year the expense incurred in holding the island amounted to $250,000. The organs of the government are clamoring for the cession of the island to Greece, and there are indications that Mr. Gladstone is favorable to the project. If it should be consummated, the act will be quoted as an instance of the evils of popular government. Mr. Gladstone, empowered by the people, will then have completely reversed the policy Lord Beaconsfield adopted on the same authority. The "scientific frontier" in Afghanistan has been abandoned and the Transvaal given back to the Boers, and the cession of Cyprus is on the same principle. The opponents of Mr. Gladstone profess to believe that if a concession of tariff or a commercial treaty favorable to England could be secured by the sacrifice, he would not refuse to give Gibraltar to Spain and Malta to Italy.

The Czar of Russia is still kept a Prisoner by his fear of Nihilist plots. A gentleman who recently visited the palace where he resides, gives a melancholy description of the surroundings. Looking out of the windows of the corridor into the courtyards, of which there are four within the castle walls, he saw innumerable stacks of piled muskets, denoting the presence of a large force of infantry, and on the open place in front of the palace were picketed the horses of about a squadron of cavalry. Persons whose business calls them daily to the palace and who are well known are rigorously searched. For example, a priest employed in the service of the imperial chapel was lately subjected to such a close inspection that even his cigarettes were not overlooked. A Cossack officer was stationed at each of the doors of the sleeping apartments of the emperor, the empress, and the heir apparent during the night. The last named complains continually of the restraint put upon his movements since his father's accession to the throne. He is not allowed to go out riding in the park, which particularly annoys him. None of the officers or court officials are allowed to be away from the palace more than two or three hours at a time and all are obliged to be in before nine in the evening.

The Claim raised by Persons Arrested in Ireland that they are American citizens has caused a dispatch to be sent from the British Foreign Office to our government, calling attention to the operations of Fenians in New York. The London Times says the despatch is of the friendliest character. It recites various atrocious passages in O'Donovan Rossa's paper, and submits that they go somewhat beyond the widest limits of freedom of the press, but makes no demand upon the United States as to any particular action.

The Newly Appointed Prince of Bulgaria is already in a difficulty with his subjects. He has displayed a disposition to govern the country despotically, a course which has excited the determined opposition of the Bulgarians. The patriotic party have sent the following telegram to Mr. Gladstone: "We appeal to the generosity of England to save our liberty, which is threatened by a dictatorship." The party have issued a proclamation to the electors, in which they say, "The country is in danger. It is your duty to elect men who are equal to the emergency, in order to preserve our liberties." A Vienna despatch to the London Times says: "The report that in the event of the elections in Bulgaria proving adverse to Prince Alexander, he intends to resign, is unworthy of consideration, as the real character of the National Assembly will only appear when it has actually met. Most of the deputies, having very little political education, will not come to their duties with very decided convictions, and will be apt to yield to the influences that they will be exposed to."

The Verdict of the Coroner's Jury in the case of the steamboat disaster which occurred near London, Ont., on May 24th, has been rendered. The jury find that the boat was badly managed, that she was leaky, and that the boiler was not properly secured nor the decks properly braced, and that she was not fully manned and equipped. The verdict blames the manager of the company, the captain and engineer of the steamer, and the government inspector. The captain and the manager have been arrested for manslaughter.

The Traffic in English Girls, the Alarming extent of which was proved at recent trials in Belgium, has called attention to a defect in English law. The trials resulted in the conviction of several persons charged with decoying girls from England on various specious pretexts for immoral purposes. Earl Granville has moved for a Select Committee in the House of Lords, which has been granted, to inquire into the state of the law relative to the protection of young girls from artifices to induce them to lead a corrupt life, and into the means of amending the same. The philanthropic ladies and gentlemen who have recently exerted themselves so disinterestedly in their behalf would doubtless be glad to learn that it is a criminal offence to endeavor to persuade young girls to leave England on false or immoral pretexts.

Intoxicating Liquors in British Railway trains.—Mr. Gladstone has withdrawn the proposal to allow the sale of intoxicating liquors in railway carriages in Great Britain. The permission was sought only for the Pullman cars, in which some of the companies are beginning to provide dinners for passengers, to economize time during long journeys; but the prime minister said on May 23d, that as the resolution was to be opposed, and as the discussion must certainly occupy a considerable time, he must "regard the proposal as effectually killed by the menaces to which it had been subjected." It was urged against the proposal, that the practice would become general if allowed on the Pullman cars. The total abstainers said it would be impossible in such a case, to have "one law for the rich and another for the poor." Mr. Gladstone could not draw "a hard and fast line."

The City of Rome, the new Inman Line steamship, built for the trans-Atlantic passenger traffic, and which is the largest ship afloat except the Great Eastern, was launched in England June 14th. It is expected to make the passage in less than seven days. There was a large and distinguished company present and great enthusiasm prevailed. The launch attracted persons from all parts of the kingdom. Sir Edward J. Reed, formerly Chief Constructor of the Navy, assisted in starting the ship from the ways. Just before the launch of the steamer the boiler of the donkey engine on her deck exploded, killing three persons and injuring ten others, several of them very seriously.

The Colony in the Transvaal, in South Africa, is still far from being in a settled condition. There are indications that the Boers will be content with nothing short of complete independence and the withdrawal of British residents. A despatch from Durban to the London Times says:—"The feeling among the loyalists throughout the Transvaal is very disturbed. There are numerous reports of Boer outrages since peace was established. It is reported that the Boers attacked a body of natives and murdered ten of the number, because they were loyal to the Queen and working for the English. The Boers are themselves in danger from the natives. The Swazies, Zulus, and other tribes express a determination to fight the Boers, if they are left in complete possession of the country."

The Death of Sir Josiah Mason, the Eminent English philanthropist, occurred June 16th. His portrait and a sketch of his life, with a picture of the Institution he founded at Erdington, near Birmingham, appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 9th.

The Worth of a Man According to His weight in gold is the subject of a curious calculation in an English journal. It is suggested by the ransom recently paid to the Greek brigands for the surrender of Mr. Suter, to which we have previously alluded. It says: The £15,000 paid as ransom for Mr. Suter represents 264 pounds of gold, whereas that gentleman's weight probably does not exceed 154 pounds; while 211 pounds' weight of gold was given for Colonel Synge, who can be little short of 35 pounds heavier that Mr. Suter. Statistically considered, this is a striking increase in the price of human life in the brigand market, and indicates an alarming increase of confidence in those who, in commercial language, are styled the holders.

Vol. III. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1880, with a complete index, is now ready. Price, $3, including postage.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London) for June may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Price six cents.

GEORGE STEPHENSON The Pioneer Railroad Engineer—Scenes in His Life.

GEORGE STEPHENSON,

The Founder of the Railroad System.

THE English people have been celebrating with considerable enthusiasm the centennial anniversary of the birth of George Stephenson, to whom more than to any one else the world is indebted for the advantages derived from railroad travel. How incalculable those advantages are, no people are so well aware as the citizens of the United States. A brief account of this eminent railroad pioneer is therefore certain to be of interest to our readers. He was born on June 9th, 1781, just one hundred years ago, at Wylam, in England, a little colliery village eight miles west of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The dwelling which his parents occupied still stands, and is a common two-storied, red-tiled, rubble house, portioned off into four apartments.

The lower room on the left-hand side of this house was the home of the Stephenson family. The apartment is now, what it was a century ago, an ordinary laborer's dwelling—its walls are unplastered, its floor is of clay, and the bare rafters are exposed overhead. A picture of the unpretentious building is given on page 412.

George's father, Robert Stephenson, or "Old Bob," as the neighbors familiarly called him, was fireman of the old pumping engine at Wylam Colliery, for which service he received a sum equal to three dollars per week. As there were six children to maintain, the family, during their stay at Wylam, were necessarily in very straitened circumstances. The father's wages being barely sufficient, even with the most rigid economy, for the sustenance of the household, there was little to spare for clothing, and nothing for education, so that none of the children were sent to school. But Robert was a sober, industrious, and well-disposed man, and his wife was acknowledged to be "a rale canny boddie"—in Northumberland this is the highest praise to which any woman can aspire; and though "Geordie Stevie" was almost a man before he could read or write his name, his duty to God and to his neighbor were parental lessons early and firmly impressed upon his mind.

The boy George led the ordinary life of working people's children. He played about the doors, and was sent on errands to the village. He carried his father's dinner to him while at work; and at home he helped to nurse his younger brothers and sisters. One of his earliest duties was to see that the other children were kept out of the way of the chaldron wagons, which were then dragged by horses along the wooden tramroad immediately in front of the cottage door. Our picture on the left-hand side of the portrait is illustrative of George's juvenile employment.

EARLY EMPLOYMENT AS A COW-BOY.

Geordie's father having obtained a situation at the Dewley Burn Colliery, he removed with his family to that place. A poor man's child must enter early into the battle of life; and when Geordie was about seven years of age he found employment in keeping a neighbor's cattle from straying upon the iron tramroad, along which the coal wagons were drawn from the pit's mouth to the quays by the river-side. But in the intervals of cow-keeping, which were not devoted to bird-nesting and other boyish amusements, he was generally to be found by the burnside modelling in clay engines such as were in use at the neighboring pit, with stalks of hemlock for imaginary steam-pipes.

As the lad grew older he was set to hoe turnips, then to lead the horses while ploughing, afterward to work at the pit-mouth as corf-bitter or picker, and ultimately his ambition was gratified by being made driver of a gin-horse at Black Callerton Colliery, about two miles from his home. Until quite recently some of the old people in the neighborhood remembered him at this time as "a grit bare-legged laddie, very quick-witted, full of fun and tricks, and foremost in the sports and pastimes of youth."

IS MADE ASSISTANT TO HIS FATHER.

When Stephenson was fourteen years of age he was appointed assistant in firing his father's engine, at the wages of one shilling a day. He was so young for this work that when the owner of the colliery came round Geordie used to hide himself, lest he should be thought too small to earn so large a sum. His chief object, however, was to become an engine-man; and when, a few years later, his perseverance and industry had earned him this position, he announced the fact to his fellow-workmen, adding, triumphantly, "I am now a made man for life."

But his success, far from causing him to relax in his habits of industry, only served to stimulate him to fresh exertion; and the mechanical taste which had led him to model clay engines on the banks of Dewley burn, caused him, now that he had a real engine to study, to spend many hours after the day's work was over, taking it to pieces, cleaning it, and mastering its details—making of it, in fact, a companion and a pet.

TAKES CHARGE OF AN ENGINE.

George Stephenson was now eighteen years of age. He had won a position above his father, who was acting as fireman to the engine under his son's charge. He was earning fair wages, too. Young and active, he was famous among his comrades for success in those athletic sports which were, and still are, among the chief amusements of a colliery district. But while too many of his companions were spending their spare time and money in drinking-bouts, gambling, and cock-fighting, Geordie Stevie was busy mastering the next step of his onward progress.

It was a difficult one, requiring a strong heart to conquer it. He could neither read nor write. He stood on the very threshold of manhood, more ignorant than many a child whose head reached no higher than his waist. The discoveries of Watt and Boulton, the many experiments which scientific papers and magazines recorded, were all closed against him. He must either learn to read and write, or see the future barred against his progress. And while many would from shame, impatience, or want of time—for he worked twelve hours a day—have shrunk from undertaking such a task, Geordie at once devoted all his leisure to its accomplishment.

GOES TO SCHOOL.

His first schoolmaster was Robin Cowens, a poor teacher in the village of Walbottle; his second was Andrew Robertson, at Newburn. He learned his letters, and practised "pot-hooks," so that by the time he was nineteen years of age he contrived to spell and write his name correctly.

After working at Callerton for about two years as "brakesman," Stephenson went to Ballast Hill to take charge of an engine there. He was now twenty-one, and had continued by thrift, steadiness, and industry, to save as much money as enabled him to marry, and begin housekeeping on his own account. The object of his choice was Fanny Henderson, a young woman who acted as servant in the small farmer's house in which he lodged. She is said to have been possessed of great personal attractions; and those who knew her were accustomed to talk of the charming modesty of her demeanor and her sound good sense.

WEDDING VISIT.

A cottage-dwelling having been got ready for the reception of his bride, the marriage took place. It was celebrated at Newburn Church, on November 28th, 1802. The wedding-party proceeded to the house of old Robert Stephenson, at Jolly Close, whither he had removed, and the visit having been paid, the newly-wedded pair prepared to set out for their new home at Willington Quay, Ballast Hill. They went in a style which was quite common before travelling by railway had been invented. A strong farm-horse, borrowed from a neighboring farmer, was provided with a saddle and a pillion, and George having mounted it, his wife seated herself behind him, holding on by her arms round his waist.

We have no space to follow George Stephenson's upward career step by step, although each one is instructive. We can only tell how the time which others spent in degrading amusements and self-indulgence he devoted to the pursuit of knowledge. The winter evenings were passed with his young wife, studying the principles of mechanics, making mechanical experiments, and modelling machines.

He had still to work hard for his daily bread, both before and after the hours of labor at the coal-pit. He was glad to earn money by making and mending shoes, by manufacturing lasts, by cleaning and repairing clocks, and soon acquired the reputation of the best clock-doctor in the country-side. He even learned the sartorial art, and cut out the clothes of the miners, who to this day on Tyneside still call a certain fashion "Geordie's Stevie's cut." No opportunity that could be made available for profit or instruction was allowed to escape; and before long he had another incentive to labor, in the son who was born on October 16th, 1803, and who was destined to occupy a position in the scientific world scarcely inferior to his own.

GOES TO WORK IN SCOTLAND.

But the chimney corner of the little cottage at Killingworth, where Stephenson had newly pitched his home, was soon to become desolate. A season of heavy trial was rapidly approaching. First, his wife died of consumption, while her only son was a mere infant; and bereaved and restless, he gladly accepted an engagement from some gentlemen concerned in large spinning works near Montrose, in Scotland, to superintend the working of one of Boulton and Watt's engines. He left Killingworth for the North on foot, with his kit upon his back. He stayed there some time, and having saved a small sum of money, returned to his old employment and the society of his child.

But trouble had not yet done with him. His father was by an accident rendered blind and helpless, and of Geordie's little savings more than half went to pay the old man's debts, and settle him in a home which his son supported out of his weekly wages. The times were hard, the long and terrible wars with Egypt, France, etc., pressed heavily upon all classes, making provisions dear, and claiming ten per cent of Stephenson's wages; and drawn for the militia, he was obliged to purchase a substitute with the remainder of his hoard.

At last his courage failed him, and he resolved to start for America. Strangely enough, the severity of his misfortunes and his utter poverty saved him. Had not his little stock of funds been thoroughly exhausted, he would have left England with some of his relatives who crossed the Atlantic. "You know," he said to a friend years after this season of trial, "the road from my house at the West Moor to Killingworth. I remember when I walked along that road and wept bitterly, for I knew not where my lot would be cast."

THE TURNING OF THE TIDE.

In time the tide turned, and Stephenson, perfect master of the details of the engines then in use, was ready to turn to practical account the opportunities which presented themselves of applying his knowledge and skill. As he had become the most famous clock-doctor in the country-side, so now he was called in to prescribe for the clumsy, ill-constructed steam-engines which pumped the water from the pits, or drew the wagons along the uneven tramroads; and a few marvellous cures soon gained him an extensive reputation. One success in particular, which laid the foundation of his future fortune, deserves to be recorded. It was that of altering a pumping-engine set up at Killingworth Pits to clear them of water. George had seen the engine set up, and examining it predicted its failure. It was kept at work for a year without success, and Stephenson was finally sent for to see what he could do, with the promise from the proprietor that if he succeeded his "fortune should be made." He spent four days on his improvements, and in a few days more the pit was dry and the men at work in it.

BECOMES ENGINE-WRIGHT AND INSPECTOR.

In the year 1812 Stephenson, then thirty-one years of age, became engine-wright of the colliery

Killingworth, and inspector of the other mines e neighborhood belonging to the same own-

He was now relieved from manual labor, had leisure to devote to his favorite pursuits. his position he passed the next ten years of his studying closely the properties of the locomo- engine, then regarded as a curious and costly of little practical use.

MAKES HIS FIRST LOCOMOTIVE.

e have no space to describe the discoveries e by George Stephenson during the last ten s of his life at Killingworth. The most im- ant was his construction of the locomotive, or avelling-engine," as he used to call it, for ing the coals from the pit-mouth to the quays, shipping staiths" on the Tyne several miles nt. Being impressed with the necessity of iding a more economical method of conveying coals from the pit mouth, he had studied at- ively the clumsy locomotive in use in the neigh- ood, and at length considered himself justified sking the lessees of Killingworth Colliery to st him in the construction of one. Lord Ra- sworth, the principal partner, listened to his posal with favor, and on July 25th, 1814, George henson's first locomotive engine was at work he colliery railway.

ut the most sanguine could scarcely call "My d," as Stephenson designated his engine, or lucher," as the pitmen termed it, a striking cess. Its speed did not exceed a horse's walk ree miles an hour; without springs, and cum- s, its joltings deranged the machinery, while working expenses were so great as to render it economical than horse-power. The result, in- d, was unsatisfactory, and the engine would t likely have been condemned, had not Ste- nson, at this juncture, applied the steam blast, which combustion was stimulated, the capabili- f the boiler generating steam increased, and effective power of the engine doubled, without ing to its working expenses. And profiting by experience—noting "My Lord's" defects only pply remedies—George Stephenson, in the fol- ing year, took out a patent for a new engine, ch may be regarded as a type of the locomotive in universal use.

he germ of the modern railroad is to be found he rude wooden rails used more than two hun- d years ago for the guidance of the coal wag- ; and but for the difficulties experienced in veying the coals from the pits to the nearest ces of shipment, the present gigantic railway sys- might never have been perfected. A few years r iron rails were adopted in the stead of wood, ng which the lines of wagons were drawn by ses, so that when George Stephenson har- sed "Blucher" to his coal-cars, and succeeded drawing them slowly and laboriously to the ne, he and the eager lookers-on assisted, all consciously, at the birth of the present great lway system.

When the necessity of better communication ween the great towns of England began to oc- py the public mind, and a system of tramroads s eagerly discussed, its projectors had no better cedent to guide them than the methods of loco- tion in vogue at coal pits and stone quarries. eculators, however, began to advocate the for- tion of lines of railway between the principal vns, and the subject excited considerable inter- . Among the most prominent were the projec- s of a line between the port of Stockton-on-Tees d the collieries of Darlington, who, with consid- able difficulty, succeeded in passing the first ilway act in the year 1821.

IMPORTANT VISIT TO MR. PEASE, OF DAR- LINGTON.

For eight long years Stephenson's engines were ing their hard daily work most satisfactorily on the Killingworth Railway unnoticed. But all s time their persevering inventor was watching development of the idea of the Stockton and rlington railroad. One morning there knocked the door of the house of Mr. Pease, of Darling- , the chief projector of the local scheme, two angers, one of whom, in the rough Northumbrian lect, and with a straightforward manner, stated himself to be "only the engine-wright at Killing- worth," but described his mission in far more confident terms. He came to say that the loco- motive engine he had been using for many years at Killingworth was worth fifty horses, and to urge Mr. Pease and his brother directors to adopt it in preference to the horse-power they contemplated using on their line. And when Mr. Pease could not conceal his astonishment at the Northumbrian's proposal, Stephenson said, simply, "Come over to Killingworth and see what my 'Blucher' can do; seeing is believing, sir," and having made the wished-for appointment, the struggling hero and his son Robert quietly returned to their home.

The visit which Mr. Pease subsequently paid to "Blucher" was so completely satisfactory that he entered at once into partnership with Stephenson for the establishment of a locomotive manufactory at Newcastle, and obtained for him the appointment of engineer to the Stockton and Darlington Rail- way Company at a handsome salary.

Henceforth a new life began for George Stephen- son, upon which he entered keenly and heartily. From this time his career may be traced by one great success after another, until the public ac- knowledged him as one of the foremost men of the day. The picture in the right-hand section of the upper portion of our frontispiece represents during the survey conducted along the route of the present Liverpool and Manchester Railway. As soon as the surveyors entered some fields near Liverpool, their instruments and movements excit- ed attention. A mob gathered, whose angry tones and threatening gestures warned the surveyors of a storm brewing over their heads.

The landowners, who might be supposed to have known better, told the farmers to drive off the invaders; and the farmers with their "hands" were only too ready to obey. They stationed them- selves at the field gates and bars with pitchforks, rakes, shovels, and sticks, and dared the surveyors to "come on." A poor chain-man, not quite so agile as his pursuers, made his leap over a fence quickened by a pitchfork. Even women and chil- dren joined in the hue and cry, pelting the strangers with stones and dirt whenever they had a chance. At a sight of the theodolite their fury knew no bounds. That unoffending instrument they seemed to regard as the very citadel of the enemy, to seize and destroy which was to win the day.

Nor was this the only kind of difficulty encoun- tered. It was stated and believed that the running of the locomotives would prevent cows grazing or hens laying; that the poisoned air would kill birds as they flew over the chimneys of the engines, and render the preservation of game impossible; that houses would be burned down or rendered uninhab- itable from the smoke; that the use of horses would cease, and the race become extinct; that travelling on the deserted highways would become dangerous, and country inns be ruined.

OPPOSITION IN PARLIAMENT.

The bill, too, for the Liverpool and Manchester Railway met with the most virulent opposition dur- ing its progress through Parliament, Stephenson un- dergoing an examination of several days' continu- ance, conducted by barristers unequalled in violence and enmity. Even his friends believed his enthusi- asm for his locomotives excessive, and the counsel for the railway company declared, somewhat rough- ly, that if he estimated their speed at more than ten miles an hour, he would ruin the company's pros- pects, and qualify himself for a cell in Bedlam.

By engineers of fame, brought to oppose him, he was subjected to many insults; and hints of his honesty and sanity were freely dropped even by the members of the Parliamentary Committee, when, in reply to his adversaries' taunts, he declared, in his rough Northumberland dialect, that he could easily make his engines go at the rate of twelve miles an hour.

"And suppose," asked an astonished and indig- nant member, "and suppose that a cow were to stray upon the line, and get in the way of your engine, would not that, think you, be a very awkward cir- cumstance?" "Yes, very awkward, indeed—for the coo," was the answer, with a dry laugh. "I had not," he said, years afterward, "one engineer in all England upon my side."* He stood alone, a sim- ple country mechanic, against all the wealth and professional talent of the country; but although he was worsted for a time, his darling idea—like all great truths—in the end prevailed. Our picture in the left-hand panel of the lower portion of our frontispiece represents Stephenson's examination before the committee of the House of Commons in April, 1825.

Never had Stephenson's prospects seemed more uncertain than at this time. The bill was rejected; and although in the following year the directors ap- plied to Parliament with success, yet the statements of Mr. (afterward Baron) Alderson, that Stephen- son's plan was the most absurd scheme that ever entered into the head of a man, had the effect of inducing the unthinking public to regard him as an ignoramus and a maniac, and of weakening the faith of his friends. The new survey was made by other engineers; the new bill waived expressly the question of locomotive engines; and indeed it was tacitly understood that horse-power alone would be used. Ultimately, however, George Stephenson was again appointed the company's principal en- gineer, at a salary of £1000 per annum.

We cannot follow him through this work, com- mencing with the construction of a road across the celebrated Chat Moss, and ending with the tunnel beneath Liverpool. We must hurriedly pass on to notice, and that but briefly, which he was called upon to fight.

The railway was nearly constructed before the question was fairly mooted, How should the line be worked? Stephenson, who had now only to deal with a board of directors, strongly urged his despised and rejected plan, pointing with confi- dence to the engines in use on the Killingworth, Hetton, and Stockton and Darlington railways. Others advocated the use of fixed engines; while many still held out for horse-power. At length the directors were persuaded to offer a premium of £500 for the locomotive engine which should, on a stated day, perform certain conditions in the most satisfactory manner.

The scientific world laughed and shrugged its shoulders; but George Stephenson and his son calmly set to work, and by the appointed day of trial, the famous locomotive the "Rocket," an illustration of which appears on page 412, built at Newcastle, was ready to compete with the three other engines entered for the prize. The trial was a short one, but it solved the problem beyond dis- pute. One of the competitors failed to start; an- other got out of order, and broke down; the boiler of the third burst; but the "Rocket" stood its ground. Stephenson attached to it a carriage large enough to hold a party of thirty, and drove it along the line at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour, to the wonder and delight of an immense crowd, and won the prize.

is the subject of the right-hand section of the lower portion of our front picture.

Henceforth achievement followed achievement with astonishing rapidity, and the world loaded with respect and honor one who, having begun life a poor uneducated boy, had by perseverance done more to advance the civilization of the world than any living man. His enemies bowed down to his genius, and gladly served under him.

In the year 1842 he retired from the active pur- suits of his profession, devoted his time to the care of his extensive collieries and the study of horti- culture, occasionally turning his attention to his favorite engines, still aiming at perfecting the sys- tem which he had originated, and designed several improvements which were gladly adopted.

HIS DEATH.

Death overtook him on August 12th, 1848, while engaged in these peaceful pursuits, and summoned him to leave the world he had so greatly benefit- ed, before his faculties were decayed or his energy considerably weakened. The cause of death was a sudden effusion of blood from the lungs. He was sixty-seven years of age. The body was in- terred in Trinity Church, Chesterfield, where a simple tablet marks the great engineer's last rest- ing-place.

SELAH.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 26, 1881.

"Selah."—PSALMS 61 : 4.

The Word no Superfluity—An Enthroned Word—Varied Significance of the Word—I. The Selah of Poetic Significance—The Bible Cadent with Rhythm—The Young People's Book II. The Selah of Intermission—The Rest in Music—The Pause in Life—For Consideration—Slow Bible Reading—Men who have Paused over Passages—The Pullman Car Bible Reader—The Selah in Life—How God Fills It—A Huguenot's Child Indentified by a Scar—Death a Selah Between the Beatitudes—III. The Selah of Emphasis—The Emphasis in the Wrong Place—Sight in Blindness—The Sceptic's Grave Opened by a Tree—IV. The Selah of Perpetuity—The Grave Slab a Milestone—A Year of Blessing—The Harvest of over a Thousand Souls.

THE majority of Bible readers look upon this word of my text as of no importance. They consider it a superfluity, a mere filling in, a meaningless interjection, a useless refrain, an undefined echo. Selah! But I have to tell you that it is no scriptural accident. It occurs seventy-four times in the Book of Psalms and three times in the Book of Habakkuk. You must not charge this perfect book with seventy-seven trivialities. Selah! It is

AN ENTHRONED WORD.

If, according to an old writer, some words are battles, then this word is a Marathon, a Thermopylæ, a Sedan, a Waterloo. It is a word decisive, sometimes for poetic beauty, sometimes for solemnity, sometimes for grandeur, and sometimes for eternal import. Through it roll the thundering chariots of the Omnipotent God.

I take this word for my text because I am so often asked what is its meaning, or whether it has any meaning at all. It has an ocean of meaning, from which I shall this morning dip up only four or five bucketfuls. I will speak to you, so far as I have time, of the Selah of poetic significance, the Selah of intermission, the Selah of emphasis, and the Selah of perpetuity.

I. Are you surprised that I speak of the Selah of POETIC SIGNIFICANCE?

Surely the God who sapphired the heavens and made the earth a rosebud of beauty, with oceans hanging to it like a drop of morning dew, would not make a Bible without rhythm, without redolence, without blank verse. God knew that eventually the Bible would be read by a great majority of young people, for in this world of malaria and casualty an octogenarian is exceptional, and as thirty years is more than the average of human life, if the Bible is to be a successful book it must be adapted to the young. Hence the prosody of the Bible—the drama of Job, the pastoral of Ruth, the epic of Judges, the dithyrambic of Habakkuk, the monody of Jeremiah, the lyric of Solomon's Song, the oratorio of the Apocalypse, the idyl, the strophe, and antistrophe and the Selah of the Psalms.

Wherever you find this word Selah, it means that you are to rouse up to great stanza, that you are to open your soul to great analogies, that you are to spread the wing of your imagination for great flight. "I answered thee in the secret place of thunder: I proved thee at the waters of Meribah. Selah." "The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved: I bear up the pillars of it. Selah." "Who is this King of glory? The Lord of Hosts, He is the King of glory. Selah." "Thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance. Selah." "Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah." "The Lord of Hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah." "Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed because of the truth. Selah." "I will hide under the covert of thy wings. Selah." "O God, when thou wentest forth before thy people, when thou didst march through the wilderness. Selah."

Wherever you find this word it is a signal of warning hung out to tell you to stand off the track while the rushing train goes by with its imperial passengers. Poetic word, charged with sunrise and sunset, and tempest and earthquake, and resurrections and millenniums.

II. Next I come to speak of

THE SELAH OF INTERMISSION.

Gesenius, Tholuck, Hengstenberg, and other writers agree in saying that this word Selah means a rest in music; what the Greeks call a diapsalma, a pause, a halt in the solemn march of cantellation. Every musician knows the importance of it. If you have ever seen Jullien, the great musical leader, stand before five thousand singers and players upon instruments, and with one stroke of his baton smite the multitudinous hallelujah into silence, and then, soon after that, with another stroke of his baton rouse up the full orchestra to a great outburst of harmony, then you know the mighty effect of a musical pause.

It gives more power to what went before; it gives more power to what is to come after. So God thrusts the Selah into His Bible and into our lives, compelling us to stop and think, stop and consider, stop and admire, stop and pray, stop and repent, stop and be sick, stop and die. It is not the great number of times that we read the Bible through that makes us intelligent in the Scriptures. We must pause. What though it take an hour for one word? What though it take a week for one verse? What though it take a year for one chapter? We must pause and measure the height, the depth, the length, the breadth, the universe, the eternity of meaning in one verse.

I should like to see some one sail around one little adverb in the Bible, a little adverb of two letters, during one lifetime—the word "so" in the New Testament passage, "God so loved the world." Augustine made a long pause after the verse, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ," and it converted him. Matthew Henry made a long pause after the verse, "Open thou my lips, and my mouth shall show forth thy praise," and it converted him. William Cowper made a long pause after the verse, "Being freely justified by his grace," and it converted him. When God tells us seventy-seven times meditatively to pause in reading two of the books of the Bible, He leaves to our common-sense to decide how often we should pause in reading the other sixty-four books of the Bible.

We must pause, and ask for more light. We must pause, and weep over our sins. We must pause and absorb the strength of one promise. I sometimes hear people boasting about how many times they have read the Bible through, when they seem to know no more about it than a passenger would know about the State of Pennsylvania who should go through it in a St. Louis lightning express train and in a Pullman "sleeper," the two characteristics of the journey, velocity and somnolence. It is not the number of times you go through the Bible, but the number of times the Bible goes through you. Pause, reflect. Selah!

So also on the scroll of your life and mind. We go rushing on, in the song of our prosperity, from note of joy to note of joy, and it is a long-drawn-out legato, and we become indifferent and unappreciative, when suddenly we come upon a blank in the music. There is nothing between those bars. A pause. God will fill it up with a sickbed, or a commercial disaster, or a grave. But, thank God, it is not a breaking down; it is only a pause. It helps us to appreciate the blessings that are gone; it gives us higher appreciation of the blessings that are to come.

The Selah of Habakkuk and David is a dividing line between two anthems. David begins his book with the words "Blessed is the man," and after seventy-four Selahs, he closes his book with the words, "Praise ye the Lord." So there are mercies behind us, and there are going to be mercies before us. It is good for us that God halts us in our fortunes, and halts us with physical distresses, and halts us at the graves of our dead. More than once you and I have been halted by such a Selah. You wrung your hands and said, "I can't see any sense in this Providence; I can't see why God gave me that child, if He is so soon going to take it away. O my desolated home! O my broken heart!" You could not understand it. But it was not a Selah of overthrow. It gave you greater appreciation of the blessings that gone; it will yet give you greater appreciatic the blessings that will come.

A HUGUENOT'S DESPERATE DEVICE.

When the Huguenots were being very much secuted in France, a father and mother obliged to fly from the country, leaving their child in the possession of a comparative stra They did not know whether they would eve turn, or, returning, if they would be able to re nize their child, for by that time she migh grown. The mother was almost frenzied a thought of leaving the child, and then, even if ing back again, not being able to know her. fore they left, the father drew his sword, an marked the wrist of that child with a deep It must have been a great exigency to ma father do that.

Years of absence passed on, and after a the parents returned, and their first anxiety w find their lost child. They looked up and d the land, examining the wrists of the young pe when lo! after a while the father found a ma with a scar upon her wrist. She knew him but he knew her. And O the joy of the reur So it is now. "Whom the Lord loveth He c teneth." He cutteth, He marketh, and whe comes to claim His own the Lord will know that are His; know them by the scar of trouble, know them by the stroke of their mi tune, know them by the mark of their desolat

Oh, it is good that the Lord sometimes halt David says, "It is good that I have been affli Before I was afflicted I went astray, but have I kept thy word." Indeed, we must all stop. Scientists have improved human longe but none of them have proposed to make ter life perpetual. But the Gospel makes between two beatitudes—between dying triump the one side of the grave, and celestial escort o other side of the grave. Going out of this lif the unprepared, is a great horror. "Give more laudanum," said dying Mirabeau; "giv more laudanum, that I may not think of eternity what is to come." And dying Hobbes said leave my body to the grave, and my soul to great perhaps." It has the discord of an infi life breaking down into the jargon of despair; the Gospel makes the death of the Christian a S between redemption and enthronement. "Al well," said dying Richard Baxter; "al well." "Play those notes over again—those which have been so great a delight and solac me," said the dying Christian Mozart. "Non Christ, none but Christ," exclaimed dying Lam Richard Cameron, the Scotch covenanter, into the battle three times praying, "Lord, spar green and take the ripe. This is the day I longed for. This is the day I shall get my cr Come, let us fight it to the last. Forwa So you see there is only a short pause, a Selah termission, between dying consolations on the side and overtopping raptures on the other.

"My flesh shall slumber in the ground
Till the last trumpet's joyful sound;
Then burst the chains with sweet surpris
And in my Saviour's image rise."

III. I next speak of

THE SELAH OF EMPHASIS.

Ewald, the German orientalist and theologian, that this word means to ascend; and wherever find it, he says, you must look after the modul of the voice, and you must put more force into utterance. It is a Selah of emphasis. Ah friends, you and I need to correct our emph We put too much emphasis on this world, an enough on God and the next world. People these things around us are so important, the t of the next are not worthy of our consideration

The first need for some of us is to change our phasis. Look at Wretchedness on a throne. poleon, while yet Emperor of France, sat dow jected, his hands over his face. A lad cam with a tray of food, and said, "Eat, it will d good." The emperor looked up and said, " are from the country." The lad replied, "Y "Your father has a cottage and a few acr ground?" "Yes." "There is happiness," dejected emperor. Ah! Napoleon never put emphasis in the right place until he was expir- at St. Helena.

n the other hand, look at Satisfaction amid the st earthly disadvantage. "I never saw until I blind," said a Christian man. "I never knew t contentment was while I had my eyesight, as ow what contentment is now that I have lost eyesight. I affirm, though few would credit it, I would not exchange my present position circumstances for my circumstances before I my eyesight." That man put the emphasis in right place. We want to put less stress upon world, and more stress upon our God as our lasting portion.

avid had found out the nothingness of this d and the all-sufficiency of God. Notice how nterjects the Selahs. "Trust in the Lord at imes; ye people, pour out your heart before . God is a refuge for us. Selah." "Blessed he Lord who daily loads us with benefits, even God of our salvation. Selah." "The Lord l count, when he writeth up the people, that man was born there. Selah." Let the world e its honors and its riches and its pomp. Let have the Lord for my light, my peace, my for- s, my pardon, my hope, my Heaven.

"What sinners value I resign;
Lord! 'tis enough that thou art mine.
I shall behold thy blissful face,
And stand complete in righteousness.

"This world is all an empty show,
But the bright world to which I go
Hath joys substantial and sincere:
When shall I wake and find me there?

"O glorious hour! O blest abode!
I shall be near and like my God,
And sin and sense no more control
The endless pleasures of my soul."

h, my friends, let us this day correct our em- sis.

V. Next, and lastly, I speak of

THE SELAH OF PERPETUITY.

Targum, which is the Bible in Chaldee, ren- s this word of my text "forever." Many wri- agree in believing and stating that one mean- of this word is "forever." In this very se from which I take my text Selah means not y poetic significance, and intermission, and em- sis, but it means eternal reverberation—for- r! God's government forever, God's goodness ver, the gladness of the righteous forever. Of rse, you and I have not surveyor's chain with ugh links to measure that domain of meaning. this world we must build everything on a small le. A hundred years are a great while. A tower hundred feet is a great height. A journey of r thousand miles is very long. But eternity! If archangel has not strength of wing to fly across but flutters and drops like a wounded sea-gull, re is no need of our trying in the small shallop uman thought to voyage across it.

sceptic desiring to show his contempt for the ising years, and to show that he could build en- ingly, had his own sepulchre made of the finest the hardest marble, and then he had put on door the words, "For time and for eternity"; t it so happened that the seed of a tree some- w got into an unseen crevice of the marble. at seed grew and enlarged until it became a tree, split the marble to pieces. There can be no rmization of anything earthly. But forever! ill you and I live as long as that?

We are apt to think of the grave as the ter- nus. We are apt to think of the hearse as our t vehicle. We are apt to think of seventy or hty or ninety years, and then a cessation. In- ad of that we find the marble slab of the tomb only a milestone, marking the first mile, and at the great journey is beyond. We have only ne enough in this world to put on the sandals d to clasp our girdle and to pick up our staff. e take our first step from cradle to grave, and en we open the door and start—great God, ither? The clock strikes the passing away of ne, but not the passing away of eternity. Meas- eless! Measureless!

This Selah of perpetuity makes earthly inequali- s so insignificant, the difference between sceptre and needle, between Alhambra and hut, between chariot and cart, between throne and curbstone, between Axminster and bare floor, between satin and sackcloth, very trivial. This Selah of perpetuity makes our getting ready so important. For such prolongation of travel, what outfit of guide-books, of passports, and of escort? Are we putting out on a desert, simoom-swept and ghoul-haunted, or into regions of sun-lighted and spray-sprinkled gardens? Will it be Elysium or Gehenna?

Once started in that world, we cannot stop. The current is so swift that once in, no oar can resist it, no helm can steer out of it, no herculean or titanic arm can baffle it. Hark to the long-resounding echo "forever"! O wake up to the interest of your deathless spirit! Strike out for Heaven. Rouse ye, men and women for whom Jesus died. Selah! Selah! Forever! forever!

I this morning close

ANOTHER CHAPTER IN CHURCH WORK.

It has been to me in many respects the most prospered year of my ministry. Great assemblages, larger financial income as a church, complete harmony, revival perpetual. How the sheaves have come in, until we had no more strength to garner them! One thousand and thirty-six souls received in the last thirteen months.

Across the year swept a great domestic grief, but, sustained by the hand of God, and by your tender sympathies, for which I have never yet had enough self-control sufficiently to thank you, I have continued until this day. I know better than ever before how to comfort you. I know better than ever before the desolations of bereavement. I know better than ever before what it is to live in a house where every book and every picture and every article of furniture, and every incident seems charged with memories overwhelming; and conjointly with you I look forward now to a world which is no more a beautiful abstraction, but a personal Heaven, for your Mary is there, your Lizzie is there, your Jennie is there, your Henry is there, your Willie is there, your Charlie is there, and those whom we caressed on earth we will caress in Heaven.

You see it is only a slight pause, it is only a Selah, giving greater appreciation to us of what they were when they tarried here, and greater appreciation of what they will be to us when we again join their blissful society. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Tenderly put away the garments they once wore, for they shall need them no more in the land of the white-robed—the robe so very white that no fuller on earth could whiten it. Selah! Selah!

Dr. Talmage, at the Close of the Evening service last Sunday, stood at the foot of his platform and took the hand of every member of the congregation as they filed past him, saying that he did so because he had invariably missed at least one face on his return from his summer vacation. On Monday Dr. Talmage left Brooklyn for Saratoga Springs, to spend a few days with his eldest brother, Rev. John V. N. Talmage, D.D., who has returned to this country in impaired health after thirty-seven years of missionary work in China. Dr. Talmage purposes afterward going with his family to the Adirondacks for a period of complete rest and recuperation. During his absence we intend publishing some interesting sermons by him which have not previously appeared in this journal.

THE PREDICTED LAWLESSNESS IN IRELAND.

By the Rev. M. Baxter.

THIRTY-FIVE years ago, in 1846, Dr. Tregelles, in his Exposition of Daniel, and Dr. Kelsall, in his book on Antichrist, and subsequently B. W. Newton, in 1849, in his "Prospects of the Ten Kingdoms," showed that Ireland must be separated from Britain, at least, to the extent of having a separate Parliament, shortly before the Great Tribulation of three and a half years and the end of this age. There was no sign at that period of any such event being likely to take place, and, therefore, their prophetic anticipations were contrary to the natural probabilities of the case.

They all grounded their prophetic interpretation upon the fact that Ireland never formed part of Cæsar's Roman Empire, whereas Britain did; and that prophecy shows that all the countries belonging to Cæsar's Roman Empire, as represented by the ten-horned wild beast, are to be legislatively separated from all countries outside that empire, and formed into exactly ten kingdoms (Daniel 7 : 24 ; 2 : 42 ; Rev. 17 : 3).

It is a remarkable sign of the times that revolutionary lawlessness has recently broken out in Ireland, which bids fair to issue in its gaining legislative independence as the result of the agitation. The accounts of the prevailing disorders of one week include the following occurrences.

There have been serious riots in the towns of Skibbereen and Schull, county Cork, arising from the dissemination of a false report that a priest, named Murphy, had been arrested under the Coercion Act. On the evening of June 7th a horseman entered Skibbereen with the news that the telegraph wires had been cut, the roads torn up, and some houses wrecked.

Near midnight on June 7th a special train was dispatched from Cork, conveying to Enniskillen two hundred of the Rifle Brigade and 20th Regiment, five army service wagons, and one ambulance, and it was feared an attempt would be made to throw it off the line. The wires between Schull and Skibbereen, and between the latter place and Ballydehob, were cut in several places, and left in tangled masses across the roads, forming a most serious obstruction to vehicles or troops. Some bridges in the district were also broken down, hence the transmission of intelligence is very difficult. During the night the whole district between the three places mentioned was in the greatest state of excitement, and few persons retired to rest.

Serious rioting has also taken place in the city of Cork. On June 9th the police were called upon to stop a disturbance on the race-course, and having made an arrest the prisoner was, after a good deal of stone throwing, rescued from twelve policemen. The helmets of the constables were smashed, their heads cut, and their bodies bruised in several parts. They, however, succeeded in making other arrests, but at the entrance to the Park race-course the power of the mob became so overwhelming that they were obliged to release the prisoners, notwithstanding that at this point they were reinforced by twelve mounted men. The crowd, when in close contact with them, beat the police with blackthorn sticks. The police returned the attack with the butts of their muskets, knocking down all who came within their reach. In the mean time the stones thrown by such of the crowd as kept at a safe distance fell upon the police as thick as hail.

In the Cork Theatre a piece called the "Eviction" is being played. A landlord is shot, whereupon cheers and yells of delight burst forth, and are redoubled when the actor proceeds to say, "And thus we'll serve every landlord in Ireland!" The next speech which rouses the enthusiasm of the audience is "Down with the Queen and the Government!" The excitement in the theatre is described by eye-witnesses as passing all bounds. An attempt to get up a counter demonstration in the shape of "Three cheers for the Queen" meets with no response.

The suppression of the Land League by force is advocated by a great number of people in Ireland as the best means of putting a stop to the existing turbulence. How far that would prove effective is uncertain, nor is it possible for any one to predict; for Ireland has still a free press, and even if she had no longer the right of open and public meeting, she could still read the views of the Land League in her papers; besides it is by no means certain that the result of the suppression of the Land League would not be more secret plotting than there now is. Be all this as it may, the results may be summed up as follows: A bewildered executive, an excited people, paralyzed trade, isolated violent disturbances, and grave apprehensions for the future. Dublin reminds one of St. Petersburg in a state of siege more than the capital of a free country. Shopkeepers say that trade never was worse, and that they are almost ruined.

James Graham Marries Selina Price — Kind Treatment of a Jewish Merchant, and Gratifying Results—Graham Undertakes to Form a New Station for the Increasing Cattle.

AT Burrangong, one hundred and twenty miles from Bathurst, Graham found the first job he undertook, or to use his own words in describing it afterward, There I first drew bridle at Jim Black's, an old convict, whose father had been hanged, and his two brothers transported for life. He was himself an infidel and an old bachelor. He was affable enough though, and wanted a man to mow wild oats. He had two English convict servants engaged, and they mowed Mooney, a south of Ireland man, out of the field. I engaged at ten shillings an acre ; and it was evident they intended to treat me as they did Mooney. We went to it with a will, but as my strength was then returning, they soon found it wiser to take things more easily. When Mooney saw this, he positively leaped like a black, and boasted that "thim Inglish coults were broke in by a bhoy from the ould country."

While at Black's an unpleasant thing befell me. In my box in Bathurst I lost my certificate of free immigration, and as my clothing was rather scant, and my belongings so light, one day a policeman came and told me it was rumored I was an escaped convict, and I must get certified as a free immigrant. The policeman treated me as respectfully as I could wish, and with all kind consideration.

No one nearer than a Mr. Bermad could identify me ; so off I set for forty miles to his house. He was a shipmate of mine, and took me in to dinner, in poor trim though I was, and treated me as generously as if I had been a magistrate. He gave me an identification, and next day sent a black to escort me to Burrangong.

But I was tasting the sweets of a higher liberty than I had ever before known, for I felt that Christ had redeemed me from the bondage of my old master, the devil, and that I was now a free man in the Lord.

James Graham's home-loving heart was often lonely in the bush ; and among companions with whose coarse feelings and manners he had no sympathy, he sighed for other fellowship. On one of his cattle-seeking expeditions, he visited a settler some twenty miles distant, and there he saw, for the first time, Selina Price. She was a niece of the owner of the station. She was just eighteen ; had been residing in Sydney with a well-to-do uncle for some time, and had got a better education than most females residing so far up-country. She had come to the colony when about four years of age, and knew bush-life and habits well. She was, moreover, if not beautiful, very good-looking, exceedingly active and vivacious.

Graham was full ten years her senior, and of much more sober and thoughtful temperament ; but love, like dreams, often goes by contraries. Whatever was the cause of it, James, when he saw, loved Selina Price.

It is not the object of this narrative to enter deeply into affairs of the heart, which are, and should be, strictly private affairs, or we might tell of Graham's doubtings whether such a young, charming girl would have a husband so much older, coarser, and duller than herself. It is true, he was not yet twenty-eight, and had always been considered well-built and good-looking, and was a first-rate hand at writing a poetic love-letter.

His first visit evidently was not displeasing to the lady or her uncle, and subsequent ones were evidently agreeable to all parties. In fact, his heart palpitated more than ever it did, in those tentative visits, till the prize was won and they were engaged. Then he felt he had a prize indeed ! Perhaps, like other lovers, he threw the radiance of his own beaming soul around the object of his affections, and his imagination heightened the virtues on which it dwelt. However deficient the bush was in jewelry, his ideality was an exhaustless mine of gems to be lavished on Selina. He could scarce imagine any good in womankind that he did not see in her, either in bud or flower. And the lover's ideal estimate is, no doubt, more strictly correct than is a cold, prosaic philosophy ; for no figures can adequately depicture the value of woman, absolutely or relatively ; nowhere is she so indispensable as in the solitudes of the bush.

Selina Price, though not "a help-meet" for a dancing-master, suited James Graham. She could handle a fowling-piece almost as well as he could ; she could ride better ; she was quick and witty, full of resource, and loved him without a rival ; she was to him the dawn of a new day. Morning began to spread on the mountains. All his ideality and domesticity awoke, kindling the skies of his future life with gorgeous colors, as bright as hope after struggle and despondency. He felt a new man now he had a motive to work, and his heart beamed through his countenance and nerved his arm. Wonderful arrangement of God !—that flowers and hearts only reach full bloom on the verge of married union.

Perhaps his happy feelings made Graham all the kinder to an itinerant Jewish merchant who then called at his station. Jehiel Myers had come from London to Australia to make money, and with dray and merchandise was itinerating the bush. Myers came to Graham, who treated him with a frankness and hospitality that he seldom received at Gentile hands. He had his horse put into a fat paddock ; he gave him rations as much as he needed, and sent word to several stations of the arrival of his goods and wares. In consequence of this he sold more than a hundred pounds' worth before he left Carowder. When he was leaving he offered to pay Graham anything he asked. He, however, would take nothing ; and the grateful Myers said, "Then a thousand words would not fill a bushel ; but, as I am a true Jew, if I can ever do you a kindness, I will do it."

As Graham was allowed the produce of his own cattle, he in a few months took down a load of cheese to Yass to sell it. He went round several shops, and was about to sell, when up came to him his friend Myers, running in hot haste, and shook him by the hand. He inquired the most he could get for his cheese, and was told. "Then," said the Jew, "I'll give you a penny a pound for it more than any other man in Yass will give." At this rate he bought, and paid for it, and compelled Graham to be his guest, and hardly could he have treated Abraham himself with greater hospitality. Graham did not till then know he had settled in Yass.

While he remained with Myers, the latter came to him and said, "There is a flock of cattle come in, that you ought to buy ; they would set you up for yourself on a new station. Graham dissented, as he had not money. The Jew drew out a roll of notes, and said, "Go and buy them, and use as much of that as you like. I do not know how much is in it, as Heaven is my witness ; but you will pay me at your leisure." Graham refused, but the other vehemently urged. He yielded to generosity that was evidently sincere, and beyond any he had ever experienced before from either Jew or Gentile. In due time from the increase of the cattle, he paid the principal, and the Jew would not receive one penny of interest.

In less than six months after Graham and Selina Price first met, they were married in the parish church of Yass. Two parties of ladies and gentlemen—the friends of the bride and bridegroom—set out with them, in high glee, to ride about one hundred and twenty miles through the bush to the church ; by noon of the second day they reached their destination. Myers came to Graham, and requested him to give the preparation of the wedding-dinner to his friend Moses Moses. Consent was given ; and perhaps so fine and so cheap a wedding-dinner had never before been given in the Lachlan district. The little Jewish community vied with each other in kindness to the Gentile who had so hospitably treated one of their number when a stranger in the wilderness.

There was no newspaper reporter to give account of the dress of squatteresses, or the eloquence of squatters, at that dinner ; but the absence of a reporter did not lessen the praises lavished on the honor, heartiness, and strength of Graham, or on the beauty and accomplishments of his bride.

After their wedding tour in Yass, Graham his wife returned to Carowder, and were n kindly received by their friends around. hearty kindness and hospitality of squatting ne bors, who to visit each other must ride fift twenty, or perhaps sixty miles, is something more true and intense than formal visiting in c where visits are so frequent that friends are " at home" to each other. These rides and fes ties were more pleasant than anything Gra had experienced since he left his home in Irel or expected ever to experience till he reached home again. With the leave of his employer, Meals, he now undertook to form a new and tant station for the overgrown flocks of G Black.

In this serious undertaking, which so nearly the life of himself and of his young wife, he barked with a view to pasturage for his own creasing stock. If the man of capital finds money makes money, the grazier finds that c increase cattle. He had embarked his wage stock, which was increasing like Jacob's flock old. Although he did not marry cattle but a v his wife brought him more than three hun pounds' worth of fine young cows and hei He was too poor yet, however, to stock a sta for himself ; and they both resolved, by indu economy, and enterprise, to work their way t establishment of their own.

In September, 1842 (the spring of the y says Graham, I undertook to form a station my first employer, Jim Black, of Burrangong. was very wealthy. He had untold money in funds. He had a wild herd of more than five dred swine, after which we used to have sple boar hunts. He had on his stations in the country eight thousand head of prime cattle, r than one thousand head of horses, and bet fifteen thousand and twenty thousand sheep. one time he had £40,000 worth of wool in sheds. His merino sheep, first introduced by M'Arthur, were famous for the finest wool. horses became enormously valuable when th port of the horses to India commenced in 1844

I am not theologian enough to know whethe devil be very fond of money (as the love of it i root of all evil, I suppose he is), but the man like him, that I ever knew, was fond of it. Th Gipsy Jim had, for stealing many horses, esc hanging but a mere hair's-breadth, yet I heard him say he would hang any man who sh steal a sheep or an old shoe from himself. was selfishness and revenge embodied and fied.

He wanted outlet for his flocks and herds, in 1842 engaged me, with the consent of my manent employer, Mr. Meals, to form a new st for him on the Murray, for the sum of £50, be being found in everything and feeding my stock on the new run. He had heard of it fr stockman, who had passed over it returning Melbourne, which town had been founded years before. Had I known the exasperated of the Murray River blacks, or the nature o pasturage on the intended station, I should ne have taken my own cattle to it, nor undert his, for double the money.

Selina and Bobindi accompanied me, as we a stockman, hut keeper, and bullock driver rations. Six good dogs did most of the wo driving. We swam the Murrumridge and Mu rivers with the loss of only two or three hea heifers, and after crawling over about two hun and seventy miles of country, arrived at the si our station in three weeks. It lay between Mitta Mitta and Ovens rivers, both being bran of the Murray. The river Mitta Mitta takes its r from the marshes (Mitta Mitta—marsh ma through which it flows. One of these, five r long, lay on the side of the river opposite our It was separated from another of about three r long by a sand-dike or bar. We crossed the with a dray and load of a ton weight ; and so was the sward it sprang like india-rubber.

We built a hut which I had loop-holed, so we could turn it into a garrison, and by remo the wooden stoppers from the loop-holes could on all sides. We also cleared away all timbe several roods round, so that no enemy could lie in ambush. The hut stood on a beautiful rising ground about forty yards from the winter banks of the river. Here we made a garden for vegetables, the seeds of which we had brought with us. So adapted was the sandy alluvial soil that, I believe, Egypt never grew better leeks, onions, melons, or pumpkins. The equal of the latter I do not think Pharaoh or Joseph ever ate.

THE COMING ANTICHRIST.

By Henry Varley.

IT has been announced that we are to deal to-night with the Antichrist, and with the Jew, and with the lawless era. I do not suppose that I shall get beyond the first point of our subject; I ask you therefore to come with me this evening to a quiet study of God's word concerning the Antichrist. I have no doubt that most of you have thought more or less about this subject. The first thought that suggests itself to my mind is this: have you any clear and definite thought in your mind as to what Scripture teaches us concerning Antichrist? Let me first of all point out to you the force of the word itself—*Anti*christ. Is this a principle? John says that in his day there were many Antichrists, and there is a tendency among some prophetic students to make out that Antichrist is a spirit of lawlessness in one form or another. I see that in the newly revised Testament that thought is to some extent indorsed by the translators. I do not wish you to suppose that I think the Scripture teaches that Antichrist is only a personal being separated from the spiritual principles of evil themselves. I think the true thought of Scripture is that it embraces both.

Antichrist, however, will be without doubt a person. May I suggest to you that he will be the devil's counterfeit son of God? There is a very remarkable passage that I will ask you to look at. You will find in John 5:43 these words: "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." I have no doubt that these words refer to the Antichrist of the last days of this dispensation. Before we go farther let me ask you to notice that there are some who affirm that the Pope is Antichrist. I do not think so. The apostle John distinctly says that "he will deny the Father and the Son." Now I ask any thoughtful man here, Has the Pope ever done that? Has it not always been the case that the Popes of Rome have distinctly affirmed that they were the vicegerents, the representatives of Christ? Turn to 1 John 2:18. "Little children, it is the last time: and as ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time."

Then again in the same chapter, at the 22d verse: "Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is Antichrist, that denieth the Father and the Son."

I have therefore no hesitation in saying the Antichrist, whenever he is manifested before the world, will take the distinct character of an infidel. It is the latest form of evil in this dispensation. I do not mean of course that Popery will not have its place, and Mohammedanism have its place also, and many other false systems, such as spiritualism, and men giving heed to the doctrines of devils. But be assured of this, the last and the worst form of evil shall culminate in one who shall utterly deny the Father and the Son. He will seek to abolish the very name of God, if that were possible, and set up in the stead of the worship of God upon pain of death his own personal worship. It is to this that our Lord referred when he says in Matt. 24:15: "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place (whoso readeth, let him understand)."

Now refer to the words that are spoken by the prophet Daniel, for our Lord quotes almost the very words of Daniel in his prophecy concerning the Antichrist (Daniel 9:27). "And he shall confirm a covenant with many for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate."

Thus from the words of Christ, also from the apostle John, as well as many other testimonies that I will give you, we arrive at the conclusion that Antichrist will be a real person.

It is very worthy of notice, that almost all great principles have had their leading representative or representatives. One very striking illustration I would cite is the case of Napoleon. We are told that wherever he went he had a marvellous power to arouse the enthusiasm of hundreds of thousands; and as you know Napoleonism was really "headed" up, as I would call it, in the man. How it has often repeated itself in various fashions in human history, as that history unfolded itself. Certain men have come to the front, whether for weal or woe, and they have gathered about themselves the elements of blessing for others or the elements of destruction and woe.

I want you now to notice two or three Scriptures that are exceedingly important as pointing out what the character of the Antichrist will be. And first of all, I would ask you to turn back with me to Dan. 8:23. Mark the expression used, for it is a very striking one—that is, when the world is ripe on account of its iniquity. "And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences shall stand up." Then notice the words that follow in the next verse: "And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power." Mark you that the New Testament, clearly reveals that he will have his power from Satan; and, therefore, just as the Lord Jesus Christ, regarded from the standpoint of His manhood, received power from His Father, and was anointed of the Holy Ghost, so whenever Antichrist arises he will be Satan's incarnation of manifested power. He will have his power from the evil one. And be assured of this, we shall know him as soon as he arises. I have no doubt that

HE WILL ARISE IN THE EAST.

I think the Scriptures are very clear upon that point. You know how the East is now coming to the front, and mark you this: "And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power: and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many: he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand."

He will appear first of all as a king of one of the ten kingdoms that will be in existence when Christ comes. Now you will not forget that those ten kingdoms never have existed, nor do they exist to-day. The western part of the kingdoms does exist. But a few years ago and we had scarcely any of the eastern part of the world to the front. But what have we recently seen? Italy has sprung into existence, Greece has sprung into existence. Now, practically speaking, Egypt is severed from Turkey, and to all intents and purposes, except for a yearly sum that it pays to the Sultan, it is an independent kingdom. And so assuredly Syria will come to the front.

Another description that you will find of the Antichrist is given in 2 Thess. 2:1–4, where he is predicted to sit in the temple of God at Jerusalem.

And let me remind you that the word temple is never used except in connection with the temple at Jerusalem. In the New Testament the word temple is used in relation to the human body, but wherever you meet with prophetic statements in Scripture that deal with the temple, they refer to the temple at Jerusalem, where even while I am now speaking there is an incipient restoration going on. The interest in Judea is growing every day, and western legislators are looking forward with deepening interest to the revival that is taking place in that land, and, assuredly, as God has said so, the temple shall be rebuilt yet in Jerusalem. Observe what follows, 2 Thess. 2:5, 9, 12.

Such, beloved friends, is the solemn crisis that is spoken of in the inspired word, and the great power that shall then be broken utterly to pieces before the thousand years of Christ's reign upon the earth.

MR. GEORGE MÜLLER'S HOME-COMING.

Interesting Scenes.

TUESDAY, May 31st, was a memorable day for all connected with the Orphan Houses at Ashley Down, Bristol, England, which now contain 2050 children. Mr. Müller has been absent from England for about ten months, preaching in this country, and Mrs. Müller has accompanied him. They returned to Bristol on the afternoon of May 31st. The road approaching Ashley Down had many interested spectators. It is shaded by stately trees, the branches of which, interlacing from side to side, form a perfect avenue.

At the Orphan Houses the 2050 children came in view, standing on either side of the way three deep, the smaller ones in front. Alternately a regiment of boys and girls was arranged, keeping the line in beautiful order, the white caps of the girls forming a relief to the dark clothes of the lads. In the midst came the baby children, little ones of three and four, the sight of whom recalled the fact that they were fatherless and motherless, orphans indeed. Such little plaintive faces some of them had! Yet how their Heavenly Father has cared for them in causing Mr. Müller to "take them up." In many cases they are better provided for than if their parents had lived, and though a large proportion of them are delicate in constitution, they seem, as they grow older, to increase in strength, and get stout and ruddy. Regularity and cleanliness, fresh air and good food, save many a young life that must have been doomed under less favorable circumstances.

Inside the gates of No. 3 Orphan House, where Mr. and Mrs. Müller have their simply-furnished rooms, there were drawn up in order around the circular path the inmates of that particular building, who were to have the honor of the first personal greeting from their friend and benefactor. The children, though somewhat excited, took their places with great precision and order, and never broke rank, though they bent eagerly forward in their efforts to catch the earliest sight of Mr. Müller's conveyance at the turn of the road. The patience of the little ones was not long tried, for in a few minutes the hack appeared, in which sat Mr. and Mrs. Müller, with their son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Wright. Their presence was hailed by infantine cheers. The girls, not to be outdone, waved and clapped their hands in turn. Mr. Müller sat bareheaded, bowing and smiling in a most fatherly way. Passing the hundreds of children and the scores of waiting friends, the cab was driven through the gates to the door of No. 3 House.

There the members of the staff were standing, and as the travellers alighted, they pressed round them and assured them of their joy at once more having them at home. Mr. Müller had a shake of the hand and a good word for all, and, stepping on to the grass mound, he spoke briefly to the orphans, telling them of his pleasure at seeing them well and happy, and of his prayer "that God's richest, fullest blessing might be theirs, now and always." Ever full of kindly thought for others, he then came outside the lodge gates, greeting the rest of the teachers.

He looks exceedingly well, and is quite sunburnt. No one would imagine him to be over seventy years of age, for he is erect and slender in figure, and seems as vigorous and hearty as many a younger man. The home-coming has been a happy one in all respects. His stay in Bristol will probably again be short, as he feels that "necessity is laid upon him" to continue his itinerating preaching. The spectacle of the five massive houses built by prayer and faith, and the welcome given to him who asks nothing of man but obtains all from God, the thought is suggested that surely such a sight would be more convincing than many scholastic arguments to such as deny the existence of a God, question the power of prayer, or ignore the exercise of a simple and Christian faith.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Contest at Albany has Become One of endurance. Repeated efforts have been made to adjourn the convention, but without success, and an alternative proposition was made, in a humorous spirit, by Mr. Pratt that the Convention be locked up and fed on bread and water until two Senators are elected. The Democrats remain firm for their own candidates and announce their determination to lend no aid to either of the Republican factions. The substitution of Mr. Clarkson N. Potter for Senator Jacobs as a candidate was made at a Democratic caucus on June 22d, on account of some doubt existing as to the eligibility of the latter gentleman. A disposition has been apparent on the part of the Administration Republicans to combine their strength on Messrs. Wheeler and Depew. The twenty fifth ballot, taken on Thursday last, indicates the relative position of the candidates. For the short term the numbers stood: Clarkson N. Potter, 53; William A. Wheeler, 50; Roscoe Conkling, 32; scattering, 20. For the long term: Francis Kernan, 53; Chauncey M. Depew, 52; Thomas C. Platt, 27; scattering, 23; necessary for a choice, 78.

The Bribery Investigation Committee Adjourned on Thursday, instructing the counsel engaged, to submit their briefs on June 28. A sensation has been produced by Senator Strahan's testimony, that the offer of the United States marshalship for the Southern District of New York had been made to him by John I. Davenport on behalf of the President, with a view of influencing his vote and action at Albany. The Stalwart Republicans have bitterly complained that President Garfield has taken a hand in this contest by deferring the signature of Mr. Robertson's commission as Collector, so that Mr. Robertson might lead the anti-Conkling wing of the party at Albany. This new charge, that the President had attempted to seduce a Conkling supporter by offering to bribe him with an office, excited among the Stalwarts increased acrimony. Mr. Davenport was summoned before the committee and interrogated as to the conditions on which the marshalship was offered to Senator Strahan. Mr. Davenport in reply said frankly: "I told him that of course he would be expected to vote against Conkling and Platt." Mr. Davenport alleged that the negotiations were not directly authorized by the President, but that he (Mr. Davenport) was satisfied Mr. Strahan might have the place on those conditions. Senator Strahan declined the offer on the terms proposed.

The Provisions of the New Bill for the Better protection of children, which has now gone into effect, are summarized in the New York Tribune, and show that it will be a very beneficial measure if it is strenuously enforced. One clause is highly important. It is that which forbids the sale or delivery of beer, wine, and spirits to children under the age of sixteen years. This, if enforced, will at least keep them out of the grog-shops, where they can learn nothing but evil, and it will prevent drunken parents from sending them there, to become accustomed to the sight and smell of spirits, and frequently to acquire a taste for it. It will also, if enforced, keep the children from the demoralizing occupation of rag-picking, and up to the age of sixteen it will keep them out of the theatres.

The Newly Appointed Commissioner of Street Cleaning in New York is energetically prosecuting his work. Hundreds of men are laboring with their brooms and picks in various parts of the city where the pavement is believed to exist beneath the many coatings of filth deposited from time to time and allowed by the ex-commissioners to remain, spreading disease through the city. Four thousand tons of dirt per day are now being removed, in spite of the assertion of the late officers as to the cleanliness of the city.

Another Visit to America from Mr. Parnell, the Irish agitator, is threatened. America was contributing freely at the time of his last visit to relieve the distress in Ireland caused by the famine, but it should be understood that the mission he is now said to contemplate, will be to raise funds for a seditious agitation, which has already inflicted grievous evil on his countrymen. Efforts will no doubt be made to enlist sympathy in advance of Mr. Parnell's arrival, so that he may receive an ovation when he lands, but before making promises to support him and render aid at his meetings, citizens will do well to study the course he has taken since he left our shores. There is no lack of sympathy among us for Ireland and her woes, but an impartial review of Mr. Parnell's policy will convince the most ardent friend of Ireland that there are better ways of expressing his commiseration than in helping Mr. Parnell to continue his baneful course.

The New Liquor Law in Rhode Island will take effect on July 1st. If its stringent provisions are faithfully executed it will necessitate extensive changes in the sites of hotels and liquor saloons. By one of its clauses it is enacted that no license shall be granted for any place within 400 feet of a public school. It is probable that this clause will compel the removal of some very prosperous resorts. Another provision of the law is that the objection of a majority of the landowners within one hundred feet of a place for which a license is asked shall be sufficient to prevent the granting of a license.

President Garfield's Uncle, Mr. Thomas Garfield, was killed on Wednesday, June 22d, by an accident, at the Warrensville crossing on the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio Railroad, east of Cleveland. Mr. Thomas Garfield was returning to his home in Randall in a carriage, accompanied by Mrs. Alonzo Arnold, and when near the crossing saw the approach of the train. Thinking he could make it he whipped up the horses, but was not quick enough, the train smashing into the gig and throwing both out. They were picked up and taken to their homes. Mr. Garfield died in an hour and a half, without having uttered a word. Mrs. Arnold's skull was fractured, but it is hoped she may recover.

Mr. Thomas Garfield was three years younger than Abram, father of the President. General Garfield's birthday is the same date as his, and last November there was a pleasant reunion at the house of the old gentleman in Newburg, to celebrate the double event. "Uncle Thomas," as the family all called him, was the only Garfield remaining of his generation, and was much beloved by all his relatives. He settled in Ohio a short time after his brother, the two buying farms about twelve miles apart.

Philosophy in the Woods.—A Novel Enterprise has been inaugurated by Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., which promises to be productive of very beneficial results. It is an effort to give to the masses of Christian people in respect to philosophic knowledge, advantages which are at present only attainable in universities and seats of learning. Dr. Deems rightly believes that there are many Christians whose business engagements preclude them from attending our colleges, who would be glad to obtain a knowledge of the principles of science and philosophy, especially when that knowledge is so imparted as to demonstrate the connection between those subjects and religion. At a time when the blessings of education are so extensively enjoyed as at present, every Christian ought to be acquainted with the higher branches of knowledge, that "the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works." This conviction has led to the institution of The Summer School of Christian Philosophy, of which Dr. Deems is dean. It is located at Warwick Woodlands, Greenwood Lake, Orange Co., N. Y., a delightful spot forty-two miles from New York City on the borders of New Jersey.

The first session will commence July 12th, and close on July 22d. Eleven lectures will be delivered by eminent professors from Yale, Princeton, Michigan, and other universities. Arrangements are made with the Erie road for excursion tickets to be sold, with lecture tickets. A ticket to the lake and back, together with lecture and conversazione ticket, one day, $2; for the whole course and trip $6. These joint tickets are to be sold at the depots foot of Chambers Street, N. Y.; 23d Street, Jersey City; 184 Market Street, Newark, N. J.; Montclair, and Bloomfield.

The Foundation Stone of the New Marquand Chapel, which Mr. Henry G. Marquand is giving to Princeton College, was laid June 21st, by Mr. Allen Marquand, the son of the donor. In laying the stone on Tuesday Mr. Marquand Jun. said that his father in presenting the chapel to the college wished it to be strongly and securely built, enriched by art, but above all to be hallowed by religious associations, and never put to secular uses. [At this a hearty "Hear, hear," was heard from Dr. McCosh.] Dr. McCosh, in accepting the gift in behalf of the college, spoke of his acquaintance with Mr. Marquand's liberality soon after his inauguration, and uttered some feeling words in regard to the benefactions to the college. He stated that the gifts during his administration amounted to $2,500,000. The necessity of religious instruction was emphasized, and also the benefits to be derived from a beautiful chapel devoted only to the worship of the students.

The Sudden Appearance of a Comet in the north-east quarter of the heavens has given rise to considerable discussion among astronomers as to its identity. On June 23d telegrams from San Francisco, Cincinnati, Rochester, and other American cities, as well as from London, announced the discovery of a brilliant comet. A few days previously Dr. B. A. Gould, at the National Observatory in Buenos Ayres, reported having seen a comet, and it is a question in dispute whether the one visible in our hemisphere can be that seen by Dr. Gould. The remarkable feature of this new celestial visitant is that it should suddenly have burst into our sight without having previously been seen through a telescope. It is not even known whether the comet is a new or an old one, whether it is approaching to or receding from the sun, what is its composition, or what is its orbit. Many astronomers believe it to be identical with a comet which appeared in 1807, on account of its position and appearance. Others, however, believe it to be a new comet, that of 1807 having been studied by eminent astronomers, who calculated from its orbit that it would not be seen again for 1700 years. At Harvard University on Friday night the observation was very successful. A telegram from that institution says: "It appeared to be about 69,000,000 miles from the sun, and 29,000,000 miles from the earth. The dimensions computed by the astronomers, which show the diameter of the nucleus to be 1000 miles, the diameter of the coma 12,000 miles, and the length of the tail 4,000 miles, leave no doubt in their minds that it is the comet of 1807." Professor Henry Draper has succeeded in taking a photograph of the comet, an operation never achieved before, and which may lead to important discoveries as to the elements of which these strange bodies are composed.

The International Sunday-school Convention commenced its sessions in Toronto, Canada, on Wednesday, June 22d. A report published in the New York Tribune says: "Delegates were present from almost every country in the globe, those from the United States being the most numerous. The day was devoted to organization, addresses of welcome and responses, and the hearing of reports. The Hon. Edward Blake, of Canada, welcomed the delegates from other countries, said that from such gatherings as this the spirit of the Gospel would be made to permeate the politics and international relations of the world. In that last fortress of false pride and false honor, the domain of international transactions, there were approving signs, especially in the plan of international arbitration solemnly agreed upon between the two foremost nations of the world. And last, that exhibition of Christian manliness and forbearance which was displayed the other day in the case of the Transvaal War, when the strong were strong enough to propose just terms of peace. Responses were made by Governor Colquitt, of Georgia, and Mr. B. F. Jacobs, of Chicago. The Hon. S. H. Blake, of Ontario, was elected permanent president of the convention, with twenty-seven vice-presidents from various States and Provinces.

A Lady's Veil Caught Fire in a Roman Catholic Church on June 20th, and placed her life in serious peril. She was a candidate for admission to a convent, and was one of a number who presented themselves at the altar dressed in long lace veils. A lighted taper coming in contact with one of the veils set it on fire, and but for the presence of mind of some men who were present, and who threw their coats around the girl, she would have been burned to death. She was severely burned about the neck and arms. The absurd ceremonies which attend the reception into convent life of these deluded girls was in this case near proving fatal. A more enlightened knowledge of divine truth would have convinced the girl that her duty lay in a life of Christian work in the world rather than in seclusion in a convent.

Pray for Indianapolis is the Burden of a letter sent by one of the pastors to a contemporary. Such a revival as was never before known in that city is still going on. The revival meetings continue, as in many churches the people themselves will not hear of their discontinuance. After the summer's heat is over, and all have returned from their rest, it is the intention to begin the battle again more earnestly than ever, going on from victory to victory. "Not a day passes," says the writer, "without the manifest presence of the Holy Spirit in converting power. Indeed, it is a continuous Pentecost with all. The ministers engaged in the work find no difficulty in approaching the most obdurate sinners anywhere. The revival is the principal topic of conversation at the fireside, in the place of business, in the factory, and the shop, on the street-corners, and in the cars. The good old Gospel in the good old-fashioned way seems also to be the universal demand. Tell it quick and tell it plainly is the cry of multitudes."

Two Weeks Counting Gold is the Occupation in which two experts are engaged in New York. The Director of the Mint has sent them to count the bullion in the Assay Office. The rapid accumulation of precious metals in the hands of the Government is well illustrated by the fact that in the New York Assay Office alone there are $6,000,000 to be counted. It will require nearly two weeks for these experts to estimate accurately the bullion in New York alone. The mere mention of so large a sum of money excites in many minds an almost uncontrollable longing to possess it, but those who have in their souls the peace of God which passes understanding know they have a treasure a far larger sum would not purchase.

At the National Temperance Convention at Saratoga, N. Y., an important paper by Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, was read, dealing with the question, "Is the Law of God Prohibitory?" in which he answered the question affirmatively, grounding his arguments on the Ten Commandments. Human laws, Dr. Gordon contends, have been educating the people in the wrong direction in licensing the sale of liquor. If a man falls into a pit carelessly left open in a street and breaks a leg, he can sue the city and get pay therefor; but if a man is damaged in a licensed hall for the sale of liquor, legal reparation is denied him, although the city, by its license, is a legal partner in the business.

Interesting addresses were also delivered by Mr. J. B. Gough, Rev. J. O. Peck, and Miss Frances Willard. At the next day's session among the resolutions passed, was one which may be accepted as the Prohibition platform of the future. It asks Congress to prohibit and prevent in the District of Columbia and the Territories the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and to prohibit their importation into the United States; also to propose to the States an amendment to the constitution forbidding all making of and traffic in intoxicating beverages; advising the friends of temperance to make that the chief point in political action and organization; requiring total abstinence as a qualification for all office-holders, and to exact from all candidates for legislative positions pledges to support and urge the enactment of temperance measures.

A Warning to Intending Gold Seekers is sounded by a San Francisco journal. According to a statement it publishes, there are not less than 2,000 prospectors in the mountains of California at the present time. Most of them have been prospecting for ten or twenty years. They are all poor. With few exceptions they have been poor and "hard up" all the time. They do not average 50 cents a day the year round; and no men work harder, or more hours a day. They live on the coarsest and cheapest food, with no luxuries, and wear the cheapest of clothing. But they toil on month after month and year after year, hopefully and courageously, infatuated and driven forward with the belief that they will yet make their fortunes. If men would only search with the same patience and perseverance for the treasure in Heaven that faileth not, they would not be disappointed (Matt. 6: 19).

A Railroad Race for a Lost Bride Occurred a few days ago on the Union Pacific line. A newly married couple occupied seats in a Pullman car, and while the train halted at Sidney the bridegroom alighted, as he said, "to stretch his legs after the long ride." The train started sooner than he expected, and after running some distance in the hope that one of the conductors would see him and stop the train, he abandoned the pursuit on foot. But he knew his young bride would be alarmed by his absence, and having plenty of money with him, he clambered into the cab of a locomotive standing on a side track, made friends with the engineer, and induced him to get authority for a flying chase. Off they went at full speed, the pursuing husband shovelling in the coal. A stern chase ensued, for the other locomotive was making up lost time, but it was successful, for thirty-seven miles west of Sidney he regained possession of his wife. But for the fortunate circumstance of the unemployed locomotive being at hand the bridegroom might have suffered much annoyance from the results of his heedlessness. Worse calamities than that, however, often happen in families through the same fault, and too often Satan has carried off by temptation a loved child or relative while those who should have watched were negligent.

A Scare in a Liquor Store Occurred at Bangor, Maine, recently, which shows that even if the Maine law is evaded occasionally it has terrors for those who break it. A citizen on stepping into a shop to purchase a box of honey was astonished at the tumult which his appearance caused. Bottles and jugs were thrown out of the back windows, the air was filled with the noise of breaking glass, the odor of "old rye" and New-England rum assailed his nostrils, and general confusion reigned. At last the proprietor, ceasing from his labors, stepped forward and ordered his would-be customer to leave the premises forthwith. Much bewildered, the customer withdrew, and it was not until some time afterward that he remembered having once served on the special police force, and that he stopped to say good-morning to a constable just as he was entering the shop to make his innocent purchase.

FARM LABORERS.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. So then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase. Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labor. For we are laborers together with God: ye are God's husbandry."—1 COR. 3: 6–9.

IN all ages since the Fall there has been a tendency in the human heart to forget God, and get away from Him. Idolatry has been the sin of all nations, including God's favored people, the Jews, and including certain persons who call themselves Christians, and yet make idols out of crosses and images. This vicious principle of ignoring God, and setting up something between our minds and our Creator, crops up everywhere, in every department of thought.

In the instance of the church at Corinth, Paul found the brethren forgetting their God and Saviour in their high esteem for certain preachers. Instead of all saying, "We are Christ's disciples," and uniting together to promote the common cause, they made parties, and one said, "Paul who founded this church is to be had in the greatest reverence, and we are of Paul;" others replied, "But Apollos is more eloquent than the apostle, and by him we have been edified till we have gone beyond Paul, and therefore we are of Apollos;" while a third party declared that they were of no sect whatever, for they were "brethren," and were "of Christ." These last, I suspect, either ignored or denounced the other two parties, and would not commune with them, in order to testify against their sectarianism and to promote unity. I only surmise this from the conduct of those "brethren" who in our day take the Corinthians to be their model, and cut off everybody else, being more exclusive than any other sect in Christendom.

The Apostle warns the saints in Corinth against this: he brings the Lord before their minds, and bids them remember that if Paul plants and Apollos waters, still it is God that gives the increase. Since they think so highly of men, he will have it that "neither is he that planteth anything, nor he that watereth anything," but God that giveth the increase is everything.

I shall begin at the end of my text, because I find it to be the easiest way of mapping out my discourse. We shall first remark that the church is God's farm: "Ye are God's husbandry." In the margin of the revised version we read, "Ye are God's tilled ground," and that is the very expression for me. "Ye are God's tilled ground," or farm. After we have spoken of the farm we will next say a little upon the fact that He employs laborers on the farm; and when we have looked at the laborers—such poor fellows as they are—we will remember that God Himself is the great worker: "We are laborers together with God."

I. We begin by considering that

THE CHURCH IS GOD'S FARM.

The Lord has made the church of His sovereign choice to be His own by purchase, having paid for it a price immense. "The Lord's portion is His people; Jacob is the lot of His inheritance." Because the Lord's portion was under mortgage, therefore the only-begotten Son laid down His life as the purchase-price, and redeemed His people to be the Lord's portion forever and ever. Henceforth it is said to all believers, "Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price."

And now He has made it His by inclosure. It lay exposed aforetime as part of an open common, bare and barren, covered with thorns and thistles, and the haunt of every wild beast; for we were "by nature the children of wrath, even as others." We were part of the dreary desert till Divine foreknowledge surveyed the waste, and electing love marked out its portion with a full line of grace, and thus set us apart to be the Lord's own estate forever. In due time effectual grace came forth with power, and separated us from the rest of mankind, as fields are hedged and ditched to part them from the open heath. Hath not the Lord declared that He hath chosen His vineyard and fenced it?

The Lord has also made this farm evidently His own by cultivation. What more could He have done for His farm? He has totally changed the nature of the soil: from being barren He hath made it a fruitful land. He hath ploughed it, and digged it, and fattened it, and watered it, and planted it with all manner of flowers and fruits. It hath already brought forth to Him many a pleasant fruit, and there are brighter times to come, when angels shall shout the harvest home, and Christ "shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied."

This farm is kept what it is, as well as made what it is, by God's continual protection. Not only did He inclose it, and work upon it by His miraculous power, to make it His own farm, but He continually maintains possession of it. "I the Lord do keep it; I will water it every moment; lest any hurt it I will keep it night and day." If it were not for God's continual power her hedges would soon be thrown down, and wild beasts would devour her fields. Wicked hands are always trying to break down her walls and lay her waste again, so that there should be no true church in the world; but the Lord is jealous for His land, and will not allow it to be destroyed.

Inasmuch as the church is God's own farm, He expects to receive a harvest from it. He comes to us looking for sheaves, where He has sowed so plentifully. The world is waste, and He looks for nothing from it; but we are tilled land, and therefore from us. Ought not the Lord to have a narvest of obedience, a harvest of holiness, a harvest of usefulness, a harvest of praise? Shall it not be so? I think some churches forget that an increase is expected from every field of the Lord's farm, for they never have a harvest or even look for one. The people come together and take their seats on a Sunday and listen to sermons—that is, when they do not go to sleep; the sacraments are celebrated, a little money is contributed, a few poor folk are relieved, and affairs crawl along at a snail's pace. As to affecting the whole village, or endeavoring to bring the surrounding population to Christ, I do not think it has occurred to some churches to attempt it; and when certain warmer spirits seek to bring sinners to Jesus the older and more prudent folks fetch wet blankets, and use them with very great effect, so that every sign of enthusiasm is damped down. Brethren, such things ought not to be. Farmers do not plough their lands or sow their fields for amusement; they mean business, and plough and sow because they desire a harvest. If this fact could but enter into the pates of some professors, surely they would look at things in a different light. But of late it has seemed as if we thought that God's church was not expected to produce anything, but existed for her own comfort and personal benefit. Brethren, it must not be so.

See, then, the injustice of allowing any of the laborers to call even a part of the estate his own. When a great man has a large farm of his own, what would he think if Hodge the ploughman should say, "Look here, I plough this farm, and therefore it is mine: I shall call this field Hodge's Acres"? "No," says Hobbs, "I reaped that land last harvest, and therefore it is mine, and I shall call it Hobbs's Field." What if all the other laborers became Hodgeites and Hobbsites, and so parcelled out the farm among them, I think the landlord would soon eject the lot of them. The farm belongs to its owner, and let it be called by his name; but it is absurd to call it by the names of the bumpkins who labor upon it. Is that a disrespectful title to apply to laborers? Why, I meant it for anybody and everybody whose name is used as the head of a party in the church. I meant Luther, Calvin, Wesley, and other great men, for at their best as compared with their Master they are only farm laborers, and we ought not to call parts of the farm by their names. Remember how Paul put it, "Who then is Paul and who is Apollos?" "Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?" The entire church belongs to Him who has chosen it in His sovereignty, bought it with His blood, fenced it by His grace, cultivated it by His wisdom, and preserved it by His power.

II. We have now to notice, as our second head, that

THE GREAT HUSBANDMAN EMPLOYS LABORERS.

By human agency God ordinarily works out His designs. He can, if He pleases, by His Holy Spirit, get directly at the hearts of men, but that is His business, and not ours; we have to do with such words as these: "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." The Master's commission is not, "Sit still, and see the Spirit of God convert the nations"; but, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." This is God's method in supplying the race with food.

Labor develops our spiritual muscle and keeps us in health. "Unto me," says Paul, "who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ." It is a grace, then. We find it to be a means of grace to our souls to preach the Gospel. I have heard it said, and I believe there is some truth in it, that those who have to preach are under the temptation of getting so familiar with sacred things that they cease to feel their power. If this be true it is an awful proof of our total depravity, for the more familiar we are with holy things the more we ought to be affected by them; and this I know, it has been the greatest means of grace to me to be bound by my office to study the Scriptures, and wait upon God for help in expounding them.

Some of you who do not grow in grace by hearing other people might possibly get on better if you were yourselves to try and preach: at any rate you might not be quite so fault-finding with other folks. When I hear a person say, "I cannot hear my minister," I suggest to him to buy a horn. "Oh," he says, "I do not mean that. I mean that I cannot enjoy his preaching." Then I say to him, "Preach yourself." "I cannot do that." "Then do not find fault with those who are doing their best." Instead of blaming the ploughman, just try a turn in the furrow yourself. Why grumble at the weeds? Take a hoe, and work at them like a man. Do you think the hedges untidy? Put on the leather gloves, and help us trim them.

The laborers employed by God are all

OCCUPIED UPON NEEDFUL WORK.

Notice, "I have planted, Apollos watered." Who beat the big drum, or blew his own trumpet. Nobody. On God's farm none are kept for ornamental purposes. I have read some sermons which could only have been meant for show, for there was not a grain of Gospel in them. They were ploughs with the share left out, drills with no wheat in the box, clod-crushers made of butter. I do not believe that our God will ever pay wages to men who only walk about His grounds to show themselves. Fine orators who display their eloquence are more like gypsies who stray on the farm to pick up chickens than honest laborers who work to bring forth a crop for their master.

When you and I preach or teach it will be well if we say to ourselves, "What will be the use of what I am going to do? I am about to teach a difficult subject: will it do any good? I have chosen an abstruse point of theology: will it serve any purpose?" Brethren, a laborer may work very hard at a whim of his own and waste his labor, but this is folly. Some discourses do little more than show the difference between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee, and what is the use of that? Suppose we sow the fields with sawdust, or sprinkle them with rosewater, what of that? Will God bless our moral essays, and fine compositions, and pretty passages?

Brethren, we must aim at usefulness; we must as laborers together with God be occupied with something that is worth doing. "I," says one, "have planted;" it is well, for planting must be done. "I," answers another, "have watered;" that also is good and necessary. See to it that ye can each bring in a solid report, but let no man be content with the mere child's play of oratory, or the getting up of entertainments and such like.

On the Lord's farm there is a

DIVISION OF LABOR.

Even Paul did not say, "I have planted and watered." No, Paul planted. And Apollos certainly could not say, "I have planted as well as watered." No, it was enough for him to attend to the watering. No one man has all gifts. How foolish, then, are they who say, "I enjoy So-and-so's ministry because he edifies the saints in doctrine, but when he was away the other Sunday I could not profit by the preacher because he was all for the conversion of sinners." Yes, he was planting; you have been planted a good while, and do not need planting again, but you ought to be thankful that others were made partakers of the benefit.

One soweth and another reapeth, and therefore instead of grumbling at the honest ploughman because he did not bring a sickle with him, you ought to have prayed for him that he might have strength to plough deep and break up hard hearts. Let us do all that we can, and try to do more, for the more work we can turn our hands to the better. "You must not have too many irons in the fire," said somebody. But I say, Put all the irons into the fire, and if you have not fire enough, cry to God till you have; set your whole soul on fire, and keep all your irons hot. Yet you may find it wise to direct your strength into one line of things which you understand, so that by practice you may come to be skilful in it. Each man should find out his own work, and do it with his might.

Observe that, on God's farm, there is unity of purpose among the laborers. Read the text. "Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one." One Master has employed them, and though He may send them out at different times, and to different parts of the farm, yet they are all one in being used for one end, to work for one harvest. In England we do not understand what is meant by watering, because the farmer could not water all his farm; but in the East a farmer waters almost every inch of ground. He would have no crop if he did not use all means for irrigating the fields. If you have ever been in Italy, Egypt or Palestine, you will have seen a complete system of wells, pumps, wheels, buckets, channels, little streamlets, pipes, and so on, by which the water is carried all over the garden to every plant, otherwise in the extreme heat of the sun it would be dried up.

Planting needs wisdom, watering needs quite as much, and the piecing of these two works together needs that the laborers should be of one mind. It is a bad thing when laborers are at cross purposes and work against each other, and this evil is worse in the church than anywhere else. How can I plant with success if my helper will not water what I have planted; or what is the use of my watering if nothing is planted. Husbandry is spoiled when foolish people undertake it, and quarrel over it, for from sowing to reaping the work is one, and all must be done to one end. O for unity! Let us pull together all our days, even as we have done in this church hitherto.

We are called upon to notice in our text that all the laborers put together are nothing at all. "Neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth." All God's laborers must go to Him for their seed, or else they will scatter tares. All good seed comes out of God's granary. If we preach, it must be the true word of God or nothing can come of it. More than that, all the strength that is in the laborer's arm to sow the heavenly seed must be given by His Master. We cannot preach except God be with us. A sermon is vain talk and dreary word-spinning unless the Holy Spirit enlivens it. He must give us both the preparation of the heart and the answer of the tongue, or we shall be like unto men who sow the wind.

When the good seed is sown the whole success of it rests with God. If He withhold the dew and the rain the seed will never rise from the ground; and unless he shall shine upon it the green ear will never ripen. The human heart will remain barren even though Paul himself should preach, unless God the Holy Ghost shall work with Paul and bless the word to those that hear it. Therefore, since the increase is of God alone, put the laborers into their place. Do not make too much of us, for we are unprofitable servants.

Yet, though inspiration calls the laborers nothing, it makes a great deal of them, for it says, "Every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labor." They are nothing, and yet as if they were something. God works our good works in us, and then rewards us for them. Here we have mention of a personal service and a personal reward: "Every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labor." The reward is proportionate, not to the success, but to the labor. Many discouraged workers may be comforted with that expression. You are not to be paid by results, but by endeavors. You may have a stiff bit of clay to plough, or a dreary plot of land to sow, where stones, and birds, and thorns, and travellers, and a burning sun may all be leagued against the seed, but you are not accountable for these things; your reward shall be according to your labor.

Some put a great deal of labor into a little field, and make much out of it. Others use a great deal of labor throughout a long life, and yet they see but small result, for it is written, "One soweth and another reapeth;" but the reaping man will not get all the reward, the sowing man shall receive his portion of the joy. The laborers are nobodies, but they shall enter into the joy of their Lord.

Unitedly, according to the text, the workers have been successful, and that is a great part of their reward. "I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase." Frequently brethren say in their prayers, "A Paul may plant, an Apollos may water, but it is all in vain unless God gives the increase." This is quite true, but another truth is too much overlooked, namely, that when Paul plants and Apollos waters God does give the increase. We do not labor in vain. There would be no increase without God, but then we are not without God: when such men as Paul and Apollos plant and water there is sure to be an increase; they are the right kind of laborers, they work in a right spirit, and God is certain to bless them. This is a great part of the laborers' wages.

I am rich, I am increased in goods, I have need of nothing when I see souls converted; my heart leaps for joy; my spirit is glad, and I am ready to sing, "My soul doth magnify the Lord;" but if it were ever to come to this, that I stood here Sunday after Sunday and saw no conversions, and the church rather going down than increasing, I should take it as an intimation that I had better take my plough somewhere else and scatter my seed on other soil. I would break my heart over non-success, or cry to God to break it, for he that worketh and getteth no fruit is disheartened in his labor.

What would you farmers do? You are half inclined to give up now, because you have had two or three bad years; but what would you do if you never saw a harvest at all? Why, you would clear out and be off to the western prairies or to the bush of the southern continent, to see if the soil somewhere else would repay your labor. Do the same, brother ministers! If you have been at work in one spot for years, and have not led souls to Jesus, pack up your traps and go somewhere else. Do not forever break your plough upon rocks. It is a big world, and there is plenty of good ground somewhere, let us seek it. If they persecute you in one city, flee to another, and let the word of God be published all the more widely by your moving about.

III. So much upon the laborers. Now for the main point again.

GOD HIMSELF IS THE GREAT WORKER.

He may use what laborers He pleases, but the increase comes alone from Him. Brethren, you know it is so in natural things: the most skilful farmer cannot make the wheat germinate, and grow, and ripen. He cannot even preserve a single field till harvest time, for the farmer's enemies are many and mighty. In husbandry there's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip; and when the farmer thinks, good easy man, that he shall reap his crop, there are blights and mildews lingering about to rob him of his gains. God must give the increase.

God gives the increase in the barn and the hayrick; and in the spiritual farm it is even more so, for what can man do in this business? If any of you think that it is an easy thing to win a soul, I would like you to try. Suppose that without Divine aid you should try to save a soul—you might as well attempt to make a world. Why, you cannot create a fly; how can you create a new heart and a right spirit? Regeneration is a great mystery; it is out of your reach. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." What can you and I do in this matter? it is out of our pale, and beyond our line. We can tell out the truth of God, but to apply that truth to the heart and conscience is quite another thing. I have stood here and preached Jesus Christ, preached my whole heart out, and yet I know that I have never produced any saving effect upon a single unregenerate man unless the spirit of God has taken the truth, and opened the heart, and placed the living seed within it. Experience teaches us this.

What is the effect of all this upon your minds? Briefly I would draw certain out of this important truth: the first is, if the whole farm of the church belongs exclusively to the great Master Worker, and the laborers are worth nothing without Him, let this promote unity among all whom He employs. If we are all under one Master, do not let us quarrel. It is a great pity when ministers harshly criticise one another, and when Sunday-school teachers do the same. It is a miserable business when we cannot bear to see good being done by those of a different denomination who work in ways of their own.

If a new laborer comes on the farm, and he wears a coat of a new cut, and uses a hoe of a new shape, shall I become his enemy? If he does his work better than I do mine, shall I be jealous? Do you not remember reading in the Scriptures that, upon one occasion, the disciples could not cast out a devil? This ought to have made them humble; but to our surprise we read a few verses further on that John and others saw one casting out devils in Christ's name, and John says, "We forbade him, because he followeth not with us." They could not cast out the devil themselves, and they forbade those who could.

A certain band of people are going about winning souls, but because they are not doing it in our fashion, we do not like it. It is true they use all sorts of strange devices and wild excitements, but they do save souls, and that is the main point. Yet there are gentlemen who never converted half a soul in their lives who cry, "This is fanaticism." Go and do better before you find fault. Instead of cavilling, let us encourage all on Christ's side. Wisdom is justified of her children. The laborers ought to be satisfied with the new ploughman if his master is so.

Brother, if the great Lord has employed you, it is no business of mine to question His right. I do not like the look of you, and cannot think how He can have such a fellow upon the farm; but as He has employed you I have no right to judge you, for I dare say I look as queer in your eyes as you do in mine. Can I lend you a hand? Can I show you how to work better? Or can you tell me something so that I may do my work better? May not the Master employ whom he pleases?

This truth, however, ought to keep all the laborers very dependent. Are you going to preach, young man? "Yes, I am going to do a great deal of good." Are you? Have you forgotten that you are nothing? "Neither is he that planteth anything." A divine is coming brimful of the Gospel to comfort the saints. If he is not coming in strict dependence upon God, he, too, is nothing. "Neither is he that watereth anything." Power belongeth unto God. Man is vanity, and his words are wind; to God alone belongeth power and wisdom. If we keep our places in all lowliness our Lord will use us; but when we exalt ourselves he will leave us to our nothingness.

Next notice that this fact ennobles everybody who labors in God's husbandry. God is with you, brother; God is with you, sister, when you are serving Him with all your heart. Speaking to your class concerning Jesus, it is God that speaks to you; picking up that stranger on the way, and telling him of salvation by faith, Christ is speaking with you even as He spoke with the woman at the well; addressing the rough crowd in the open air, young man, if you are preaching of pardon through the atoning blood, it is the God of Peter who is testifying of His Son, even as He did on the day of Pentecost. O brother laborers, ours is a high honor, since the Father is with us and works by us.

But, lastly, how this should drive us to our knees. Since we are nothing without God, let us cry mightily unto Him for help in this our holy service. Let both sower and reaper pray together, or they will never rejoice together. As a church God has blessed us so richly, that in generations to come it will be spoken of as a wonder that God should so greatly favor a congregation for so many years; but it has been wholly and alone in answer to prayer. So far from supposing that our union and prosperity are in any measure due to me, I protest that the sole cause of all the soul-winning that has been done is to be found in prayer.

God in great mercy has given the spirit of prayer to you and to others who love me, and hence I am highly favored. I am terribly afraid lest this prayerfulness should be damped down: I am jealous lest you should begin to think the preacher is something, and so should fail to pray for him. There is a thinner congregation when I am away, and therefore I am afraid that you have some reliance upon me, and do not expect a blessing if I am absent. Is it so? Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect in the flesh?

HAVE YOU BEGUN TO BE OF SPURGEON?

This will never do. Brothers, this will never do. We must get rid of the tendency before it grows upon us. God can bless one man as well as another. I do not know that He always does do so, but He can; and perhaps if you expected Him to do so He would do so. If you came up to this house with the same prayerfulness for others as you apportion me, you would get the same blessing. I am weakest of the weak apart from God, therefore pray for me; but others are weak too, therefore pray for them also.

Do let us pray mightily for a blessing. Pray always. Pray in your bed-chambers, at your family altars, at your work, and in your leisure, and also in this place. Come in larger numbers to pray for a blessing. We have many appointed prayer-meetings; keep them all flourishing. The windows of heaven are easily opened if our mouths and hearts are opened in prayer. If the blessing be withheld, it is because we do not cry for it and expect it. O brother laborers, come to the mercy-seat, and ye shall see God's farm watered from on high, and tilled with divine skill, and the reapers shall soon return from the fields bringing their sheaves with them, though, perhaps, they went forth weeping to the sowing. To our Father, who is the Husbandman, be all glory, forever and ever. Amen.

THE OSTRICH DECOY.

AMONG the reminiscences of African life with which Dr. Moffat entertains his friends, is a description of the ingenious device by which the bushman captures the ostrich. The birds are exceedingly difficult to entrap, and though their splendid feathers are greatly in demand in the cities of civilized lands, and the bushmen are therefore encouraged to engage in the pursuit of ostrich catching, they do not succeed unless they have an almost inexhaustible store of patience and skill. The African ostrich is of a different species from that of South America—is the largest of all birds—a full-grown ostrich being from six to eight feet in height, and weighing some two hundred and fifty pounds.

The above illustration shows the method by which the natives of Kaffir-land, Namaqua-land, and other tribes of South Africa approach the game they desire to secure. A kind of flat double cushion is stuffed with straw, and formed something like a saddle. It is then covered over with feathers, except the under part, and made so as to resemble the bird. The neck and head of an ostrich are stuffed, and a small rod introduced. The bushman intending to attack the game whitens his legs with any substance he can procure. He places the feathered saddle on his shoulders, takes the bottom part of the neck in his right hand, and his bow and poisoned arrows in his left. This human bird appears to pick away at the verdure, shakes his feathers, walks and trots till he gets within bow-shot; and when the flock runs from one receiving an arrow, he runs too, in hope of having opportunity to kill other birds in the flock. The ostrich is twice mentioned in the Bible: once on account of the beauty of its plumage (Job 39 : 13), and again because of its cruelty (Lamentations 4 : 3).

"RAGS" and "Tubby" will go up to the stables, when they leave this comfortable room, and will find rest there among the chaff—if they can get in. "Ginger" will very likely find his bed on top of one of the vans, if no policeman is near. "Jumbo" and "Raspberry" will go to the lodging-house, if the necessary money has been earned. There are two or three others about whose dwelling-places I am uncertain; perhaps they may have to walk the streets all night, moved on by the policeman from time to time. I begin to say "Good-night" first to those that I know have a home to go to. I feel bolder with these. I have said several "Good-nights;" but nevertheless the room does not seem a bit more empty and no one has left.

I am, however, up to their ways now, and the secret is this—directly "Good night," is said to them they walk off, and you fancy they are going out of the room, but instead of going they turn back after passing me, and once more mix with the others, so that in another minute the same lads are to be seen again, some of them even comfortably seated round the fire. This sort of thing goes on for perhaps five minutes, and then one by one they really make up their minds to go. "Good night, Missus H——." "Good night." "Is there class to-morrow?" "Shall we come to-morrow night?" and they are gone for to-night.

The foregoing is just one specimen of our lads' winter evenings here. They vary a good deal in character. Sometimes we have a Bible-class, another time a singing-class, and another no formal class at all, but simply chats among the boys and a few hymns sung, being guided by circumstances and by the character of the boys present.

Sunday afternoon and evening are devoted to Bible-reading, sacred song, and addresses from friends who have taken a deep interest in them, and the meetings are then held in a little mission-room close at hand.

I should like now to introduce to the reader, individually, a few of the lads and their ways. And we must begin with "Rags" and "Jumbo." These two were always to be seen first at the meetings last winter; seated one on each side of the fireplace, and crouching toward it, passing occasional remarks, showing that they highly appreciated that quiet and warm shelter after their day's struggles for bread in the cold outside.

is now about sixteen years of age. When I first knew him he told me that he had neither father nor mother. This was not true; but, unhappily, untruthfulness seems as natural as breathing to most of this class of boys. On finding out the real state of the case I spoke seriously to him, and begged of him to return to his father and mother.

"I will go with you," I said, "and will speak to them."

"No, I ain't a goin' home, mum; if father's there he'll only rage and knock me about. I ain't a goin'."

Before long I made another attempt at reconciliation. I went to see "Rags'" parents, and this time I induced "Rags" to accompany me, on condition that when I got into the house, I would let him know whether his father were in or not. If his father should be out, he was willing to go in and see his mother.

I knocked at the door. A woman opened it. "Am I speaking to Mrs. G——?" "No, ma'am, she is ill in bed." I gave my message for the invalid, and was soon told that she would like to see me. I beckoned to "Rags," who had been standing at the other end of the court, to come in with me, and told him to remain downstairs while I talked to his mother. I then followed my guide up a narrow and almost perpendicular staircase to the room where the poor woman lay ill in bed. On first entering, I was puzzled in my mind as to where I should stand; for, what with four or five half-clad little children, who looked also half-starved, a bed—such as it was, alas! an old shaky stool, and an equally shaky something like a table, the room appeared already nearly as full as it could be. I told Mrs. G—— what I had to say; then I added "Would you not like to see your boy?" "Is he here?" she said. "Yes, he is downstairs; but will you promise me not to be angry with him?" She promised, and I called to "Rags."

He came up the stairs very slowly, and when he entered the room his face betrayed a good deal of emotion, which had its full vent when his mother put her arms round his neck and kissed him. And now, seeing them both in tears, I began to realize the existence of an unpleasant lump in my own throat, which completely mastered me. "You see, mum," the mother said, between her sobs, "he has been a very naughty boy, and he's afraid of his father, but he's really not a bad boy to his mother." After some conversation with her, I promised to call on her again in a day or two, which I did, and found that meanwhile the father had been taken to prison for fighting.

"Rags," I thought, would now be able to stay at home while his father was away, and I was consoling myself with the idea that he had again a roof over him and some sort of protection at night, at least awhile, when his prolonged absence from the class made me anxious about him, and on inquiring, I was told that he was again sleeping out at night. I went round to his old quarters the following day, and there I found him again, as dirty and as ragged as ever, with his old fixed expression of hopeless resignation. "Why are you here again, my poor boy?" "Wal, you see, mum, it wur no use me a stayin' there, an father a'comin' home to leather me about; besides, there ain't no room there for me to sleep, an it's as warm up at the stables as 'tis on the floor in the house."

A DANGER SIGNAL.

"Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth."—James 5 : 19.

A Wonderful Conversion—II. The Danger of Moral Error—The Deadliest Heresy—The Backslider's Past, Present, and Future.

IT is a marvellous thing how the conversion of the soul brightens up the understanding, a marvellous thing how much the conversion of a man's soul has to do with the correctness of a man's theology; as if the regenerating Spirit mercifully took the clouds from the eyes and the vail from the heart together.

A WONDERFUL CONVERSION.

I have known a man whose dwelling was on the shores of a lovely lake, under the shadow of a beetling hill, in one of the most secluded and beautiful parts of our island-home. The preachers of the Gospel had failed to penetrate to the spot. The man's only teachers had been the heirloom of an old family Bible and God as His own interpreter; but the Holy Spirit arrested that man, and under the arching skies he was convinced of sin, and beneath the shade of the brown woods he wrestled for pardon and obtained it, and walked in the conscious light of God's countenance for years before he knew that there was another man upon the earth of similar experience, consciously happy in the Saviour's love. And when, in the long after-time the truth was carried into that pleasant vale, the man was found to have a correct creed as well as a consistent life. He had sat at the feet of Jesus; he had heard many sermons on the mount; the Spirit had come and interpreted to him the inner life of the uttered Word of God; and he had an accurate acquaintance with those lifesome Gospel truths which only needed to be arranged and classified to blossom out into a correct and beautiful system of theology.

Try this experiment for yourself. Submit yourselves wholly unto God; cry penitently for the forgiveness of your sins; be justified by faith, and have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, and the truth shall be its own witness. Ascending into a region higher and sublimer than reason knows, you shall have the witness, the consciousness, and the satisfying feeling of the faith which reason cannot compass, and your triumphant answer to every cavil and to every compromise shall be in the words of Scripture—"He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself."

II. And then, secondly, there is danger, not only of intellectual, but of moral error. This is, I need not remind you, more imminent and more disastrous than the other. It is quite possible to hold erroneous opinions in connection with a large charity. Wood, hay, and stubble are sometimes built up as clumsy materials on the true foundation; but where the danger is not intellectual, but moral, there is of necessity present alienation from God and the prospect of perpetual exile from the glory of His power.

Heresy is not a trifling thing; it is to be resisted and deplored; but is sin, and there is danger in a world where every influence is a temptation, and where every passion is a tempter. There is danger of this error, too, in the times in which we live. We need not remind you that we brought into the world a sinful nature, that we are all by practice sinners against God, and that if we have not been subjected to the transforming influence of the Holy Spirit, through the mercy of the Mighty Redeemer, we are in a state of wrath and condemnation now. But the special allusion of the apostle is to a darker experience than this; to one who had known the truth, who had walked in the truth, but who had forsaken it and gone astray—a poor backslider.

Oh! their danger, their sad loneliness, their terrible dishonor, the heaviness of their impending doom—what image can fitly represent or portray! A discrowned monarch, an emperor in exile; one deserted in his utmost need by those his former bounty fed; a prodigal starveling at the very door of the house from which his vices have excluded him; Dives fallen from his high estate, a mendicant at the threshold of his former mansion, the sores of his poverty licked by the dogs of Israel; honor in disgrace and in imprisonment; royalty in rags—all that fancy can conceive in contrast with former and forfeited joy—all are poor to set forth the condition of that sad backslider, who drowns thought in desperation, who shudders at the voice of memory, who smiles out of the faded flowers of his heart, and rings out a hollow laughter that is infinitely more terrible than tears. Oh! there is no spectacle so mournful on this side the place of doom!

His past and present—how different! His past!—when the candle of the Lord shone brightly in his tabernacle; when his heart was warm in the activities of religious enterprize and his feet swift upon the errand of mercy, when the ear blessed the sound of his name, and the troubled thanked God for him in the midst of their troubles; when he was mighty in the Scriptures; when he was powerful in prayer; when the Bible and the Sabbath, and the temple, and the fellowship of saints were his chief happiness and delight; when the morning rose upon a spirit full of sunshine, and the evening closed upon a spirit full of song! His past! How the recollection of it haunts him! What spasms of remorseful memory attend the very mention of its name!

But his present! How awful his relapse! How bitter his derision! How censorious his spirit! He, sitting in the seat of the scorner, and reviling the ordinances which he once attended! He, running riot with the prodigal to the exhaustion of his portion of good! He, reeling from the drunkard's haunt or from the libertine's sty—he, once a thankful, happy, humble child of God! His past and his present!—who but must weep at the difference? But his future!—

OH! HIS FUTURE

—if he be not recalled by the true grace of God! Take that into your account, and then of all the blackened masses which the fire ever consumed, or which the lightning ever blasted, there is nothing in the universe of God so appalling as that! My brethren, for whose salvation I long in the spirit of Jesus, how is it with you? I press upon your consciences now the solemn words.

It may be that there are some wanderers here who have straggled into the sanctuary on this occasion led by the glare of some "light of other days;" some, perhaps, who have gone quite away—who have put the Saviour to an open shame—who have gone greedily in the way of Balaam for reward; some, perhaps, who are backsliders in heart, who hold loosely to the fellowship of the saints, but have not yet severed the tie; some who have never known the power of the love which bought them, but all, in their various conditions, erring from the truth.

I bring your condition thus plainly before you. You are in danger; often warned, often entreated, often besought, and by the intercession of the Crucified, who cried, "Spare!" when the sword was unsheathed, brought into the sanctuary of God once again to listen to one warning more—oh! take it. I beseech you take it. Do not regard what I am saying as the fulfilment of a merely professional duty. Nothing can possibly exceed the solemnity of the moment at which we are gathered now. It may be the crisis of your fate; the destinies of the everlasting may hang upon the decisions of the Now. As one who has felt your peril, and with my whole soul thrown into my words, I beseech you turn from a course which can only end in the perdition of hell.

Once more I offer you the Gospel of the ever-blessed God; will you accept its glad tidings, and its rich provisions as your own? "Without money and without price" everlasting salvation is pressed upon you. Christ Himself asks you to come to Him—to come to Him now. Who will not thankfully respond? Oh! do not, do not, I beseech you, put away from you an invitation so freely and so graciously given. I tell you, in God's merciful name, there is not one of you that need be lost. I tell you, too, that there is no other name under heaven given among men than the name of Jesus Christ by which we can be saved.

May God help you to believe on that name, for His glory's sake. Amen.

ANECDOTES.

Related at the May Meetings in London.

AT the recent annual meeting of the London Missionary Society, in addition to the anecdotes and incidents which have already appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the following was related by the Rev. Evan Bryant, a successful preacher of the Gospel in the neighborhood of Hankow, China.

A DULL FACE BRIGHTENED.

A young man of twenty-three years of age had been a convert several years. He had often heard us pray and preach about light divine, and felt that he should like to enjoy that light. Instead of coming to us missionaries or to the native preachers, he one night went on his knees in prayer about ten o'clock at night to seek that light. He prayed on till four in the morning, yet it was dark. He remained on his knees still praying for light, until about six o'clock; and when the sun was shining in the east, he got up from his knees and said, "Jesus has given me light." He was filled with an influx of light from Heaven, having prayed for it the whole night long. I heard that young man in one of our church meetings declaring that fact; and to see and hear him was quite enough to convince me of the genuineness of the fact.

The Rev. Burman Cassin, at the close of a powerful speech, related the thrilling story of

JANE CONQUEST'S SELF-SACRIFICING LOVE.

She was one day in her little sea-village home, tending what appeared to be a dying child. All the fishermen had gone to bed, and she was bending with a mother's love over the little cot in which the dying child lay. As she was so occupied his face appeared to be lighted up with a red glow which came from the window. She looked round to see what it was, and she found that there was a ship on fire. The woman's husband, who was a sailor, had not been heard of for some time, and it was supposed by every one that the ship in which he had gone out had foundered. There then came into the mind of this noble woman a struggle. "What should I do?" she said to herself. "What is my duty—to stop by the side of the child or to see if I can save the burning ship?" A mother's heart told her to stop with the child, but a greater than a mother's heart told her to go to the old church upon the top of the hill, to find her way into the belfry and

RING THE BELL AND ROUSE THE FISHERMEN.

So, giving the child a parting kiss and shutting the door, this woman, in the middle of the night, went to the church; she found the door shut, but a window was partly open, and she crept through it and got up to the belfry. With her feeble arms she began to ring the bell, and as the sound went through the village, the seafaring men were aroused; they saw the burning ship, they went to it in their boats, and every one on board the ship was saved, her own husband being among them.

WHAT A SCENE

was presented in that cottage! Jane was brought there in a fainting state, her husband was in a fainting state on the other side of the room, and the little dying child in the midst. After a time her husband revived, and then looked at his wife and saw that she was in a swoon. They waited, and after a little time she also revived. Then those who were present saw that a change had taken place in the child—the crisis was past, the little child lived; the husband and wife were clasped in each other's arms, and the woman's self-sacrificing love was rewarded as only God can reward it.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Robson's Death Causes General Mourning—The Funeral—Reminiscences of the Dead Christian—Michael and Hutton in Conference—They Receive Good News—Plans for Rebuilding the Shed—A Visit to Aleth's Sick-Room.

THE cottage mothers wept and sobbed and wrung their hands. The men stood in every doorway, their heads uncovered, as, a few hours later, Robson's mangled body, covered from view, was carried through the little streets. It was a piteous sight.

"Many a time," said one, "he's come to my door to get the rent. But I never wanted to see his back. 'Twas always, 'Come in, and welcome, sir!'"

"He was kind and good!" said another.

"He fell at his post!" said a third.

One young girl was seen watching the procession. As she stood on the white pavement, over which their long shadows streamed, she spoke with some of the passers-by. Sobbing, poor Margaret told how by six o'clock that morning she had visited the tiny lodging which, for the sake of his work, he usually inhabited very near the town during a part of the week. Entering the little room in which he was taking his breakfast, she had found him deeply immersed in the pages of a small Testament that lay open before him.

"Margaret!" he had said, putting his finger to his lips, that he might postpone her message until he had given his higher and holier one; "Margaret! 'Here we have no continuing city; but we seek one to come!' Can you say that? Is that matter settled with you?"

His fatherly manner, and gentle, cheerful voice, with the ever-ready smile that so plainly bespoke a heart at peace with God and man, had always so completely disarmed opposition from the utterance of his simple message, that a common saying among his country neighbors used to be:

"He's the best parson! for he don't want no written sermons. He's always got the good word uppermost."

A long procession of willing mourners followed him to an open grave, beneath the spreading trees of an old churchyard. There his remains were laid to rest, "in hope of a glorious resurrection."

Bitter tears and mournful laments testified to his well-deserved popularity, while confessions and acknowledgments on every hand added their testimony to his true life-work, and proved his truest monument. "Being dead, he yet speaketh."

The blank felt in the town of Shenstone, after Robson's death, was very great. Those who before had called him "one of your stuck-up religious sort," and had apparently spurned his voice, now quoted many a sentence he had said, and spoke of him as their "best friend." He left behind him no reproaches, no dark sayings, no black comments, no sinister whispers. The track of light that followed him was clear and unmistakable. He had served his Master, he had served his fellow-man, and had passed into the brightness of glory to serve for ever more.

Service and rest were the united secret his heart had learned. With a wonderful grasp of intellect, as well as of faith, he had accepted the greatness of this twofold life, this gift from a Father's hand. Having penetrated the mystery, he drank in its joys, and traded with its delights. While many were complaining of a life overdone with labor, he accomplished far more than most who knew him; but all in so easy, pleasant, effortless a manner, that it was palpable to all who cared to consider him, that he had some strange unseen support throughout the whole. The name of Jesus in his heart and on his lips, its fragrance never left him, but was shed abroad, so that the sweet savors of a consecrated life, rare in its brightness, and precious in its unending perfume, "filled" not only the "house where they were sitting," but the little town where he dwelt.

The little group of working-men who had been his chosen friends, with whom he had prayed and labored and searched the Scriptures, they smarted beneath the bereavement most. His weeping family found comfort from their prayers and sympathy.

As Michael and Hutton walked together one night, lamenting, in joint recountal their various common sorrows of the past year, to a Higher vision, they may not have seemed unlike the disciples who walked to Emmaus, their countenances very sad. The dispensations that had visited them were very mysterious. The strong opposition to their simple gatherings manifested by the rector and nearly all his congregation; the destruction by fire of the humble resort where they had been wont to pray; and now the terrible and sudden death of their beloved friend, whose cheering presence had ever been their delight and joy—these were the dark spots they sadly lamented.

As they walked to-night, they received neither scoffs nor jeers. Their townsmen—even the saloon frequenters, hitherto their bitter foes—now felt they had sustained a loss, and their respect for sorrow silenced them. Though work was over, the faint daylight had not forsaken them. It was an hour yet to the time when the feeble glimmer of gaslights would begin to sparkle out in thread-like lines beside the narrow pavements.

Their discourse was interrupted by a boyish voice:

"I say—are you—Michael Bateman? Oh!—I'm out of breath—I've run ever so far!—my sister—wants you."

Bateman and Hutton simultaneously raised their hands to their hats. It was "Master Robert Fennecker," familiarly called by his relatives and companions, "Bob." He was flushed and panting, his hair rough, his cap on the back of his head, but the merry twinkle that never forsook his bright blue eyes was still there.

"Look!" he said, "there she is; there's my sister behind you."

They instantly turned back to meet the young lady, who, by her own devotion, had now become their friend. The trio evidently had some interests in common, or their attention would not have been so absorbed, nor would it have continued until, having reached the gate of Ferncroft, Etta put her hand on the bell, and they all three entered the garden walk, being received in full welcome at the open door by Mrs. Clemence, who had seen them turn in, and guessed full well what it was all about.

"Come in!" she said. "I have been expecting all day to see you." This was to Etta.

To the men she said,

"You are just in time to have some tea. You know your way. There that door."

"You are very hospitable!" said Etta, accompanying Mrs. Clemence into the cheerful little drawing-room, gay with flowers, and ensconcing herself on a sofa.

"I do like to have the Lord's people in my house!" she said. "It is the next thing to having Himself. Indeed it is having Himself," she added, turning to Etta, whose eyes had filled with unbidden tears. "You bring Him with you to me, darling! indeed you do. And as for those Christian working-men! why, the Lord was exactly like them once. Poor, and weary, His hand hard with toil, His feet weary with undertaking our errands. I look at them with quite a romantic feeling!" she exclaimed, smiling.

"I never quite thought of them in that light before," said Etta. "But it is perfectly true; and better ones, at any rate, than those long, melancholy, meaningless faces, so inanimate, and so paltry, that one sees everywhere exhibited. The Scripture pictures of that sacred, glorious One, whose 'face was marred more than any man,' and who 'had no beauty that we should desire Him,' shows us at the same time a glorious spiritual beauty that no painting can give. How false all those things look when once we have seen Him by faith! and have begun to know Him personally."

"You are in the right school, dear!" said Mrs. Clemence, "and learning very fast. No Teacher but One could have shown you such lessons as these."

In a little while the conclave was held. It consisted of a council of four, even Mr. Clemence having been summoned from his study for the occasion. To the assembled trio Etta once more propounded the facts with which we are already acquainted.

Now nothing lay before them all but the practical part of the long-cherished scheme. The two good men could scarcely at first realize or believe the blessing that lay in prospect for themselves and for their little town.

"It seems too good to be true," said Hutton.

"You see, God was working for us all the time, when we didn't know it, no more than a new-born babe!" said old Mike rapturously. "He kep' on a-puttin' it in your 'eart, Miss—bless Him for it! and in the hearts of them other ladies and gentlemen. But that 'ere bit about little Miss Aleth and her pa do touch me most of all. I feel as if I could hardly b'lieve it. To think that the rector—beg your pardon, Mr. Hutton!—should ha' done sich a thing."

But he need not have begged Mr. Hutton's pardon, nor anybody else's. For all were of one mind there; and John Hutton was too busy polishing up his eyes with his large red and yellow handkerchief to pay very much attention to what his friend was saying.

"That child is too good to live," at last said Hutton, with rather quavering lips. "I always knowed she have an accident or something."

"Oh! Hutton!" vehemently remonstrated Etta; "how can you talk in that way? and just now when we are all so happy! Miss Aleth is getting better as fast as she can. Every day, the doctor says, there is an improvement in her."

"Well! I am sure I hope so!" said Hutton. "And so it has all come right about the shed. Who'd ever a thought it."

And thus they went on discussing, and every now and then taking a leap to the end, as people will always do, before they have reached the beginning! Mr. Clemence wisely held a firm rein, and, by dint of an occasional recall to the wanderers, succeeded so far in the first promotion of the scheme, that to-morrow evening, at the same hour, was fixed for a general rendezvous at the spot destined for their united action.

Faithful to agreement, the next morning Albert Eldridge appeared on the scene, and proceeded once more to discuss both pros and cons of space, shape, size, pounds, shillings, and pence, and at last, well up in his subject, was able to meet his clients on the scene of the old fire.

It was all arranged. A wooden building that would accommodate between two and three hundred people, divided down the centre by a partition as solid as they could make it in the shape of sliding doors. One half was to be specially dedicated to the sale of coffee and other refreshments, furnished throughout with many small tables and seats; while the other was to be principally used for meetings, lectures, temperance work, and musical and singing practices.

In a month the carpenter thought the premises might be ready for the conclusive decorative touches, which Etta's womanly instinct had already taught her were an imperative necessity for the true success of her scheme. Experimental though it was, the project already bore one or two prophetic symptoms of that much-desired success.

There was union of effort. There was hearty goodwill too in the co-operation, and plenty of earnest purpose now that promised perseverance. A work begun in the "joy of the Lord," which is our real "strength," need not fail for want of ardor, because that supply, like all others, flows from an Eternal Fountain. Zeal may and must be fanned, and fed from day to day with living coals; or, like the neglected fire, it will sink into cold gray ashes, neither ornamental nor useful! But if drawn—like Isaiah's impetus to work—from a Divine source, it will surmount all difficulties, overcome each hindrance, detect every slandering objection or unbelieving check to be but the hissing tones of the serpent-like deceiver; and will, in fact, prove victorious, not only temporally, but for a long and happy eternity.

The next time Etta went to call upon Aleth, she was received by the child in an ecstasy.

"Come here, Etta, and hear all about it," she said. "I am so happy to-day, and it's like Polly's cage—in two parts!"

"You dear little thing!" said Aleth; "what is like Polly's cage in 'two parts?'"

"Why, what I am so glad about!" she continued rapturously. "One part is about the shed; and now Michael will be so pleased. And Mr. Hutton too and all the others. And you have been helping them all the time—you good old Etta!"

"But what's the other thing?" said Etta after she recovered from the enthusiastic hug that generally began and concluded most of Aleth's raptures.

This question brought forth a similar exhibition of feeling which found vent in the exclamation:

"And papa says the doctor says I am going to get quite well, and shall very soon be able to walk about and to run races with my doggie just as I used to do before. Won't that be delightful? and then perhaps I could come to the new wooden coffee-house and see it opened! How pleased old Michael would be, wouldn't he?"

"Oh yes! I should think you would be quite able for that," said Etta. "You go out now every day, don't you, in the wheeled chair, and they let you sit out in the garden?"

"Well! only once, just for a little bit, I was allowed to sit out in the garden, but I go almost every day in the chair. And some day soon, papa says, I may go and see Tottie and Pet" (These were Etta's sisters).

THE COMING DELIVERER.

S. S. Lesson for July 10, Ex. 2: 1-15; Golden Text, Heb. 11, 24. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR God is "full of compassion." He says, "Before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear" (Isa. 65: 24). It was before the children of Israel cried unto Him in Egypt, and while they were still under oppression, that He began to prepare a deliverer for them. The persecution of the king of Egypt had risen to such a pitch that he sought by every means in his power to keep them under, even commanding that every son that was born to them should be cast into the river, and that every daughter should be saved alive. He would have the people of God to be a nation of women, a helpless people; but all his stratagems to prevent their increase were unsuccessful; "the people multiplied and waxed very mighty" (Ex. 1: 20).

It was just at this time that God gave a son to Amram and Jochebed, and when his mother "saw him that he was a goodly child, she hid him three months." There was more than parental affection in this step of Moses' parents; they were of the priestly tribe, and probably they did priestly work, and interceded with God for their people. Perhaps it was revealed to them by God that Moses should deliver His people; for we read, "By faith Moses, when he was born, was hid three months of his parents, because they saw he was a proper child; and they were not afraid of the king's commandment." This latter clause would lead us to believe that God had given them a distinct promise with regard to this child, and that his future career was revealed to them.

Moses' mother found, after three months, that she could no longer hide him; it may be the child's cry had been heard, and that a rumor arose that the house would be inspected; but this did not daunt the faith of this ancient mother. She made a little floating ark of simple bulrushes, made water-tight, and placed the child therein, committing him, not to the mercy of the waves, but to that God who stilleth the waves of the sea. What utter helplessness there was in this babe in his cradle among the rushes, just floating, but prevented by the flags from drifting out into the stream! The river might easily rise so as to sweep him away with his frail shelter, if the care of the Almighty were not manifested toward him, or a crocodile might have made him an easy prey. One thing the mother did: she set his sister to watch and see what would become of him, while she remained at home and trusted God. No one could mistake Miriam for the mother; she was but a child, but she could watch over and bring tidings of her brother to her parents.

God was faithful. He is so ever; and just at the right moment He ordered that Pharaoh's daughter should come down to the river to bathe. Seeing the ark among the bulrushes, "she sent her maid to fetch it; and when she had opened it, she saw the child; and behold, the babe wept." Hers was a woman's heart, and touched by the hand of God; her love went out to the poor little victim of her father's cruelty. The tears of the little babe, needing, perhaps, nourishment, awoke in her a woman's instinct to help the helpless: "And she had compassion on him, and said, This is one of the Hebrews' children." The secret was out; what was now to be done? Great responsibility lay on the girl Miriam: one false step, one unwise word, and all would be lost. Miriam was afterward a prophetess (Ex. 15: 20; Micah 6: 4), and it is possible that she knew the power of prayer already in her early years. It may be that she instantaneously asked counsel of God, that He made her eye quick to see that the heart of Pharaoh's daughter was won by the child's utter helplessness; she asked of her, "Shall I go and call to thee a nurse of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee? And Pharaoh's daughter said to her, Go. And the maid went, and called the child's mother."

No stratagem which she could have devised would have answered like this absolute dependence on her God. Nothing could have appeared more helpless than her position; after she had committed her child to the ark of bulrushes, this slender shelter alone protecting him from the watery grave to which Pharaoh had destined him. But the mother knew that her God was worthy of trust, for He is the faithful God; and He put her into a position in which no one could prevent her from cherishing her child, and no one could control her; she had liberty to educate him for the God who had rescued him. How far this mother was the means of leading the infant Moses to a close and real communion with his God we know not; or how far it was given to her to know and to reveal to him his future, we know not; it is not revealed. This, however, we know, that before his mother brought him back to Pharaoh's house, he must have been imbued with a knowledge of the true God, and probably have had some glimmering of his future career.

How much this history has of teaching for such among us as are mothers! Sometimes in our education of them it seems to us that our children are as much removed from us as Moses was from his mother: a foreign power threatens to ruin them; falsehood, pride, and other grievous sins take possession of them, and it seems to the mother as though she were hopeless and helpless. At last she comes to the conviction that but one thing remains, i.e., to cast her child at the feet of Jesus. She goes to Him, tells Him that she is nothing, and can do nothing, that she is without excuse, and that in her need she yields herself and her child absolutely and unreservedly to Him. She knows not how help may come, but she waits, knowing that He cannot fail her. And then he begins to work, brings the child back, and says, Take this child, nurse it, train it for Me; "I will give thee thy wages." The responsibility is now upon another, and the government upon His shoulder. Now her exhortations are first received from Him, her love is purified by Him, she acts, not independently, but for Him, and she expects nothing from the child, but all from His grace; and blessed be God she receives wages, and blessed ones; the Lord rewards her for the very service which is her joy.

At last Moses was grown, and he was "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds." Forty years he lived in Pharaoh's court, and then "it came into his heart to visit his brethren the children of Israel. And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian. For he supposed his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them; but they understood not" (Acts 7: 22-25). Moses began to feel the call to his mission, but he was not yet ready for it; he had zeal, but had not yet learned to wait for direction. Before he slew the Egyptian, "he looked this way, and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand." This was not the conduct of a man who was sent from God; if he had slain the Egyptian by the command of God, why look this way and that way? God was responsible. If God willed that he should slay the Egyptian, what need to hide him in the sand? He believed, no doubt, that he was doing God and God's people service, but he felt he himself had to provide for the consequences; he had not wholly abandoned himself to God.

Such an instrument must be first prepared, and God found means to show him this. The very next day he went out, still full of zeal, in the expectation that the people would recognize him, the gifted man standing so high at court, and yet one of them, as their national deliverer. Was he not mighty in word and in deed? Was he not vastly their superior? Was it not an heroic thing for him to esteem "the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt" (Heb. 11: 26)? He would unite himself as a hero with the cause of his people. Having on the previous day avenged the wrong of a Hebrew who was injured by an Egyptian, he sought on this day to reconcile two of his brethren who strove together; but the man who was in the wrong said, "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian? And Moses feared, and said, Surely this thing is known." Yes, it was known, and came to the ears of Pharaoh, who sought to slay Moses. Was he, then, mistaken in the urgent inward call, the indescribable burning which he had in common with all those who know something of the burden of the Lord? No, he was not mistaken; but he must learn to act under orders, and he must learn sacrificial work in the desert.

Moses fled from the face of Pharaoh, and dwelt in the land of Midian. His ambitious dreams were at an end. He, the gifted, learned, refined Moses, had to come down to the occupation of a shepherd in the desert, and there married, and lived a common family life. But his soul's burden lay there upon his heart; distance did not decrease his concern for his brethren toiling in Egypt. He was undergoing necessary discipline to prepare him for the work and the responsibility to which God had called him.

A Jailer and His Prisoners.—In the Fuh-chow Mission, persecution and success have gone hand in hand. Two of the members of a small native church were beaten for Christ's sake, and put in prison. Their fellow-members prayed for four months that their friends might be set free. Then they began to lose heart and went to the missionary to ask him what was to be done. "Go on praying," was the missionary's answer; and they went home determined that they would persevere in prayer. After another four months they came back to Fuh-chow. "We have been heard and answered," they said, as soon as they saw the missionary. "Indeed," he replied; "the Christians are set free, then?" "No; they are still in prison, yet God has answered our prayer." And they told how these two Christian men had read the Bible to their fellow-prisoners, till the warder himself asked to listen to the book, and by God's grace he was converted. The two Christians were raised to offices of trust in the jail, and so had many more opportunities of speaking to the prisoners; and three of these prisoners had gone back to their homes, full of faith and joy, and were already spreading the good news in their villages.

Fishbones in the Bible was the Quaint Simile employed by a faithful minister to express his view of passages difficult to understand. He likened the study of the Bible to eating fish. He said when he came to a hard place he left it and called it a bone. The older he grew the fewer the bones he found, until when he came to be an old man the book that he used to find as full of bones as a herring was like a halibut, with only one big bone in it of God's incomprehensibility, and that was in such plain sight that no one could stumble over it, and grandly served its purpose as strong framework to keep the nutritious meat in its place.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Serious Riots at Marseilles, in the South of France have occurred during the week. They commenced on Friday, June 17th, after the landing of the French troops from Tunis, and were renewed on the 19th. There has been a series of furious encounters between the French and Italians. It is stated that eight persons have been killed, including one soldier, and many have been wounded. The prefect has closed all the cafés, and police and soldiers patrol the streets. There are 50,000 Italians employed in Marseilles, and persons of that nationality have been mobbed and attacked in different parts of the town. The houses in the Italian quarter are shut, and the consulate is guarded by troops. Many Italians were stabbed, and the troops maltreated by the mob. Over a hundred and fifty persons have been arrested.

A strained feeling has resulted in the relations of the people of both countries toward each other. In the southern towns of France the police have to escort the Italians to and from their work. Mass-meetings are forbidden, but the French workmen discuss the matter in their shops, and at night the cry of "Down with Italy!" is almost as popular as "To Berlin!" was on the eve of the Franco-German war. A correspondent of an American journal says this anti-Italian feeling will make itself felt at the coming elections, and that unless Gambetta makes an appeal for peace the candidates in many of the southern departments will be pledged to an aggressive policy against Italy. In Italy a similar condition of things exists.

Reports from Ireland Indicate a Decrease of agitation during the past week. There is a great falling off in the number of outrages. The landlords are also showing a spirit of conciliation, and have resolved not to execute writs of ejectment except in cases where the tenant absolutely denies the right of the landlord to collect rent. A European writer says: "Many landlords who fled during the boycotting period are returning home, and there are signs on every hand that the agitation has nearly burned itself out." A pastoral has been issued by the Roman Catholic Archbishop McCabe, sharply reminding the clergy that their mission is not to incite an agrarian war, but to promote peace and concord. This utterance of the archbishop is said to have thrown the Leaguers into confusion. The numerous arrests of the leaders of the Land League have also had a disconcerting effect on that organization. It is now hoped by the more sanguine politicians that if the Land Bill passes the House of Lords without mutilation comparative calm may prevail for a time in Ireland.

The English Law Relating to Punishment for murder will probably be amended into similarity with the American code at an early date. A proposal to totally abolish capital punishment was negatived on June 22d, by a decisive majority, but during the debate a very general feeling was expressed in favor of the classification of the various degrees of murder, as in America. Sir William Vernon Harcourt, Home Secretary, opposed the bill, but favored an alteration of the law which should distinguish between murder with malice aforethought and other murders. The extent to which murders had decreased, he said, showed the deterrent effect of hanging, the abolition of which was not supported by a great majority of the nation. John Bright voted for the total abolition of capital punishment.

A Scheme for the Confederation of the Different portions of the British Empire on the plan of our Congress and State Legislatures, is being discussed by the journalists and politicians of Great Britain. It is understood to have been suggested by friends of Ireland in this country. Sir Algernon Borthwick, a prominent British journalist, writing of this scheme, says: "It is now painfully apparent that home rule in a so-called Imperial Parliament is a standing protest against there being any common ground from which common legislation can proceed. The Irish race is actuated by racial propensities and customs totally distinct from those of the English. No union based on a common system of law and industrial pursuits can possibly obtain between them, except by consistent force on one side in the absence of timorous concession to the rule of the stronger. One other question which we may make up our minds the nation has sooner or later to face is, whether Ireland, as a part of the United Kingdom, is to be subjected and made obedient to the same laws and usages as ourselves, or is she, by exceptional legislation in deference to her origin and the incompatible proclivities due thereto, to be left outside the obligations and responsibilities of the union while still a component part of it?" Other writers on this question advocate imperial federation, England, Ireland, and Scotland and the colonies each to have its own local legislature, and to send members to a federal parliament.

The Czar of Russia Still Remains in Strict seclusion at his palace of Peterhof, on the Gulf of Finland, twenty miles from St. Petersburg. The little harbor is guarded by two gunboats and a torpedo boat, and the palace by detachments from the Guards and Cossack patrols. He sees no one but members of his suite and his ministers, and when he takes a walk in the grounds he is accompanied by an escort of officers. This prison life is telling on him, and he looks weary and haggard. The superstitious in St. Petersburg do not expect him to return alive from Peterhof. Peter the Great received the injuries from which he died at Peterhof, and the boy-Czar Ivan and Peter III. were murdered there. It is said that Nihilists have been arrested in the dense woods which almost surround the castle, and that attempts have been made to fire both the woods and the castle. He is a closer prisoner than any exile in Siberia, and is said to have grimly remarked to one of the foreign ambassadors the other day, "that his subjects in the mines had no reason to complain, seeing that he shared their captivity, and was at the mercy of a master more bloodthirsty than a Cossack." The Czarina is utterly broken down.

The Reforms in Russia, it was Hoped, would be inaugurated by the young Czar have all been abandoned or postponed. Even the measure designed to aid the emancipated serfs in their payments for their land has been held in abeyance, and much disappointment has been caused thereby. It was known as "the agrarian adjustment ukase," and it has been submitted by imperial decree to a commission for further elaboration. The measure contains two points,—the diminution of the peasants' land redemption tax, and the final and compulsory agreement of 837,000 peasants with their proprietors in regard to land allotments. The failure of these projected reforms and the appointment of Count Ignatieff as Home Minister has increased the revolutionary spirit in Russia. The army, which has hitherto been loyal, is now infected with Nihilism, and several officers have been arrested and sent to Siberia or the fortresses.

The Relations Between Turkey and England formed the subject of debate in the British House of Commons on Friday last. Mr. Rylands, a follower of Mr. Gladstone, contended that, in spite of the failure of the Turkish promises of reform, the convention by which England undertook to protect the Asiatic empire of Turkey was binding on England, and that in the not impossible event of an Armenian insurrection and Russian intervention, England would be bound to go to Turkey's assistance. He therefore recommended that Turkey should be notified that England would cancel the treaty. As a consequence of it, he said, the island of Cyprus must be given up. A Conservative member protested against the withdrawal of England from the convention, but Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Gladstone's Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, said he agreed with much Mr. Rylands had said in regard to the Anglo-Turkish convention, but he pointed out that it was a different thing to condemn a treaty and to reverse it, and violently to upset the convention might endanger the peace of the East.

The Popish Viceroy of India, Lord Ripon, had not long been appointed by Mr. Gladstone before another Roman Catholic, a Mr. Harrison, was appointed to the double post of Commissioner of Police and Chairman of the Municipal Council in Calcutta. By his order, instructions were issued to stop all open-air preaching by Christian missionaries in the public spaces and squares of Calcutta, which has been freely allowed from time immemorial. At the same time street jugglers, serpent charmers, nautch dancers, etc., are allowed freely to gather crowds in the thoroughfares. Great grief and indignation are felt at this invidious order by the Protestant ministers in India. Many of Mr. Gladstone's friends in Great Britain deeply regret that not only does he advocate the admission of the Atheist Bradlaugh to Parliament, but also has made a Papist supreme ruler over the largest part of the British empire.

Prince Napoleon has Issued a Manifesto Advocating the policy of Scrutin de Liste, or election by large instead of small constituencies. The plan would naturally find favor with a Napoleon, it having already, in the more extended form of the Plebiscite, been manipulated for the benefit of the Bonaparte family. He is also in favor of the partial revision of the constitution, more particularly of that part which relates to the election of the President. The prince regards the direct nomination of the President by universal suffrage as all important. This is not astonishing if it is remembered that it was to the struggle between the National Assembly and the President elected by the people, that France owed the coup d'état of the 2d of December, 1851.

Quaint Mourning Customs in China.—As soon as the death of the late Empress Dowager was announced in China the mandarins and all high officials of the empire put on garments of pure white, and these were worn for twenty-seven consecutive days. The regulations which prescribe official mourning also require that the red buttons upon their caps shall be replaced by blue buttons. On the twenty-eighth day they put on black clothing, which must be worn for one hundred days. They are also forbidden to marry within that period, nor can they indulge in any of the usual social pleasures. The lower orders of the people must also be clothed in white, and are not permitted to shave their heads for one hundred days. The same restrictions as to marrying and indulging in social pleasures that apply to the higher classes apply to them as well.

A Curious Bequest Has Just Been Made Public in Salzburg, Germany. The widow of a lieutenant-general has just died there. She was formerly Countess Firmian. In her will she leaves money to be found an evangelical orphan school, children from Salzburg and vicinity only to be admitted. "Thus, I believe," she says, "I may atone for the sin of one of my family, who in the last century, perhaps too fanatically, drove many evangelical families to ruin." Archbishop Firmian in 1731 banished thirty thousand people from Salzburg on account of their evangelical belief.

Mount Vesuvius in Eruption. A Cablegram from Rome says slight shocks of earthquake at Mount Vesuvius have been followed by a strong eruption. Broad and active streams of lava are flowing down the northeast side.

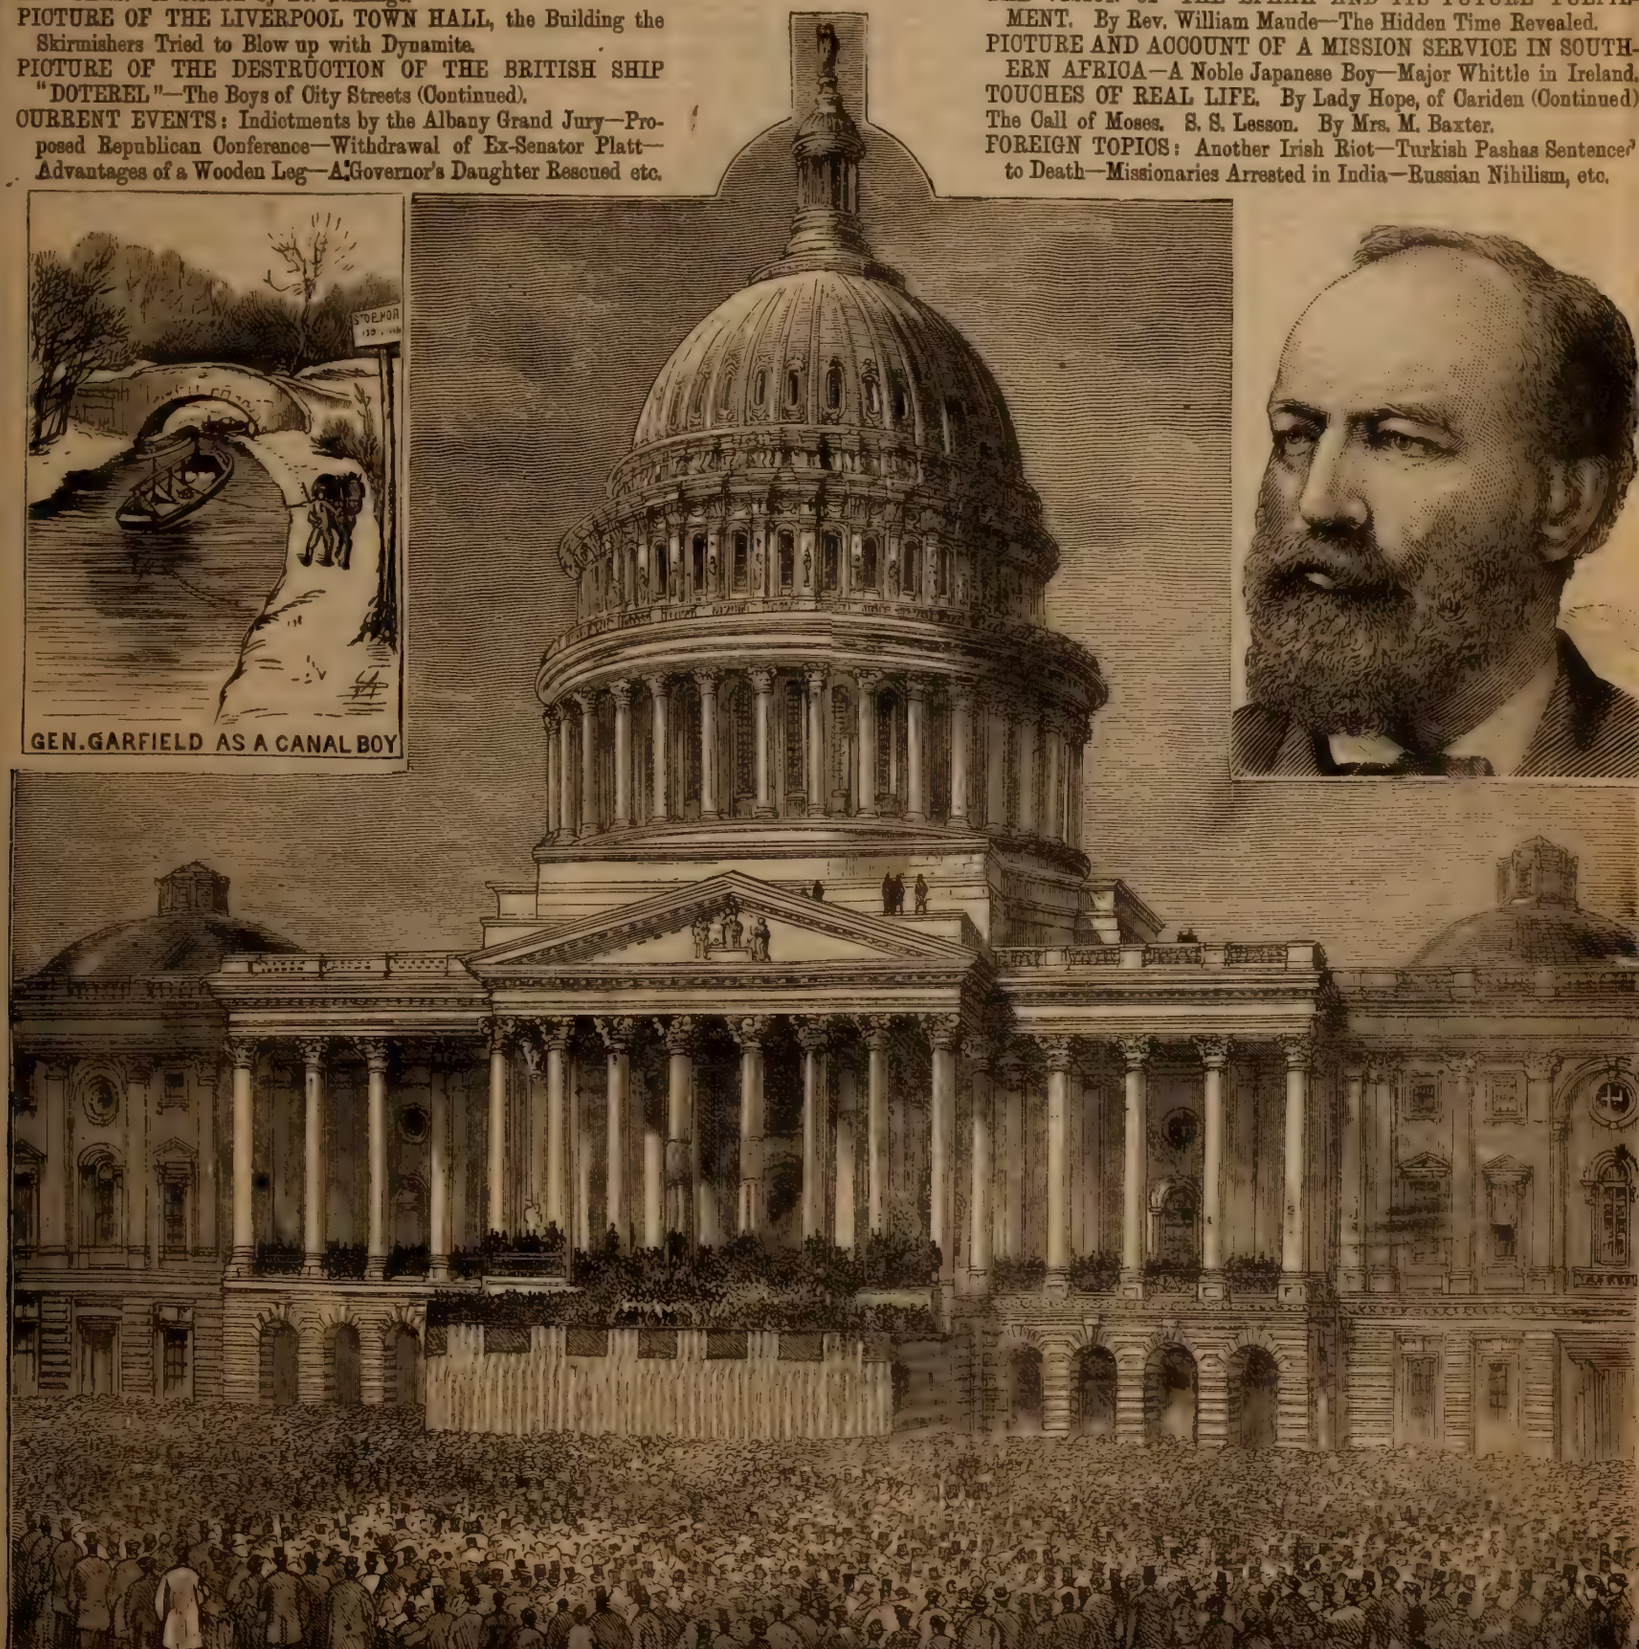
GEN. GARFIELD AS A CANAL BOY



PRESIDENT GARFIELD—As a Canal Boy—Inauguration at the Capitol.

THE ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT GARFIELD.

THE sentiments to which Gen. W. S. Hancock gave expression in his telegram to Washington, after receiving intelligence of the cowardly and cruel attack on the President, are those which above all others are noticeable throughout the country. He wrote: "I trust that the result of the assault upon the life of the President to-day may not have fatal consequences, and that in the interest of the country the act may be shown to have been that of a madman. If an opportune moment should come, please express to the President my heartfelt wishes for his recovery."

In the presence of such a trouble politics and party are forgotten, and Democrat unites with Republican in condemning the crime, in hoping that its dreaded consequences may be averted, and that its perpetrator may, for the sake of the credit of the American people, be proved insane. From all sections of the country, from eminent men of all parties, expressions of sympathy have been called forth, evincing the profoundly patriotic feeling of our citizens, and showing that mere party distinctions are after all but superficial differences. We are sure, then, that in publishing this week the portrait of President Garfield, our readers, no matter whether they voted for him in the recent contest or not, will concur in the hearty good-will expressed by the late Democratic candidate.

Our frontispiece represents two scenes in the President's life: his early occupation and his inauguration as President. The exhaustive narratives freely circulated as to President Garfield's public career during the recent Presidential campaign render useless any attempt to trace the steps by which he advanced from the one condition in life to the other. The story has been told too frequently as well as too recently to need repetition here. We proceed therefore to recite the details of the attempt to assassinate the President as published in the daily journals.

It appears that the President contemplated paying a visit to several cities in New England, and had arranged to meet Mrs. Garfield in New York on Saturday, her physicians having consented to her accompanying her husband on his tour. About nine o'clock on Saturday morning President Garfield, accompanied by Secretary Blaine, drove from the White House to the depot of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad. He sat in the carriage chatting with the Secretary a few moments, and then both alighted and walked through the ladies' room toward the cars, where Postmaster-General James, the Secretaries of the Treasury, the Navy, and other departments, were awaiting him. What followed is thus described by an eye-witness:

"There was a slight pause on the steps, and a moment later the President and Secretary of State, side by side, were walking across the ladies' reception-room, in which there was not at the time half a dozen persons. One of these was a man of short stature, a wicked expression in his face, who moved about nervously until the two statesmen had half crossed the reception room, a distance of not more than ten feet from the door. A report as of a big firecracker challenged the attention of the policemen at the main door, who thought some boy had fired it in honor of the President's departure. Instantly another report was heard, and President Garfield lay prostrate upon the floor of the reception room, wounded in the right arm and in the side just above the hip.

"The mysterious nervous individual was Charles Guiteau, a half Frenchman, now from Chicago, about thirty years of age, who had been imploring the President to give him a consulate in France. His excited condition had changed in the presence of his intended victim, and he stood as firm and as calm as a statue, the 'English bulldog' pistol still drawn and in his right hand.

"There was an interval of about four seconds between the first and second shots. Just as soon as the second shot was fired I took in the situation and ran out of the office for the purpose of securing the assassin. In the meantime Guiteau tried to make his escape by the main door on Sixth Street, but being headed off he turned to make away by the exit of the ladies' room on C Street, when I grappled him by the left hand and the left shoulder and held him until officer Kearney and Depot Watchman Scott came to my assistance in a few moments, the former holding him by the right shoulder and the latter securing him by his clothing in the back. The assassin was immediately hurried away to police headquarters. This was fortunate for him, for as soon as the dazed crowd ascertained that the murderer was in custody there was loud talk of lynching him, and if the excited crowd could have laid hands on him his fate would have been a sudden as well as a tragic one."

EXAMINATION OF THE PRESIDENT'S WOUNDS.

The President was removed to a room in the second story of the depot, and a preliminary examination of his wounds was made, but the ball which had entered the right side of his back, near the spinal column and immediately over the hip bone, could not be found, although the course was traced for about three inches. It passed forward and downward.

REMOVING THE PRESIDENT TO THE WHITE HOUSE.

About 10 o'clock the police cleared the main room of the depot building, and in a few moments the wounded President was borne through the building and placed in an ambulance which was in waiting on the outside. He bore the removal with great fortitude, not uttering a complaint or groan. The ambulance was surrounded by a cordon of police, and the horses were whipped into a gallop all the way to the White House. An excited crowd followed the ambulance at a run, but at the White House the crowd was stopped, and none but a select few admitted.

THE TELEGRAM TO MRS. GARFIELD.

Before the President was removed from the depot he directed the following dispatch to be sent to Mrs. Garfield:

"The President wishes me to say to you from him that he has been seriously hurt. How seriously he cannot yet say. He is himself, and hopes you will come to him soon. He sends his love to you. A. F. ROCKWELL."

After the President's removal to the White House he appeared for a short time to rally, and several encouraging dispatches were sent out. As the day wore on the President's symptoms grew less favorable. His pulse became gradually accelerated until at 7 o'clock it stood at 140. At 6:30 o'clock a newspaper correspondent talked with Dr. Bliss and Dr. Reyburn about the condition and prospects of the patient. Neither one could hold out any hope of his recovery. Dr. Reyburn said:

"We have not been able to find the ball, and the President's condition is such that we cannot probe his wound. The course of the bullet has been traced about three inches, and there lost. There has been considerable internal bleeding, which still continues. Our only hope is that this bleeding will cease of itself. Human skill can do nothing unless that takes place. The President has slept some under the influence of hypodermic injections of morphine. He is calm and cheerful, and his mind remains clear and unclouded."

In his waking moments throughout the night of Saturday, President Garfield's mind was perfectly clear, his consciousness was never lost. His courage and cheerfulness had a marked effect in sustaining him. In the course of Sunday morning he was able to take nourishment, thus gaining needed strength. Very favorable bulletins were issued by his physicians, one of whom is reported as having gone to the length of actually predicting the recovery of the patient. Later in the day reports of a very disturbing and alarming character were made. Unfavorable symptoms were developed, and the gravest apprehensions were excited.

On Monday, the Fourth of July, intense anxiety was caused by most unfavorable reports of the President's condition. Hope was permitted and encouraged by the first official bulletin of the day, but was converted into a great fear by later intelligence that the symptoms of Saturday had returned, and that tympanites, which is frequently the precursor of inflammation, was again noticeable. For several hours in the earlier part of the evening hope was practically abandoned on all sides. The bulletin issued at ten o'clock on Monday night pronounced the patient slightly improved; at midnight the President was sleeping quietly.

At Worcester, Mass., and many other cities special prayer meetings were held to pray for the President's recovery. The event recalls the circumstances of President Lincoln's assassination. At that time Mr. Garfield at a very critical moment uttered memorable words which are now applied to his own case. He said, addressing a crowd in a paroxysm of excitement, "My friends, remember God reigns, and the Government at Washington still lives."

Letters and telegrams from all quarters have been received expressing solicitude for the patient as well as horror at the crime. From several cable messages were received. The first came through Mr. Lowell, our Minister at the Court of Queen Victoria, and ran as follows:

"LONDON, July 3, 1881.

"TO BLAINE, Secretary, Washington:

"'Just received the following from the Queen: "I am most anxious to hear latest accounts of the President, and wish my horror and deep sympathy to be conveyed to him and Mrs. Garfield.'

"LOWELL, Minister."

Soon another cablegram followed, saying, "The Queen would be glad to know the latest intelligence as to the condition of President Garfield." From the following dispatch was received:

"Lieutenant General Sir Dighton Probyn presents his compliments to his Excellency the United States Minister, and is desired by the Prince and Princess of Wales to express their Royal Highnesses' most extreme regret at the dastardly attempt made on President Garfield's life. Their Royal Highnesses beg that his Excellency will kindly at once let Sir Dighton Probyn know, for their information, what the latest accounts are of the President's state; and also that his Excellency will kindly telegraph to Mrs. Garfield their Royal Highnesses' deep concern at this cruel outrage."

The English press published sympathetic editorials, and in the principal churches the melancholy event was referred to in terms of the deepest solicitude. At the Metropolitan Tabernacle offered a special prayer on behalf of the President. The prayer alluded to the people of the United States as a kindred people, deserving good wishes and sympathy in the melancholy event which had recently happened. Were the wounded President still alive—a hope which was entertained wherever the English language was spoken—it was their most earnest prayer that he should go on improving, and be soon restored in perfect health to the great people to whom he belonged, and over whom he had been called to govern. As a sister country England gave her sympathy from across the Atlantic to the people of that land where so many of her kith and kin dwell, and between which and England bonds of everlasting union existed.

A FORMAL VOTE OF SYMPATHY IN A LONDON CHURCH.

At one of the chief Congregational churches in London the pastor said: "We have heard with horror of the infamous attempt to assassinate the President of the United States, and our hearts are moved by unfeigned and fervent sympathy with all who are most deeply afflicted by the shameful outrage. I think we ought to seize this opportunity of joining with others in the expression at once of our horror and our sympathy. When America suffers England should be the first to sympathize in her distress. I ask you therefore to unite in the following expression of feeling:

"That this congregation, assembled in the city of London, representing every shade of religious and political opinion, has heard with inexpressible horror of the attempted assassination of the President of the United States, and most profoundly sympathizes with the people of that great country in the hour of national consternation and distress.

"If it be your mind that this resolution should pass, will you please signify the same by rising from your seats?" The whole crowded congregation unanimously rose in acceptance.

MAJOR WHITTLE AND MR. AND MRS. M'GRANAHAN IN IRELAND.

DR. KNOX, of Belfast, writes as follows in the Belfast Witness, respecting the evangelistic services led by the American evangelists.

"Sir: I regret to learn that the special services of these brethren in Belfast are soon to close, and that it will not be in their power to visit other parts of the province. Several ministers throughout Ulster have written me, offering them a cordial welcome in their districts. Their labors here have been very refreshing and quickening to God's people, and we have reason to believe that many others have been awakened and led into the kingdom through their instrumentality. The people of Belfast have taken hold of this movement warmly, and through their cordial co-operation its influence is extending every day. Night after night 3000 people assemble in the church of St. Enoch's, and other churches are being opened in distant parts of the town, and are crowded, even though the evangelists are not present.

"My conviction is that Ulster is ripe for an evangelistic campaign, and if brethren from a distance cannot be secured, a number of our own ministers, having special fitness for the work, should be set free from pastoral work for a few months. God has 'opened a wide door and effectual.' A great responsibility rests on us."

The Rev. Dr. Moxey writes, "Many interesting episodes occur in our inquiry meetings, and some most solemn ones. Let me instance the following: On Sabbath evening, at the young men's meeting, I spoke to one, not knowing that he had already been dealt with by two of our best workers, and given over as 'not being really anxious.' I was asked by a Christian friend with whom he resided to do so, 'although,' he remarked, 'I fear he is not willing to give up sin.' I sat down beside him, and said, 'Will you let me show you a text?' 'Yes.' 'Here it is—John 5:24, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." These words are Christ's own; they are terribly earnest, and they mean your salvation as you sit there, now, to-night, if you only are willing.'

"His eyes began to fill. 'Now listen, my brother; your eternal destiny may just at this moment be hanging on the way you receive His message to you.' I then offered a short prayer, asking God to give us both His Holy Spirit, that we might honor Christ by implicitly and without question believing His word. To this he responded with a fervent 'Amen!' and the anxiety depicted on his face showed that God was already answering the prayer. '"He that heareth my word." Think of those three words that He uttered just before He gave up the ghost—"It is finished!" What was finished? Sin was put away by the sacrifice of Himself. Again hear His word—"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." Do you hear His word, and take it for yourself?' 'I do,' said the young man fervently. 'Then go on with the verse, read it yourself.' '"And believeth on Him that sent me." 'Do you believe Jesus was sent by His Father for the very purpose of bearing away the sin of the world? and do you come now to Him as He invites you, and accept Him as your living, loving Saviour, giving yourself up to Him, body and soul, to be made holy and meet for heaven?' 'I do!' 'Then read what Christ says you have.' He continued the verse—'"hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life."'

"As he read the last seven words, that strange, wondrous change came over his features that told of another soul passing at the Master's call from death unto life. I hardly needed to ask. 'Do you believe those words of Jesus?' 'I do,' he said. 'And have you everlasting life?' 'He says so,' and he placed his finger on the words.' 'Shall we thank Him?' 'Oh, yes!' In prayer he gave himself away to his Saviour.

"I left him sitting with his eyes fixed on the precious verse, having previously shown him Rom. 10:9, and told him to go at once and confess the Lord Jesus, telling what great things He had done for his soul. I little thought how soon the young convert would commence to preach Christ "Sitting close to him was a young man, with whom two Christian workers entered into conversation after I left the church. They soon found a sad condition of things. It appeared from the young man's own statement that his parents were Christians, and he had been brought up under pious influences. He was now embarked on a course of sin which he wished to follow, only the Spirit was striving with him. He knew he was a sinner, and believed there was a hell, and was troubled about it. By a seemingly irresistible influence he was drawn to the meetings. He said that three years ago he and a companion, similarly made uncomfortable about their sins, knelt down together and prayed to God to take His Spirit away from them and let them alone. He said that was the only honest prayer he ever prayed; he meant it, and he meant the same now, for he wanted to join a theatrical company, and he knew if he accepted Christ, and got converted, it would put an end to that.

"The young man to whom I had spoken here broke in. He told the story of God's love and mercy to him that night as he sat there and read to him the loving message. He might as well have spoken to a stone wall. He thought the 'I' (Jesus) that spoke to him, and broke his hard heart with the long suffering love that such condescension betokened, must of necessity melt every other. But no; the scorner of God's mercy sat unmoved. The young convert then said, 'I know what's troubling you; it's the same as kept me back. You're afraid of your companions and their sneers. Well, now, I'm a bricklayer, and I don't know a more ungodly set than they are; but, please God, I'll tell them all to-morrow, as I tell you to-night, that through God's mercy I am a new creature in Christ Jesus; they can sneer, if they like.' Don't you let three or four men laugh you out of heaven into hell, mate.' With words like these the young believer tried to persuade this resister of God's Spirit to be reconciled to God. The only reply was that he wished his parents had never prayed with him, or instructed him in the Bible; it had only made him miserable, and he meant to follow his inclination, come what would, and he wished God would stop troubling him! With these awful words he left the church. May God have mercy on his soul!"

THE HIDDEN TIME REVEALED.

The Converging Point of the Prophetic Dates—A Misapplied Quotation of Scripture—The Book of Revelation Indicates the Approximate Period of the Consummation of all Things—The Formation of the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy is the Great Landmark to be Watched-for.

IT is a notable fact that some point of time within the general epoch from 1866 to 1895 has been computed to be the termination of the Prophetic Dates and consequent end of this dispensation by more than one hundred and fifty Expositors of Prophetic Chronology. Hence this period has been expected to be the probable epoch of the following events: The dissolution of the Turkish empire, the great wars and revolutions of the latter-day final crisis, the formation of the ten-kingdomed confederacy, the re-establishment of the Jewish nation in Palestine, the translation of watchful Christians to heaven, the full revival of the Napoleon dynasty over Europe, the subsequent great tribulation and persecution throughout Christendom, and the personal descent of Christ at the battle of Armageddon to establish His millennial reign over the earth.

The principal dates which have been understood to be convergent at this epoch are: 6000 years from the creation of man; the 2520 years from Nebuchadnezzar's birth; the 1260 years from the commencement of the temporal power of Popery and Mohammedanism between the years 606 and 622 (the era of the Hegira, from which the Mohammedans reckon their Calendar); and the 360 years from Luther's Reformation in 1517–30.

But many persons, instead of aspiring to stand upon

and with the telescope of Revelation to gaze on the scenes of futurity, entertain the popular fallacy that it is impossible to discover the time when the Day of Judgment and Second Coming of Christ and the Millennium will commence; and to this end they sometimes quote the passage in Mark 13:32: "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels that are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." It is manifest, however, that persons are guilty of the sin of unwarrantably adding to the words of God (Rev. 22:18) who explain this text to prohibit the knowledge of the month, or year, or general season of Christ's Advent, inasmuch as the passage only specifies "the day and hour" to be unknown.

The slightest consideration also shows that these words, being spoken in the present tense, referred entirely to the time when they were uttered, and could not fairly be understood to relate to the advanced period in which we are now living. It was not said, "No man shall know," but simply, "No man knoweth;" and, moreover, it was added, "Not even the Son." Surely no one dare assert that the Son of Man does not now know the day and hour of His own Second Advent, since He has ascended up to the right hand of the Father in Heaven; and, therefore, it is evident that the application of these words was entirely limited to the time when the Son of Man was on the earth in an unglorified state, and cannot extend to the present period, seeing that it cannot now be the case that not even the Son knows the day or hour.

Furthermore the Book of Revelation was given in Patmos to St. John sixty years after Christ's ascension, and was bestowed by the Father for the express purpose of foreshowing and "the things which shall be hereafter" (Rev. 1:1–10). Consequently we now have very much more information as to future events than was given at the time when it was said, "No man knoweth the day or the hour." Indeed, prior to the day of Pentecost, it was distinctly declared to the disciples, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power;" it was, however, added, "But ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you" (Acts 1:8), and this power to know the times and seasons began to be bestowed at Pentecost by the Holy Spirit, whose office it is to "show us things to come" (Acts 2; John 16:13), and by whose teaching the Church is to increase in the knowledge of the prophecies toward the time of the end, when the words shall be unsealed and unclosed (Dan. 12:4, 9).

"THE THINGS WHICH MUST SHORTLY COME TO PASS,"

Various portions of Scripture distinctly intimate that although hypocrites and by the Day of the Lord, yet that as the approach of summer is ascertainable from the budding of the fig-tree, so, when certain predicted events come to pass, watchful Christians will be enabled by discerning such signs of the times to lift up their heads, knowing that the Lord's Second Coming is nigh, even at the doors. The Apocalypse furnishes a marvellously exact map or picture-history of all the leading events of the Gentile dispensation, between the first and second advents of Christ. Standard year-day expositors universally admit that at least six seals, six trumpets, and six vials have been entirely, or very nearly, fulfilled in their year-day accomplishment, and thus we are living on the eve of the year-day seventh seal, seventh trumpet, and seventh vial; which are closely connected with the beginning of the Millenium (Amos 3:7; Matt. 24:32–43; John 15:15; 2 Pet. 1:19; 1 Thess. 5:4).

The great landmark, however, to be watched for is the formation of all the countries of Cæsar's Roman Empire into a Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy, and then the rise of an eleventh Little Sovereign, a Napoleon, who will make a Seven Years' Covenant with the Jews, according to the last verse of the ninth chapter of Daniel, about seven years before the Consummation and Millennium.

LAWYERS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Bring Zenas the Lawyer."—TITUS 3 : 13.

Two Sides to Paul's Nature—His Legal Friend Zenas—Famous Christian Lawyers—Burke's Impeachment of Warren Hastings—The Prejudice Against Lawyers—An Old Denunciation—Good Words for the Profession—The Public Interested in Their Integrity—Principles of Conduct Toward Clients—Where They can Obtain Guidance—Scene in a Lawyer's Office—An Honest Western Lawyer—Special Temptations—To Scepticism—George Briggs and John McLean—To Sabbath Breaking—Rufus Choate's Critical Sunday—To Artificial Stimulus—To Negligence of the Great Future—The Impending Trial—The Lord Chancellor of the Universe—Two Dying Lawyers in Conversation.

WE all admire the heroic and vigorous side of Paul's nature, as when he stands coolly deliberate on the deck of the corn-ship, while the jack-tars of the Mediterranean are cowering in the cyclone ; as when he stands undaunted amid the marvels of the palace, before thick-necked Nero, surrounded with his twelve cruel lictors ; as when we find him earning his livelihood with his own needle, sewing hair-cloth, and preaching the Gospel in the interstices ; as when we find him able to take the thirty-nine lashes, every stroke of which fetched the blood, yet continuing in his missionary work ; as when we find him, regardless of the consequence to himself, delivering a temperance lecture to Felix, the government inebriate.

But sometimes we catch a glimpse of the mild and genial side of Paul's nature. It seems that he had a friend who was a barrister by profession. His name was Zenas, and he wanted to see him. Perhaps he had formed the acquaintance of this lawyer in the court-room. Perhaps sometimes, when he wanted to ask some question in regard to Roman law, he went to this Zenas the lawyer. At any rate, he had a warm attachment for the man, and he provides for his comfortable escort and entertainment, as he writes to Titus, "Bring Zenas, the lawyer."

This man of my text belonged to a profession which has often had ardent supporters of Christ and the Gospel. Among them Blackstone, the great commentator on English law ; and Wilberforce the emancipator ; and Chancellor Frelinghuysen ; and the late Benjamin F. Butler, Attorney-General of New York ; and the late Charles Chauncey, the leader of the Philadelphia bar ; and Chief Justice Marshall, and Tenterden, and Campbell, and Sir Thomas More, who died for the truth on the scaffold, saying to his aghast executioner, "Pluck up courage, man, and do your duty ; my neck is very short ; be careful, therefore, and do not strike awry."

Among the mightiest pleas that ever have been made by tongue of barrister have been pleas in behalf of the Bible and Christianity—as when Daniel Webster stood in the Supreme Court at Washington, pleading in the famous Girard will case, denouncing any attempt to educate the people without giving them at the same time moral sentiment, as "low, ribald, and vulgar deism and infidelity ;" as when Samuel L. Southard of New Jersey, the leader of the forum in his day, stood on the platform at Princeton College commencement, advocating the literary excellency of the Scriptures ; as when Edmund Burke, in not only in behalf of the English Government, but in behalf of elevated morals, closed his speech in the midst of the most august assemblage ever gathered in Westminster Hall, by saying :

"I impeach Warren Hastings in the name of the House of Commons, whose national character he has dishonored ; I impeach him in the name of the people of India, whose rights and liberties he has subverted ; I impeach him in the name of human nature, which he has disgraced ; in the name of both sexes, and of every rank, and of every station, and of every situation in the world, I impeach Warren Hastings."

Yet, notwithstanding all the pleas which that profession has made in behalf of God, and the church, and the Gospel, and the rights of man, there has come down through the generations a style of

PREJUDICE AGAINST IT.

So long ago as in the time of Oliver Cromwell it was decided that lawyers might not enter the Parliament House as members, and they were called "sons of Zerniah." The learned Doctor Johnson wrote an epitaph of one of them in these words :

"God works wonders now and then :
Here lies a lawyer, an honest man."

Two hundred years ago a treatise was issued with the title, "Doomsday Approaching, with Thunder and Lightning for Lawyers." A prominent clergyman of the last century wrote in regard to that profession these words : "There is a society of men among us bred up from their youth in the art of proving, according as they are paid, by words multiplied for the purpose, that white is black and black is white. For example, if my neighbor has a mind to my cow, he hires a lawyer to prove that he ought to have my cow from me. I must hire another lawyer to defend my right, it being against all rules of law that a man should speak for himself. In pleading they do not dwell upon the merits of the cause, but upon circumstances foreign thereto. For instance, they do not take the shortest method to know what title my adversary has to my cow, but whether the cow be red or black, or her horns long or short, or the like. After that they adjourn the cause from time to time, and in twenty years they come to an issue.

"This society, likewise, has a peculiar cant or jargon of their own, in which all their laws are written, and these they take especial care to multiply, whereby they have so confounded truth and falsehood that it will take twelve years to decide whether the field left to me by my ancestors for six generations belongs to me, or to one three hundred miles off."

I say that these things show that there has been a prejudice going on down, against that profession, from generation to generation. I account for it on the single fact that they compel men to pay debts that they don't want to pay, and that they arraign criminals who want to escape the consequences of their crime ; and as long as that is so, and it always will be so, just so long will there be classes of men who will affect, at any rate, to despise the legal profession.

I know not how it was in other countries ; but I have had long and wide acquaintance with men of that profession. I have found them in all my parishes—I tarried in one of their offices three years, where there came real estate laywers, insurance lawyers, criminal lawyers, marine lawyers, and I have yet to find a class of men more genial or more straightforward. There are in that occupation, as in all our occupations, men utterly obnoxious to God and man ; but if I were on trial for my integrity or my life, and I wanted even-handed justice administered to me, I would rather have my case submitted to a jury of twelve lawyers than to a jury of twelve clergymen. The legal profession, I believe, have less violence of prejudice than is to be found in the sacred calling.

There is, however, no man who has more more trials, or graver responsibilities than the barrister, and he who attempts to discharge the duties of his position with only earthly resources is making a very great mistake. Witness the scores of men who have been your contemporaries making eternal shipwreck. Witness the men who, with the law of the land under their arm, have violated every statute of the eternal God. Witness the men who have argued placidly before earthly tribunals, who shall shiver in dismay before the Judge of the quick and the dead. See the sad fate of Thomas Marshall and Sergeant Prentiss, the Boanerges of the world, their names synonymous for eloquence and legal acumen. Witness Lord Thurlow announcing his loyalty to earthly government in the sentence, "If I forget my earthly sovereign, may God forget me," and yet stooping to unaccountable meannesses. Witness Lord Coke, the learned and the reckless. Witness Sir George McKenzie, the execrated of all Scotch Covenanters, so that until this day, in Gray Friars' Churchyard, Edinburgh, the children whistle through the bars of the tomb, crying,

"Bloody McKenzie, come out if you dare :
Lift the sneck, and draw the bar."

No other profession more needs the grace of God to deliver them in their temptations, to comfort them in their trials, to sustain them in the discharge of their duties. While I would have you bring the merchant to Christ, and while I would have you bring the farmer to Christ, and while I would have you bring the mechanic to Christ, I address you in the words of Paul to Titus, "Bring Zenas, the lawyer." By so much as his duties are delicate and great, by so much does he need Christian stimulus and safeguard.

We all become clients. I do not suppose there is a man fifty years of age, who has been in active life, who has not been afflicted with a lawsuit. Your name is assaulted, and you must have legal protection. Your boundary line is invaded, and the courts must re-establish it. Your patent is infringed upon, and you must make the offending manufacturer pay the penalty. Your treasures are taken, and the thief must be apprehended. You want to make your will, and you do not want to follow the example of those who, for the sake of saving twenty dollars from an attorney, imperil fifty thousand, and keep the generation following for twenty years quarrelling about the estate, until it is all exhausted. You are struck at by an assassin, and you must invoke for him the penitentiary. All classes of persons in course of time become clients, and, therefore, they are all interested in the morality and Christian integrity of the legal profession. "Bring Zenas, the lawyer." But as to what are the principles by which he should conduct himself in regard to his clients? On one extreme Lord Brougham will appear, saying "The innocence or guilt of your client is nothing to you. You are to save your client regardless of the torment, the suffering, the destruction of all others ; you are to know but one man in the world—your client. You are to save him though you should bring your country into confusion. At all hazards you are to save your client." So says Lord Brougham.

But no right-minded lawyer could adopt that sentiment. On the other extreme, Cicero will come to you and say : "You must never plead the cause of a bad man." Forgetful of the fact that the greatest villain on earth should have a fair trial and that an attorney cannot be judge and advocate at the same time. It was grand when Lord Erskine sacrificed his attorney-generalship for the sake of defending Thomas Paine in his publication of his book called "The Rights of Man," while at the same time, he, the advocate, abhorred Thomas Paine's religious sentiments.

Between these two opposite theories of what is right, what should the attorney do? God alone can direct him. To that chancery he must be appellant, and he will get an answer in an hour. Blessed is that attorney between whose office and the throne of God there is perpetual, reverentia and prayerful communication. That attorney will never make an irreparable mistake. True to the habits of your profession you say : "Cite us some authority on the subject." Well, I quote to you the decision of the Supreme Court of heaven : "If any lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him."

WHAT A SCENE IS THE OFFICE of the busy attorney! In addition to the men who come to you from right motives, bad men will come to you. They will offer you a large fee for counsel in the wrong direction. They want to know from you how they can escape from solemn marital obligation. They come to you wanting to know how they can fail advantageously for themselves. They come to you wanting to know how they can make the insurance company pay for the destroyed house which they burned down with their own hands. Or they come to you on the simple errand of wanting to escape their honest debts.

Now, it is no easy thing to advise settlement when by urging litigation you could strike a mine of remuneration. It is not a very easy thing dampen the ardor of an inflamed contestant, when you know, through a prolonged lawsuit, you could get whatever you asked. It is no easy thing to attempt to discourage the suit for the breaking of a will in the Surrogate's Court, because you know the testator was of sound mind and body when he signed the document. It requires no small heroism to do as I heard an attorney do in an office in a Western city. He said, "John, I will see you through as well as I can, but I want to tell you before you start that a lawsuit is equal to a fire."

Under the tremendous temptations that come upon the legal profession scores of men go down. There are scores of men who have gone down, and some of them, from being the pride of the highest tribunal of the State, have become a disgrace to the Tombs Court-room. Every attorney, in addition to the innate sense of right, wants the sustaining power of the old-fashioned religion of Jesus Christ. "Bring Zenas, the lawyer."

There are two or three

to which the legal profession is especially subjected. The first of all is scepticism. Controversy is the lifetime business of that occupation. Controversy may be incidental or accidental with us; but then it is perpetual. You get so used to pushing the sharp question "Why?" and making unaided reason superior to the emotions, that the religion of Jesus Christ, which is a simple matter of faith, and above human reason, has but little chance with some. A brilliant orator of the Republican party in the last Presidential campaign is a foe of Christianity, and wrote a book, on the first page of which he announced this sentiment: "An honest god is the noblest work of man!"

Scepticism is the mightiest temptation of the legal profession, and that man who can stand in that profession, resisting all solicitations to infidelity, and can be as brave as George Briggs, of Massachusetts, who stepped from the gubernatorial chair to the missionary convention, to plead the cause of a dying race; then, on his way home from the convention on a cold day, took off his warm cloak and threw it over the shoulders of a thinly-clad missionary, saying, "Take that and wear it, it will do you more good than it will me;" or like John McLean, who can step from the Supreme Court room of the United States to the anniversary platform of the American Sunday-school Union, its most brilliant orator—deserves congratulation and encomium.

Oh! men of the legal profession, let me beg of you to quit asking questions in regard to religion, and begin believing. The mighty men of your profession, Story and Kent and Mansfield, became Christians not through their heads but through their hearts. "Except ye become as a little child, ye shall nowise enter into the kingdom of God." If you do not become a Christian, oh! man of the legal profession, until you can reason this whole thing out in regard to God, and Christ, and the immortality of the soul, you will never become a Christian at all. Only believe. "Bring Zenas, the lawyer."

Another mighty temptation for the legal profession is to

SABBATH-BREAKING,

A trial has been going on for ten or fifteen days. The evidence is all in. It is Saturday night. The judge's gavel falls on the desk, and he says: "Crier, adjourn the court till ten o'clock Monday morning." On Monday morning the counsellor is to sum up the case. Thousands of dollars, yea the reputation and life of his client, may depend upon the success of his plea. How will he spend the intervening Sunday? There is not one lawyer out of a hundred that can withstand the temptation to break the Lord's Day under such circumstances. And yet if he does he hurts his own soul.

What, my brother, you cannot do before twelve o'clock Saturday night or after twelve o'clock Sunday night, God does not want you to do at all. Beside that you want the twenty-four hours of Sabbath rest to give you that electrical and magnetic force which will be worth more to you before the jury than all the elaboration of your case on the sacred day.

Our own Judge Neilson, in his interesting reminiscences of Rufus Choate, says that during the last case that gentleman tried in New York the court adjourned from Friday until Monday on account of the illness of Mr. Choate; but the chronicler says that on the intervening Sabbath he saw Mr. Choate in the old "Brick Church," listening to Rev. Dr. Gardiner Spring. I do not know whether on the following day Rufus Choate won his cause or lost it; but I do know that his Sabbatic rest did not do him any harm.

Every lawyer is entitled to one day's rest out of the seven. If he surrender that, he robs three—God, his own soul, and his client. Lord Castlereagh and Sir Thomas Romilly were the leaders of the bar in their day. They both died suicides. Wilberforce accounts for their aberration on the ground that they were never intermittent in their work, and they never rested on Sunday. "Poor fellow!" said Wilberforce, in regard to Castlereagh. "Poor fellow! it was non-observance of the Sabbath."

Chief Justice Hale says, "When I do not properly keep the Lord's day all the rest of the week is unhappy and unsuccessful in my worldly employment." I quote from the highest statute-book in the universe: "Remember the Sabbath Day to keep it holy." The legal gentleman who breaks that statute may seem for a while to be advantaged; but, in the long run, the man who observes this law of God will have larger retainers, vaster influence, greater professional success than those men who break that statute. Observance of the law of God pays not only spiritually and eternally, but it pays in hard dollars.

Another powerful temptation of the legal profession is to ARTIFICIAL STIMULUS.

No one except those who have addressed audiences know about the nervous exhaustion that comes afterward. The temptation to strong drink approaches the legal profession at that very point. Then, a trial is coming on. Through the ill-ventilated court-room the barrister's health has been depressed for days and weeks. He wants to rally his energy. He is tempted to resort to artificial stimulus. It is either to get himself up or let himself down that this temptation comes upon him. The flower of the American bar, ruined in reputation and ruined in estate, said in his last moments: "This is the end. I am dying on a borrowed bed, covered with a borrowed sheet, in a house built by public charity. Bury me under that tree in the middle of the field, that I may not be crowded. I always have been crowded."

Another powerful temptation of the legal profession is to allow the

of the profession to shut out thoughts of a great future. You know very well that you who have so often tried others will after awhile be put on trial yourself. Death will serve on you a writ of ejectment, and you will be put off these earthly premises. On that day all the affairs of your life will be presented in a "bill of particulars." No certiorari from a higher court, for this is the highest court.

The day when Lord Exeter was tried for high treason; the day when the House of Commons moved for the impeachment of Lord Lovatt; the day when Charles I. and Queen Catharine were put on trial; the day when Robert Emmet was arraigned as an insurgent; the day when Blennerhasset was brought into the court-room because he had tried to overthrow the United States Government, and all the other great trials of the world are nothing compared with the great trial in which you and I shall appear, summoned by the judge of quick and dead.

There will be no pleading there the "statute of limitations," no "turning State's evidence," trying to get off ourselves while others suffer; no "moving for a nonsuit." The case will come on inexorably, and we shall be tried. You, my brother, who have so often been advocate for others, will then need an advocate for yourself. Have you selected him? The Lord Chancellor of the Universe. If any man sin, we have an advocate—Jesus Christ the righteous. It is uncertain when your case will be called. "Be ye also ready."

Lord Ashburton and Mr. Wallace were leading barristers in their day. They died about the same time. A few months before their decease they happened to be at the same hotel in a village, the one counsel going to Devonshire, and the other to London. They had both been seized upon by a disease which they knew would be fatal, and they requested to be carried into the same room and laid down on sofas, side by side, that they might talk over old times and talk over the future. So they were carried in, and, lying there on opposite sofas, they talked over their old contests at the bar, and then they talked over the future world upon which they must soon enter. It was said to be a very affecting and solemn interview between Mr. Wallace and Lord Ashburton.

My friends, my subject puts you side by side with those men in your profession who have departed this life, some of them sceptical and rebellious, some of them penitent, childlike, and Christian. These were wandering stars, for whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever; while the others went up from the court-room of earth to the throne of eternal dominion. Through Christ, the advocate, these got glorious acquittal. In the other case it was a hopeless lawsuit. An unpardoned sinner versus the Lord God Almighty.

Oh! what a disastrous litigation. Behold He comes! The Judge! the Judge! The clouds of heaven the judicial ermine. The great white throne the judicial bench. The archangel's voice that shall wake the dead, the crier. The pound of the last thunderbolt, the falling gavel. "Come, ye blessed—depart ye cursed," the acquittal or the condemnation. "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God, and the books were opened."

A NOBLE JAPANESE BOY.

AT a public breakfast on May 17th, in connection with the foreign mission work of the Religious Tract Society in London, the Rev. O. H. Gulick, from Japan, related the following incident:

"Sixteen years ago, a lad sixteen years of age became possessed of the idea of visiting foreign lands and gaining the benefits of learning. A death penalty was then suspended over any one who should leave Japan. The lad ran away from his father's house, and found his way to a place in the northern extremity of Japan where American whaling ships were in the habit of touching, and obtained a passage in one of these ships to Shanghai. At Shanghai he became possessed of a copy of the Bible, and he began to study it in order to learn the English language. With the aid of the sailors he learned to read. He began with the Gospel of John, and he went on until he came to the sixteenth verse of the third chapter. He appears to have got the full sense of that verse, for he prayed that God would reveal His Son to him.

"This little runaway boy was the only praying person on board that ship. She was bound for Boston, and in due time arrived there. The captain, on reporting the ship to the owner, said he had a little Japanese boy on board; and the owner said, 'Send him up to my house.' After seeing the boy he sent him to college, and then to a theological seminary. While he was in the college an embassy came from his native land to America, and he was asked to leave his school and accompany them as an interpreter. He did so, and after they had finished their travels through America, England, Germany, and France, they said, 'We believe in you; come to Japan with us, and you shall have honor, wealth, and position.' He replied, 'No, I am studying to preach the Gospel of Christ to my fellow-countrymen, and I wish to complete my studies.' They thought he was very foolish to refuse, but he was firm of purpose. He told them that if his offence of running away from Japan were forgiven him, he should rejoice to return on the completion of his course. They assured him his offence would be condoned. Before his return, at a meeting of the American Board, he told the assembled people that he wished to return to Japan to establish a Christian college there; and he is now at the head of a Christian college in Tokio, the ancient capital, assisted by two of our missionaries, teaching young men and preparing them for the work of the Gospel ministry."

A Magistrate in Distress—Graham as a Good Samaritan—The Magistrate's Gratitude—Making a Canoe—The Split Tree—Mrs. Graham in Danger from a Cannibal—Her Narrative of an Adventure.

About three months after coming to the station, at which I remained ten months in all, I one day went out and saw a man standing by a tree on the riverside, not far from our house. I thought he was a black, and went back for my gun before I approached him. He was a white man, with only a tattered blanket around him. His face was black and shaggy with dirt and hair. To make his story short, it was this. He was a magistrate of the Oomeo country, on the other side of Mount Gibbo, near our settlement. He started to cross the mountains with flocks to sell in Melbourne, left his men to follow with rations and the cattle, knocked up his horse on the sharp rocks, lost his way, had finished all his food, was torn naked by the scrub, and utterly exhausted; after fourteen days of it he stood at the tree, afraid to come in where he knew there was a white woman.

I brought him in and dressed and fed him. Next day we mounted my stock-horses, and, with rations for his men, ascended Gibbo; and after a day and a night of terrible toil we met them ascending the other side, hungry and worn. We picked up his splendid mare in the mountain, and rested the men and cattle at my station. I never saw a man more grateful for help. He asked me the price of the rations. I felt rather hurt, and said, "Nothing." "Then," said he, pointing to some nine heifers that were rather foot-sore, "I'll take nothing for them or my mare." I had to accept them; and they proved a splendid accession to my little store. The mare I kept for years—one of the finest brood mares in the colony.

It is a mean thing to do a kindness with the hope of return. Indeed, it then ceases to be a kindness at all, and is only an informal bargain; yet, if it be true that curses are fowls that always fly home to roost (a raven, though, may stay away, when like Noah's it lights on carrion), it is also true of good turns. They not only deserve, but generally, sooner or later, receive other good turns; and sometimes they are doves, that, though they fly away singly, come back in pairs or even in flocks.

There was fine fishing on the Mitta Mitta; but I wanted a canoe for fishing, fowling, and conveyance of stores across. A great blue gum-tree had been fired by some means on the side of the river. It fell and split right down into equal parts. By lighting a fire in one of them and adzing it out, I formed a canoe thirty feet long, five wide, and two and a half deep. It was the finest bark (literally bark) ever launched on the Mitta Mitta. It was most pleasant for Selina, Bobindi, and myself to sit in it of evenings and haul up fish as fast as lines could lift them. While I was making it, an awkward circumstance occurred.

A black and his lubra (Kuntungera dialect for gin or woman) came into the hut where Selina was alone. The savage came forward and felt her neck and arm, which were quite to his mind as a tender joint. He grinned, while she gasped. He jabbered to his lubra, who utterly opposed killing the white lubra. Had Selina shouted it would have brought on silence of instant death. She gasped "boombilly, boombilly"—tobacco, and brought a peace-offering of the weed. Just at that stage of the proceedings the black caught sight of me coming in from the river, with the adze over my arm. He glided away, and his wife lingered behind.

When I went in I found Selina pale as death, and unable to speak. I ran to the bedroom for my gun, which I kept behind a sheet of bark, leaned against the wall. I would have been in time to give the cannibal the contents of a barrel, but Selina begged me, for mercy's sake, not to do so. Had the savage, while prowling about, got my gun, I should have been in a pretty fix. I felt grateful to God that He had protected me from the spear of the foe, while I was intent on my canoe, and still more grateful that I did not find my wife a corpse. After this, for months, the blacks did not make their appearance; and I thought they were gone, or had given us up. This led me into a mistake which was nearly the worst blunder of my life.

From Mrs. James Graham a near relative received the following account, which is given entire: You ask me to give you some account of the first years after our marriage. The first seven years after our marriage were the most laborious and dangerous of our lives. James had great bodily strength, and was very adventurous. My own constitution was then very strong also; and I always accompanied him in founding new stations, or out-stations. I never knew any one so unsuspecting as James; and, except I was with him, he seldom carried arms at that time, and had no idea in the world of making himself comfortable in his hut. He rather prided himself on living in the simplest way. I believe he could have subsisted on the chase or an occasional sheep and damper and pot of tea the whole year round. Spirits we seldom ever tasted. Many a station he formed where white man had never lived before; and many a path in the new country still bears his name. We had two encounters with bushrangers, and I had one with the blacks of which I shall tell you.

A few months after we had been married, Graham went a long way off to purchase some articles, and on his way home called at old Black's. There, there had been a cattle-muster; and fourteen men (Graham among them) were sitting and talking by the fire. Suddenly they looked round, and at the door saw two men armed with guns and pistols. They levelled their cocked guns, and said that the first man that moved or spoke aloud they would scatter his brains. Graham was sitting near the fire on a small solid block of wood; he complained that one side was roasting, he was so near the fire. "Then," said one of the bushrangers, "just turn the other, and you'll be well baked by the time we have searched the house; but if you move you're a dead man."

They sent in a third man to search the house for money. They searched a large box and got some money, but turned out some valuable checks (one for £60) as waste paper—the robber being too illiterate to read them. Graham was indignant that fourteen men should be bailed up by two. He therefore said to a man beside him, "I'll knock one of them down with this block I'm sitting on, and do you rush at the other." It was to an old government man, called Billy the Groom, he said it, and his reply was, "If you move I'll tell them, and you'll get your brains in your pocket." When they took what they liked, they mounted and galloped off.

When Graham returned home the following day some of the men came into our hut to inquire the news; for news is a precious commodity in the bush. He was telling how three daring bushrangers were out committing robberies, and how they had bailed up fourteen men at Black's. Just as he had got so far in his narration, some person said, in a rough voice, "How many are there here?" On looking around, there were two men with guns cocked and levelled at us. They ordered all to march out, and whoever did not should have his brains blown out. They all went out except myself. I did not think they would shoot a woman. I went up to the foremost of them, and laying my hand on his arm implored him not to rob us. He ordered me immediately to follow my husband. I persisted in my entreaties, telling him we were not long married, and were struggling hard to get a little hold of the world. He looked steadfastly in my face, and swore by Heaven he would not rob me. He kept his word; for, to the amazement of every person, they went off without taking a shilling's worth.

In this, as in many other instances which might be mentioned, we felt that the fatherly care of God was exercised over us for our preservation. It was our habit from the earliest days of our married life, to pray earnestly night and morning, that no evil should befall us, and I verily believe that in answer thereto the hosts of our Heavenly Father encamped around us, and kept us secure. And often when James was telling me in a quiet and touchingly devout way, how he had been led to see himself as a sinner, and to seek forgiveness through Christ, the narration was invariably concluded by both of us upon bended knee thanking our loving Benefactor for His loving kindness and tender mercies, and asking His help that we might live lives worth living, not only free from evil, but full of beneficent deeds done for Christ's sake and for the sake of our fellow-men.

Some time after we left Mitta Mitta, continues Mrs. Graham, with the cattle for what the natives call a "cainby"—a pool with springs of water. Before, we had been at what they call a "billibong"—water holes without springs and liable to dry up. It was a remarkably out-of-the-way, desolate place. After the cattle were thought to be sufficiently tailed (herded and taught to gather into certain camps), they started to the bush; and Graham and all the white men were away on their tracks. They slept on their tracks one night, and pursued them and brought them back next day.

During the first day of their absence, forty black fellows came up to the hut, painted and without their gins, which is a sure sign of war. They asked me, "Where white fellows?" I, of course, gave them no satisfaction. I was taking my tea, and they ordered me to give them bread ("tong-ong"), a commodity I was very short of at the time. Flour was then five pounds ten shillings per hundredweight, and so far in the bush it was not to be had for money. However, I shared what I had with them; but that did not satisfy them, and one of them threw it into the fire.

This so annoyed me—knowing how glad I should be of it myself—that, in the heat of the moment, I twisted a leg out of a stool and chased them out of the hut, striking the fellow that had thrown the bread in the fire a heavy blow between the shoulders. He turned, and uttering a savage yell, said, "You'll be dead before the sun sets to-morrow night." I shall never forget the feeling of loneliness and horror that came over me.

Night came on, but no James—no white man; and I was alone in the wild backwoods, in a frail bark hut, without a bar or lock. And, terrible to relate, I never once looked up to "the Strong for strength." Yet, in the multitude of His sparing and tender mercies, unsought-for and unseen, His mighty arm was uplifted to shield me from every danger. As the night advanced, I extinguished both fire and lamp, and kept myself perfectly quiet.

About twelve o'clock I heard my kangaroo dog bark and growl, and I knew he smelt a black.

Presently I heard a small voice softly call, "Mittiss, mittiss, you let in black piccaninny; mine piala (I'll tell you) news." I took courage and unfastened the door, which I had secured as well as I could by placing a stool and four pails of water against it. To my great relief the boy was alone. He had stolen away when the black fellows had gone to sleep, and had ventured his life to give me word that the blacks were going to kill me in the morning, "when the sun jumped up," for they are afraid to move in the dark, for fear of evil spirits. But for this fear, they can track in the dark, and no white person they desired to murder would be safe within their reach.

The boy said it was "Gentleman Billy" I had struck, and that it was he who was to kill me. I gave the poor boy some thick milk to drink, of which blacks are fond, and we spent the night quietly crouching together. It was a night of the horror and darkness of death; and no one, but such as have been in similar circumstances, can tell how the heart will warm and cling even to a faithful kangaroo dog in such danger. Just before day broke I let out the little black boy. Daylight had a wonderful effect in cheering me and scattering the horror of the night.

I got the double-barrelled gun and set off for the blacks' camp. They were all up and seated round their fire cross-legged, like tailors. On my approach they all held down their heads and began to jabber. I said firmly: "Good morning." None took any notice but still talked. I said: "My men, cobon mine been dream last night that black fellow was going to kill me when sun jump up. Now then, which one black fellow?" No response. I immediately levelled my gun at a tree near them and fired one barrel. They saw where the bark flew off, and started to their feet.

I again demanded which black fellow wanted to kill me, and bade him come on now, for I had another barrel for him and my gun never told a lie. I levelled the barrel first at one, then at another, repeating my question. They all fell back, crying: "Not me, mittiss, not me, mittiss. No black fellow want to kill you—you murry good woman." So after a great many assurances I was allowed to go back to the hut, and was not disturbed by them that day.

THE VISION OF THE EPHAH AND ITS FUTURE FULFILMENT.

By Rev. William Maude.

I. The Emblem Made use of, an Ephah—II. The Woman Found in the Ephah—God's Judgment on the Spirit of Trade—III. The Imprisonment of the Woman in the Ephah—The "Wickedness" of Trade Hidden Under a Specious Appearance—Inseparable From the Existing System—Will be more Fully Developed—IV. The Lifting up of the Ephah by the Two Women—Whence is it to be Borne Away?—V. The Ephah Transported to the Land of Shinar—VI. The Object of its Transportation—The Babylon of the Apocalypse.

IN the first six chapters of the book of the Prophet Zechariah we have a very remarkable series of highly symbolical visions. These visions are seven in number; but though this circumstance would seem to indicate that they have a mutual relation, and form a connected whole, like the seven parables in the thirteenth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, and the seven seals, seven trumpets, and seven vials of the Apocalypse, yet it is by no means easy to trace any such connection; while the meaning of some of the visions is particularly obscure. One of those on which the most light seems to be procurable is the sixth of the series—the vision of the Woman in the Ephah, to which I propose briefly to direct attention. This vision is recorded in the following words:

"Then the angel that talked with me went forth, and said unto me, Lift up now thine eyes, and see what is going forth. And I said, What is it? And he said, This is an ephah that goeth forth. He said, moreover, This is their eye through all the earth. And, behold, there was lifted up a talent of lead, and yonder was a woman sitting in the midst of the ephah. And he said, This is Wickedness; and he cast her down into the midst of the ephah, and he cast the weight of lead (i.e., the talent weight) upon the mouth thereof.

"Then lifted I up mine eyes and looked, and, behold, there came forth two women, and the wind was in their wings; for they had wings like the wings of a stork; and they lifted up the ephah between the earth and the heaven. Then said I to the angel that talked with me, Whither do these bear the ephah? And he said unto me, To build it an house in the land of Shinar; and when it is ready it shall be set in its own place" (Zechariah 5: 5–11).*

The principal features in this very remarkable vision are the following:

I. The principal emblem made use of—an ephah.

II. The woman found in the ephah, and described as "Wickedness."

III. The imprisonment of the woman in the ephah by the weight of lead.

IV. The lifting of the ephah by the two women.

V. The transportation of the ephah to the land of Shinar.

VI. The object of this transportation.

Each of these features deserves our careful attention, and if rightly understood they will together afford a complete, harmonious, and very instructive interpretation of the entire vision; which, it will be found, has been written for our instruction in these last days.

I. THE EPHAH.

This, it is hardly necessary to remind the reader, was the largest dry measure in ordinary use among the Jews, probably corresponding very nearly with our English bushel, though there is much uncertainty as to its exact size and capacity. Its symbolic significance in this vision—of which it forms the most conspicuous feature—will become more apparent when we observe that in close conjunction with it a "talent of lead" is spoken of in verse 7, or, as it is spoken of in the following verse, "the weight of lead:" most probably a circular plate of lead which weighed a talent, that is, about 158 lbs. troy.

Now the talent was constantly used in the sense of a fixed weight, by which gold, silver, and other things were weighed and measured; and it is very significantly spoken of here in connection with the ephah, as the latter was the usual measure of capacity. The talent was the standard measure of quantity, and the weight was made of lead as the most common heavy metal, and was used in all commercial transactions for weighing out money. Thus the ephah, in connection with the leaden talent, affords the most natural and appropriate symbol of trade or commercial transactions in general; just as the sword symbolizes war, the mitre priesthood, and the crown royalty.

Now commerce or trade—and by trade I mean the principles as well as the development of trade—is the special characteristic of these last days. There have been in the past great trading communities, imperial marts of commerce, such as Tyre, Egypt, and Babylon; but never as now did commerce attain such a vast development or its pursuit so engross the energies of the nations generally. The present age may emphatically be said to be the commercial age of the world's history, and hence, as Mr. B. W. Newton has well said, "the object of the vision shown to Zechariah is to instruct respecting the character of the influence which shall be dominant over Israel, and over the nations at the closing period of their evil history." It reveals where the master power shall reside, which, in the latter days, shall "go forth" with influence to control the energies of the earth.

And what is the symbol of this power? It is not a sceptre, nor a sword, nor a mitre, but it is an ephah. . . . An ephah is the symbol of commerce. There is to be a period, therefore, during which commerce is to rule the earth—a period when an ephah might fitly be emblazoned on the banner of each kingdom of the Roman world as the device best suited to indicate where the secret of its influence lay. "This," said the angel in allusion to the ephah, "this is their eye," i.e., this is that to which they have an eye—the object on which their attention fondly and greedily rests—"in all the earth." "This ephah is that toward which all those who dwell in the land" (the thieves and perjurers mentioned in verses 3 and 4) look with longing eyes. Wherever thieves and perjured persons are to be found throughout the land, and in all the earth, their eyes are ever to weights and measures, their whole thoughts are turned toward the acquisition of earthly gain." "This is their eye through all the earth."

II. THE WOMAN FOUND IN THE EPHAH.

At first, the ephah, it would seem, was all that the prophet beheld, and in this there was nothing either to startle or alarm; on the contrary, it presented a very pleasing and reassuring appearance as contrasted with the other more familiar forms of earthly power. The sceptre of the king, the sword of the warrior, the mitre of the priest, all these men have long learned, by bitter experience, to dread; but the reign of commerce promises the development of the earth's resources for the benefit of humanity, the cessation of war, as that which above all else interferes with its advancement, and the friendly intercourse of nation with nation. Such is man's thought, and hence we are continually hearing trade eulogized as the great civilizer and benefactor of the human race, while its image is ever represented upon cornucopia, out of which the fruits of the earth are pouring forth, and bearing in her hand the olive branch of peace.

But this is not God's thought about the matter. The prophet was moved to look again, and lo! in the midst of the ephah sat a woman—the Scripture symbol of a moral system—whom the angel at once characterized and denounced in the solemn words—"This is wickedness." Here, then, we have God's judgment on the spirit of trade. The "business principles" by which sometimes even Christian men boast that they are guided in their dealings with their fellows; "the maxims of commerce," as, e.g. "to buy in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest;" the "custom of the trade," the convenient euphonism under the vail of which men hide from themselves their flagrant dishonesties; all these the Most High, by the lips of His angel, declares to be "wickedness" in His sight.

Indeed, it is startling, when we come to think about it, how severe and condemnatory are almost all the references to trade which are found in Scripture. It is only in its last and most corrupt days that the kingdom of Israel is compared by Hosea to "a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand; he loveth to deceive" (Hosea 12: 7): and Ezekiel admonishes the princes of Israel after the restoration in the last days, "Ye shall have just balances, and a just ephah, and a just bath" (Ezekiel 14: 10); while all must remember the many solemn warnings contained in the book of Proverbs against false weights and balances, and the deceitful devices of ungodly traders.

Hence it comes to pass—a fact which has hardly been duly noticed—that in all the glowing pictures of the prosperity and happiness of the coming Millennial Age there is hardly a reference to be found to trade in the ordinary acceptation of the term. Agriculture, or the cultivation of the earth, which is a man's natural occupation, and therefore that which tends most to promote the health of both mind and body, will again become his ordinary business. The fertility of the earth, moreover, will be increased in a manner heretofore unknown. "Behold the days come, saith the Lord," by the mouth of Amos, "that the ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed; and the mountains shall drop new wine, and all the hills shall melt. And I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof; they shall also make gardens and eat the fruit of them" (Amos 9: 13, 14)).

Even the now barren mountain-top shall shake like Lebanon; while the meadows shall be clothed with flocks, and the valleys be so covered with corn that they shall shout for joy and also sing (Psalm 72: 16; 65: 13). Hence the Psalmist exultingly exclaims: "O let the nations be glad and sing for joy; for Thou shalt judge (rule) the people righteously and govern the nations upon earth. . . Then shall the earth yield her increase, and God, even our own God, shall bless us" (Psalm 67: 4, 6.) But in all this we find no promise of commercial prosperity; no picture of busy quays piled with merchandise; no mention of great cities in which masses of men are herded together and condemned to exhausting and sometimes killing toil. Can we think of "the black country" in the millennial earth? or of the gambling of the Stock Exchange in Jerusalem, when its name shall be, The Lord is there? No; the modern system of trade must be utterly broken up, the spirit of trade must be exorcised, before the true brotherhood of man can be realized, or the happiness of our race secured.

* I have given what is on high critical authority the most accurate rendering of the text.

A Persian Jew, named Dr. Acagin, who Had been led to see in the despised and crucified Nazarene, God's beloved Son, the promised Messiah, and his own personal Saviour, on his death-bed recently said to his co-religionists who visited him in his sickness, "The Christ for whom our fathers have looked for 3000 years I have found. I cannot let Him go!" When asked why he went on foot to the Lord's Supper when too weak and ill to do so with safety, he replied, "I did not like to come to the memorial of my Saviour's great sufferings and death for me, riding!"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Attempted Assassination of President Garfield is an event beside which all other topics become insignificant in their interest. On another page will be found a brief narrative of the tragical occurrence. Our readers will please bear in mind, when perusing the paragraphs on this page, that they were in type before the intelligence of the crime was received. In order that so large an edition as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has now attained may be in the hands of its readers punctually, late news can only be inserted by careful arrangements. This week, owing to Saturday being a half holiday and Monday being Independence Day, those arrangements were suspended, so that the work of printing the paper might not preclude those engaged in it from celebrating the day. The following paragraphs, therefore, stand as they were prepared before the melancholy news reached us.

The Name of ex-Senator Platt was Withdrawn as a candidate for the United States Senatorship by Speaker Sharpe on Friday. The motive for the withdrawal was stated to be "the interest of the Republican party." Every one interested in the character and good name of our public men hopes that the motive was correctly described. The cause popularly assigned for the act was too discreditable to be believed except on incontrovertible proof. After the announcement of the withdrawal, the Stalwarts scattered their votes for the long term; twelve of them followed the Speaker's example and voted for Mr. Richard Crowley. Up to Friday evening no material change was made in the vote for the short term. The behavior of the Senators and Assemblymen, the language used, despite the fact that ladies were present at the sittings, and the general mode of conducting this contest, combine to render the daily proceedings a source of pain and mortification to all honorable citizens. The adjournment of the Legislature will be hailed with a sense of relief.

The Albany Grand Jury has Indicted Senator Sessions for bribery. It has also indicted Amaziah D. Barber, Edward R. Phelps, and Charles A. Edwards, against whom charges were made before the Bribery Investigation Committee. Mr. Barber is indicted for depositing $12,500 with Mr. Phelps with the understanding that it should be used by him in influencing members of the Legislature. Other counts in the indictment allege that it was used upon members who are unknown. Mr. Phelps is indicted for receiving the money from Mr. Barber to be used in the bribery of members of the Legislature, and other counts allege that it was so used. Mr. Edwards is indicted for receiving $5000 from Joseph Dickson for the purpose of bribing members of the Legislature, and for attempting to use it on James Armstrong, member of Assembly from Oneida. Senator Sessions through his counsel pleaded for a prompt trial, but it was thought unadvisable to grant his request so long as the Legislature remained in session. The issue of a regular trial before the courts will probably be more satisfactory than the investigation before the committee, the members of which are naturally influenced by their political affiliation. It is expected that the committee will present three reports, which will be a result equivalent to the disagreement of a jury at a trial.

A Call for a Republican Conference was Circulated for signature last week among the Administration wing of the Republicans at Albany, and was also presented to some of the Stalwarts who were supposed to be wavering. Its object is believed to be to solidify the anti-Conkling vote, or to effect a compromise by which the Democratic vote may be obtained under conditions. The caucus it proposes is conditional upon obtaining sixty-five participants, of whom fifty-four are required to concur in any nomination, and it is provided that there shall be no secret ballot. The announcement that Senator Robertson's commission as Collector of the Port of New York had at length been signed by the President evoked a fresh outburst of protests against his continuing to sit and vote in the State Senate and joint convention. The Stalwarts complained that in doing so he violated the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution. The Democrats still continue to urge an adjournment, but at present without success. The effect of allowing the citizens to express their opinion by their votes on the question at issue would probably be so decisive that the deadlock as to the Senatorships would not be renewed.

The Success of Secretary Windom's Policy for refunding the maturing bonds is indicated by a statement issued on Thursday last. It appears that up to the close of business on that day there had been $98,000,000 in coupon five per cent bonds received for continuance at 3½ per cent, including those which have been presented at the London agency to date. Notices have reached the Department from a number of holders indicating their intention to forward in a day or two more bonds for continuance. After these bonds arrive it is estimated by Treasury officers there will be only about $15,000,000 of the $118,646,450, the amount of the coupon fives outstanding at the time the option of continuance was made, left to be redeemed. There are many people who are confirmed by this result in their belief that the whole might have been refunded at three per cent, as Congress proposed; but considering the undecided state in which Mr. Hayes's veto left the problem, the arrangement is probably the best that could be made.

The Equivocal Nature of the Plank in the Ohio Republican platform which related to the subject of prohibition rendered it, as we pointed out at the time, a very minute concession to the total abstinence party. It is now reported, on apparently good authority, that at the approaching Democratic convention a stalwart Prohibition plank will be inserted in the platform. If that statement is correct, the contest in Ohio will be watched with keen interest throughout the country. The temperance question will then inevitably distribute the votes of both parties, and the relative strength of Prohibitionists and Germans will be tested more decisively than that of Democrats and Republicans.

The Pigeon Shooting Match at Coney Island is a matter of public interest. Telegraphic accounts of the scores made by the different marksmen are published in all the daily papers, and are regularly cabled to Europe. There are twenty thousand pigeons collected as targets for the shooters, and they are put singly or in pairs in traps, and being released at a given signal, are fired at as they rise. On the first day of the match two thousand pigeons were used, of which fifteen hundred were killed. This slaughter was not without practical result; it proved that a certain "gentleman" was a better marksman than any one else on the ground. There are people who suppose the same result might have been attained if the targets had been glass balls, but they are mistaken; one of the most interesting features of the sport to those who take part in it either as actors or spectators, is that the target shall have flesh and nerves and shall bleed and die in torture when hit. The amusement is a grim satire on our much-vaunted refinement and advanced civilization. Perhaps when the reports arrive in Spain some Spanish speculator will feel encouraged to make another effort to introduce bull-fighting here. Men who are proud of shooting tame pigeons might eventually have courage enough to fight a bull. This delight in cruelty and destruction of life displayed by men of education and culture proves how vain is the hope that anything short of God's grace can elevate human nature. This characteristic of depravity is not new (Isaiah 59 : 7).

A Conference for Bible Study at Northfield, is it is announced, planned by Mr. Moody, to take place at an early date. Dr. Andrew Bonar, of Scotland a brother of Dr. Horatius Bonar, is expected to attend and take part in the conference. Mr. Moody is anxious that Christians everywhere should be stirred up to increased earnestness in Bible study and in Christian activity, which blessed result may be hoped from united conference and prayer for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

The Death of the Rev. George Sheldon, D.D., occurred at his home at Princeton, New Jersey, on June 16th. He was sixty-eight years of age, and to the many friends he made in New Jersey and in the South his death comes as a heavy loss. For thirty years he was the District Secretary of the American Bible Society for New Jersey and Delaware. Dr. Sheldon was born in Northampton, Mass., October 12th, 1813. He graduated at Williams College in 1835, and at Andover Theological Seminary. From 1840 to 1848 he was the pastor of a church near Charleston, South Carolina. He leaves four sons and two daughters. Two of his sons are lawyers in Chicago, one is a lawyer in this city, and another is an editor in this city. Dr. Sheldon lived for twenty years in Princeton, whither he removed his father's homestead, piece by piece, from Northampton.

A Medical Mission was Opened at 5 East Broadway, New York, on Monday, June 27th, for the benefit of the sick poor. The distinguishing characteristic of the mission is its recognition of the need of the Divine blessing. A daily prayer-meeting is held in the large room before patients are attended to. No charge is made to any one applying who can furnish evidence that they are sick and poor, but both those qualifications are indispensable. The Superintendent of the mission is Dr. Dowkonott, who states that he has established a medical mission in Liverpool, England, on the same basis as the one of which he is now in charge. As long ago as forty years the first "home" medical mission was started in the Cowgate, one of the most squalid thoroughfares in Edinburgh, Scotland, and Christian medical students of its training school are to be found laboring to-day in Japan, China, Mongolia, Palestine, Syria, Constantinople, Smyrna, Rome, and other places. London, Liverpool, Glasgow, Manchester, Birmingham, and Bristol, in England, all have similar agencies, and New York has abundant need of such an institution as that the Medical Mission purports to be.

A Very Small and Reprehensible Joke has been played on the fire brigades of New York during the past week. Some one who understood the construction of the fire-alarm boxes fixed to the telegraph poles in the streets, took advantage of these valuable agencies to summon the fire-engines by a triple call. On one occasion seven engines promptly responded, with the hook and ladder companies. The summons was sent from a box in Eighty-sixth Street, and when the engines arrived they found in the box a paper, on which was written, "The comet is on fire, come and put it out." The citizens generally appreciate too highly the services rendered in time of peril by our brave firemen to give them needless trouble, but it appears there is some one among us who is so lacking in sense as to exercise his wit in imposing on the brigades. Such men, like those who delight to ridicule religion, are of that class whose punishment is described in Prov. 1 : 26, 28.

The Third International Sunday-school Convention, which closed at Toronto, Canada, on June 24th, was an important and interesting occasion. The sessions were held in the Pavilion of the Horticultural Gardens. Delegates to the number of about five hundred, with at least an equal number of "reserves" and visitors, were in attendance from nearly all of the United States; and some of the best Christian talent in the North, in the South, in the West, and in Canada was present, exercising a powerful influence upon the heart and minds of the assembly by able and rousing addresses. England was well represented by Mr. F. F. Bilsey, and the colored race by the Rev. W. B. Arnett. The public of Toronto came in such overwhelming numbers to the evening session the first day that an overflow meeting had to be hastily arranged in the open air for those who could not get into the pavilion; and the next night the exercises at the pavilion were duplicated before 2,000 persons in an adjoining church. But even that accommodation proving insufficient, there were on the last night of the Convention, assemblies held in two churches simultaneously with the crowded meeting in the pavilion.

The city of Toronto is honorably distinguished for a strong religious element, which rigidly forbids the running of street cars and the sale of newspapers on Sunday, and which has suppressed the exhibition of papers with lewd pictures on the newsstands. It would be difficult to find another city in the world with so large a proportion of earnest Christian workers among its highest public officers and its leading professional and business men. The Hon. S. H. Blake, who was elected President of the Convention, was till very recently one of the three judges of the Court of Chancery of the province of Ontario. He is President of the Toronto Young Men's Christian Association, in whose hall he teaches a Bible class every Saturday afternoon, and he conducts three Bible classes every Sunday, one in the Sunday school of St. James' Cathedral, and two in mission churches of the city.

A Lady's Courage and Presence of Mind frustrated a lynching in Michigan last week. On June 22d a determined attempt was made to lynch a man who shot and killed his employer, about a month ago at Lamont, and who is now in jail at Grand Haven. About a dozen citizens appeared at the jail, overpowered the deputy sheriff, and secured their victim. The sheriff was absent, but his wife was aroused by the noise, and discovering the situation, closed the outside door, which the lynching party had left unguarded, and imprisoned the whole party. She then sent a servant to ring the fire alarm, which called out the citizens, and completely frustrated the whole attempt.

Governor Colquitt's Daughter was Rescued from imminent danger on Saturday June 11th. A telegram from Charleston, Ill., says that the young lady, who was on a visit to her uncle, a citizen of Charleston, Ill., was riding on horseback when her horse ran away and dashed through the business portion of the city at a furious rate. A gentleman who witnessed her peril, dexterously sprang from his saddle, seized the bridle of her horse, and stopped him, and thus saved her from serious injury, if not a violent death. Such a rescue is deserving of high praise, and the esteemed Governor of Georgia is doubtless full of gratitude to the young man who risked his life in his desperate act. Would that some such rescue, made in dependence on the Holy Spirit, could arrest the course of many of our young people who are carried away of evil habit and evil companionship to a fate worse even than death.

A Fatal Sleep on a Steamer Resulted in the loss of three lives recently. The report of the United States Local Inspectors of Steam Vessels at Norfolk, Va., upon the accident to the steamer B. & J. Baker, has been received by Superintendent Inspector-General Dumont. It states that the accident was a collapse of the port flue, caused by over-pressure. All parts of the flue, the inspectors say, were sufficiently thick to have withstood the regulation pressure. The evidence of one of the deck-hands shows that the engineer on watch was asleep in his berth at the time of the accident, and this evidence is corroborated by the fact that his body was found in the berth. The condition of the boiler shows that all the doors were closed. There were three men killed by the accident. The vessel was lying at anchor. Sleep in such circumstances was a criminal act. There are men placed in positions of responsibility in families and churches who are too often guilty of similar negligence, in spite of the solemn warning of the prophet (Ezekiel 33 : 6).

The Largest Purchase of Land Ever Made by a single person was effected recently, when Hamilton Desson, a prominent manufacturer of Philadelphia, closed a contract by which he secured four million acres of land from the State of Florida. The land was a part of the public domain of Florida, and under control of the Board of Internal Improvement of the State. It is said to be Mr. Desson's intention to begin an emigration scheme which will result in a very large addition to the population of Florida. It is an immense estate to hold in actual possession, but the Christian as one of the sons of God is an heir to one far greater, being joint heir with Christ, under whose feet the whole creation will one day be in subjection (Psa. 3 : 6).

A Man Born Blind has Received Sight at New-Hope, Va., according to a report in the Baltimore Gazette. He was a graduate of the Stanton Institute for the blind, and displayed so much intelligence and mental capacity as to acquire a considerable eminence among his fellow-graduates. A Baltimore surgeon examined the sightless eyes of the clever man, and believed that a careful operation would enable him to see. The experiment was tried with perfect success, and he is now able to see the smallest print. The strange sensations he experienced on first beholding the light, the appearance of objects long familiar to him by the sense of touch, he could not describe; but the most delightful experience he had was in gazing for the first time on the face of his aged mother. The change is for him like entering on a new life. It is probably the only physical change which at all adequately typifies the spiritual change of the new birth, when old things pass away and all things become new. It may also typify the final change from mortality to immortality when we shall see our Saviour face to face (1 Cor. 13 : 12).

A Dog Died of Grief over the Death of its young mistress at Caldwell, Texas, on June 21st. The dog had been the favorite playmate of the child of Captain Roland, and when the child fell sick and died, the dog appeared much distressed. While arrangements were being made for the interment of the child, the dog hung around the corpse, moaning most piteously and otherwise exhibiting its grief. It followed the coffin in the funeral procession, and when the grave was opened, it jumped in and refused to come out for coaxing or scolding. At last the dog was tied with a rope, and taken from the ground and secured to a tree to prevent its going into the grave again. After the burial rites were performed, and the dog was approached to be turned loose, it was found dead. As we try to conceive of the intensity of this poor brute's love, which was so deep as to extinguish its life, what are we to think of our own apathy and coldness toward the Saviour, who not only claims our love, but tells us how He would have us prove it (John 15 : 13–14).

A Wooden Leg that was Better than a natural one is described by a writer in the Youth's Companion. A crossing sweeper owned the limb, and explained its advantages to the writer, who said he was sure he would not exchange one of his own legs for a wooden one. "I was not speaking of your legs, sir," replied Bob, dryly, "but of the pair I had. They were not given to walking very straight. Drink gave me this wooden leg," continued Bob; "and I must say that it ain't very grateful to the drink in return; for although it makes noise enough in ordinary, it knocks double as loud whenever I'm near a public house. It says 'don't,' as plainly as you can, sir—meaning don't go in. I was once nearly led back into the old ways, and was going into 'The King's Head' with a friend as I had not seen for years, but this leg wouldn't go in. 'All right,' I says, 'you know how I got you, and I'll not go in.'"

WHAT THE FARM LABORERS CAN DO AND WHAT THEY CANNOT DO.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And he said, So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground; and should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how. For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come."—MARK 4 : 26–29.

LAST Lord's-day morning our subject was the laborers upon God's farm and their great Master; and then we tried to show how far human agency was necessary in the work of the Gospel. We also saw how thoroughly all holy results depend upon God, for neither he that soweth nor he that watereth is anything, but God who giveth the increase. We have much the same subject this morning, only it goes a little deeper, and yet more fully shows how far the laborer can go, and how far he cannot go; where man may enter with holy industry, and where no human work can possibly intrude. Our subject on this occasion will mainly be the measure and limit of human instrumentality in the kingdom of grace. If we shall be taught of the Spirit of God we shall find this Scripture to be full of instruction upon the matter.

It is remarkable that the parable before us is peculiar to Mark. No other evangelist has recorded it, but we do not think any the less of it on that account. We are glad that the Holy Spirit led Mark to reserve this pearl out of the many excellent things which our Lord said which have been lost. John tells us that if a record of all the works which Jesus did could have been preserved they would have made a library so large that scarce the world itself could have contained all the books. Many of the things that Jesus said floated about, no doubt, for a time, and were gradually forgotten, and we have to be thankful to the Spirit of God for perpetuating this choice similitude by the hand of His servant Mark.

for the laborers upon the farm of God. It is a parable for all who are concerned in the kingdom of God. It will be of little value to those who are in the kingdom of darkness, for they are not bidden to sow the good seed: "Unto the wicked God saith, what hast thou to do to declare My statutes?" But all who are loyal subjects to King Jesus, all who are commissioned to scatter seed for the Royal Husbandman, will be glad to know how the kingdom advances, glad to know how the harvest is preparing for Him whom they serve.

I. We shall, first, learn from our text and what we cannot do. Let this stand as our first head. Notice, then, that we can sow. Any man who has received the knowledge of the grace of God in his heart can teach others. I include under the term "man" all who know the Lord, be they male or female. We cannot all teach alike, for all have not the same gifts; to one is given one talent, and to another ten. Neither have we all the same opportunities, for one lives in obscurity and another has far-reaching influence. Something of sacred service is within the reach of everyone's capacity, whether it be the mother in the family, the nurse-girl with the infant, the boy in the school, the workman at the bench, or the nurse at the bedside. Those with the smallest range of opportunities can, nevertheless, do something for Christ and His cause. The precious seed of the Word of God is small as a grain of mustard-seed, and may be carried by the feeblest hand where it shall multiply a hundred-fold.

WHAT WE CAN DO

You will need heavenly teaching that you may carefully select the wheat, and keep it free from the darnel of error. We must even winnow out of it our own thoughts and opinions, for these may not be according to the mind of God. Men are not saved by our word, but by God's Word. We are bound to see that we know the Gospel, and teach the whole of it. To different men we must, with discretion, bring forward that part of the Word of God which will best bear upon their consciences; for much may depend upon the word being in season, and not a chance sentence thrown out at random. We shall have enough to do if we look well to the seed-basket, lest, peradventure, we should sow tares as well as wheat, or should cast good seed wantonly, where it can only feed evil birds.

Having selected the seed, we shall have plenty of work if we go forth and sow it broadcast everywhere, for every day brings its opportunity, and every company furnishes its occasion. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand."

"SOW BESIDE ALL WATERS."

Imitate the sower, who was not so penny-wise that he would only cast the seed where, according to his judgment, all was good soil, but who, feeling that he had other work for his judgment beside the selecting of the soil, threw the seed right and left as he went on his way, and denied not a handful even to thorny and rocky soils.

Still, wise sowers discover favorable opportunities for sowing, and gladly seize upon them. While we are to work for God always, yet there are seasons when it were casting pearls before swine to talk of holy things; and there are other times when if we were slothful it would be a shameful waste of propitious seasons. Sluggards in the time for ploughing and sowing are sluggards indeed, for they not only waste the day, but throw away the year. If you watch for souls, and use hours of happy vantage, and moments of sacred softening, you will not complain of the scanty space allowed for agency. Even should you never be called to water, or to reap, your office is wide enough, if you fulfil the work of the sower.

For little though it seem to teach the simple truth of the Gospel, yet it is essential. How shall men hear without a teacher? The farm never brings forth a harvest without sowing. Weeds will grow without our help, but not so wheat and barley. The human heart is so depraved that it will naturally bring forth evil in abundance, and Satan is quite sure not to let it lie without a sowing of evil seed; but if ever a man's soul is to yield fruit unto God the seed of truth must be cast into it from without.

Servants of God, the seed of the word is not like thistle-down, which is borne by every wind, nor like certain seeds wafted by their own parachutes here, there, and everywhere, but the wheat of the kingdom needs a human hand to sow it, and without such agency it will not enter into men's hearts, neither can it bring forth fruit to the glory of God. Scatter ye, scatter ye, then, the seed of the kingdom, for this is essential to the harvest. The spreading of the Gospel is not a thing that ye may do or may not do, according to your pleasure, but it is a duty urgently needful, to be neglected at your peril. Ye can sow the seed, and the seed must be sown.

This seed should be sown often, for the times are such that one sowing may not suffice. Sow again and again, for many are the foes of the wheat, and if ye repeat not your sowing ye may never see a harvest. The seed must be sown everywhere, too, for there are no choice corners of the world that you can afford to let alone, in the hope that they will be self-productive. Ye may not leave the rich and intelligent under the notion that surely the Gospel will be found among them, for it is not so: the pride of life leads them away from God. You may not leave the poor and illiterate, and say, "Surely they will of themselves feel their need of Christ." Not so: they will sink from degradation to degradation unless you uplift them with the Gospel. No tribe of man, no peculiar constitution of the human mind, may be neglected by us, but everywhere we must preach the word, in season and out of season.

I have heard that Captain Cook, the celebrated circumnavigator, was in one respect an admirable example to us. Wherever he landed, in whatever part of the earth it might be, he took with him a little packet of divers English seeds, and he was often observed to scatter them in suitable places. He would leave the boat and wander up from the shore. He said nothing to anybody, but quietly scattered English seeds wherever he went, so that he belted the world with the flowers and herbs of his native land. Imitate him wherever you go: sow spiritual seed in every place that your foot shall tread upon.

Let us now think of what you cannot do. You cannot, after the seed has left your hand, cause it to put forth life. I am sure for you do not know how it grows. The text saith, "And the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how." That which is beyond the range of our knowledge is certainly beyond the reach of our power. Can you make a seed germinate? You may place it under circumstances of damp and heat which will cause it to swell and break forth with a shoot, but the germination itself is beyond you. How is it done? We know not.

After the germ has been put forth, can you make it further grow, and develop its life into leaf and stem? No; that, too, is out of your power. And when the green, grassy blade has been succeeded by the ear, can you ripen it? It will be ripened; but can you do it? You know you cannot; you can have no finger in the actual process, though you may promote the conditions under which it is produced. Life is a mystery; growth is a mystery; ripening is a mystery; and these three mysteries are as fountains sealed against all intrusion.

Certainly this is true of the rise and progress of the Word of God in the heart. It enters the soul, and roots itself ye know not how. Naturally men hate the word, but it enters and it changes the heart, so that they come to love it, but we know not how. Their whole nature is renewed, so that instead of producing sin it yields repentance, faith, and love, but we know not how. How it is that the Spirit of God deals with the mind of man, how He creates the new heart and the right spirit, how we are begotten again unto a lively hope, how we are born of the Spirit, we cannot tell.

This work of God having proceeded in the growth of the seed, what next?

WE CAN REAP

the ripe ears. After a season God the Holy Spirit uses His servants again. As soon as the living seed has produced first of all the blade of thought, and afterward the green ear of conviction, and then faith, which is as full corn in the ear, then the Christian worker comes in for further service, for he can reap. "When the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle." This is not the reaping of the last great day, for that does not come within the scope of the parable, which evidently relates to a human sower and reaper. The kind of reaping which the Saviour here intends is that which He referred to when He said to His disciples, "Lift up now your eyes, for behold the fields are white already to the harvest."

Christian workers begin their harvest work by watching carefully to see when men evince signs of faith in Christ. They are eager to see the blade, and delighted to mark the ripening ear. They often hope that men are believers, but they long to be sure of it; and when they judge that at last the fruit of faith is put forth, they begin to encourage, to congratulate, and to comfort. They know that the young believer needs to be housed in the barn of Christian fellowship, that he may be saved from a thousand perils.

He does not rest till he has introduced the convert to the communion of the faithful. For our work, beloved, is but half done when men are made disciples and baptized. We have then to encourage, to instruct, to strengthen, to console, and succor in all times of difficulty and danger. What saith the Saviour? "Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you."

The reaper is the man who gathers in the converts, and he fulfils an honorable and useful office. If I preach the Gospel to-day, and some shall be converted, I shall be the sower; but if going home to the respective towns in which you live, you who have dropped in here as strangers, shall be received into the churches of your own pastors, they will be reaping what I have sown. I envy not my brother minister his success in gathering in the converts, but I rejoice with him. The sower and the reaper may well rejoice together, for our work is one, and we labor for one Lord.

II. Our second head is like unto the first, and consists of

and what we cannot know. We can know when we have sown the good seed of the word that it will grow; for God has promised that it shall do so. Not every grain in every place; for some will go to the bird, and some to the worm, and some to be scorched by the sun; but as a general rule God's word shall not return unto Him void, it shall prosper in the thing whereto He hath sent it. This we can know. And we can know that the seed when once it takes root will continue to grow; that it is not a dream or a picture that will disappear, but a thing of force and energy, which will advance from a grassy blade to corn in the ear, and under God's blessing will develope to actual salvation, and be as the "full corn in the ear." God helping and blessing it, our work of teaching will not only lead men to thought and conviction, but to conversion and eternal life.

We also can know, because we are told so, that the reason for this is mainly because there is life in the word. In the Word of God itself there is life, for it is written "The Word of God is quick and powerful,"—that is, "living and powerful." It is "the incorruptible seed which liveth and abideth forever." It is the nature of living seed to grow, and the reason why the Word of God grows in men's hearts is because it is the living word of the living God, and where the word of king is there is power. We know this, because the Scriptures teach us so. Is it not written, "Of His own will begat He us by the word of truth?"

Moreover, the earth, which is here the type of the man, "bringeth forth fruit of herself." We must mind what we are at in expounding this, for human hearts do not produce faith of themselves they are as hard rock on which the seed perishes. But it means this, that as the earth under the blessing of the dew and the rain is, by God's secret working upon it, made to take up and embrace the seed, so the heart of man is made ready to receive and enfold the Gospel of Jesus Christ within itself. There is a something congruous in the earth to the seed which is sown in it, so that the seed is adopted and nourished by the soil. Just so is it by the heart of man when God makes it honest and good ground.

You, the sower, are thus taught by the parable that spiritual life and growth are of God, and come by the seed and the soil far more than by you. So far as the truth is concerned, its intrinsic power is the same whoever preaches it. It is not because such and such a divine, whom God has blessed tells out the Gospel, that therefore it lives in men's hearts. Oh no; it is because of the truth itself and because of the hearts themselves which receive the truth by the secret working of God's blessed Spirit. So much as this we may know, and is not enough for all practical purposes?

Still, there is a something which we cannot know; a secret into which we cannot pry. I repeat what I have said before, you cannot look in men's inward parts and see exactly how the truth takes hold upon the heart, or the heart takes hold upon the truth. Many have watched their own feelings till they have become blind with despondency, and others have watched the feelings of young till they have done them rather harm than good by their rigorous supervision. In God's work there is more room for faith than for sight. The heavenly seed grows secretly. You must bury it out of sight, or there will be no harvest.

Thou knowest not the way of the Spirit. His work is wrought in secret, and thou canst not tell whence He cometh or whither He goeth. "Explain the new birth," says somebody. My answer is, "Experience the new birth, and you shall know what it is." There are secrets into which we cannot enter, for their light is too bright for mortal eyes to endure. O man, thou canst not become omniscient, for thou art a creature, and not the Creator. For thee there must ever be a region not only unknown but unknowable.

III. Thirdly, our text tells us

WHAT WE MAY EXPECT

if we work for God, and what we may not expect. According to this parable we may expect to see fruit. The husbandman casts his seed into the ground, and the seed springs and grows, and he may expect a harvest. I wish I could say a word to stir up the expectations of Christian workers; for I fear that many work without faith. If you have a garden or a field, and you sow seed in it, you would be very greatly surprised and grieved if it did not come up at all; but many Christian people seem quite content to work on, and they never reckon upon result so much as to look for it expectantly. This is a pitiful kind of working—pulling up empty buckets by the year together. Surely I must either see a result for my labor and be glad, or else, failing to see it, I must be ready to break my heart, if I be a true servant of the great Master. We ought to expect results; if we had expected more we should have seen more, but a lack of expectation has been a great cause of failure in God's workers.

But we may not expect to see all the seed which we sow spring up the moment we sow it. Sometimes, glory be to God, we have but to deliver the word, and straightway men are converted; the reaper overtakes the sower, in such instances, but it is not always so. Some sowers have been diligent for years upon certain plots of ground, and apparently all has been in vain, till at the last the harvest has come, a harvest which, speaking after the manner of men, had never been reaped if they had not persevered to the end. This world, as I believe, is to be converted to Christ; but not to-day, nor to-morrow, peradventure not for many an age; but the sowing of the centuries is not being lost, it is all working on toward the grand ultimatum.

A crop of mushrooms may soon be produced, but a forest of oaks will not reward the planter till generations of his children have moldered into the dust. It is ours to sow, and to hope for quick reaping; but still we ought to remember that "the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain," and so must we. We are to expect results, but not to be dispirited if we see them not to-day or on the morrow.

We are also to expect to see the good seed grow, but not always after our fashion. We are nearly all of us like children, for still there are not many fathers, and like children we are apt to be impatient. Your little boy sowed mustard and cress yesterday in his little garden. This afternoon Master Johnny will be turning over the ground to see if the seed is growing. There is no probability that his mustard and cress will come to anything, for he will not let it alone long enough for it to grow. So is it with hasty workers; they must see the result of the Gospel directly, or else they will leave off, and distrust the blessed word. Although the people may have taken the word into their minds and may be considering it, certain preachers are in such a hurry that they will allow no time for thought, no space for counting the cost, no opportunity for men to consider their ways, and turn to the Lord with full purpose of heart.

I am solemnly convinced that some men are prevented from being saved by being told that they are saved already, and by being puffed up with a notion of perfection when they are not even broken in heart. Perhaps if such people had been taught to look for something deeper they might not have been satisfied with receiving seed on stony ground; but now they are content with that which comes of seed sown on unbroken rocks; they exhibit a rapid development, and an equally rapid decline and fall. Let us believingly but let us look to see it advance after the manner of the preacher, firstly, secondly, thirdly; first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear.

We may expect also to see the seed ripen. Our work will lead up by God's grace to real faith in those He hath wrought upon by His word and Spirit, but we must not expect to see it perfect at the first. How many mistakes have been made here. Here is a young person under impression, and some good sound brother talks with that young person and asks profound questions. He shakes his experienced head, and knits his furrowed brows. He goes into the corn-field to see how the crops are prospering, and though it is early in the year, he laments that he cannot see an ear of corn; indeed, he perceives nothing but mere grass. "I cannot see a trace of corn," says he. No, brother, of course you cannot; for you will not be satisfied with the blade as an evidence of life, but must insist upon seeing everything at full growth at once. If you had looked for the blade you would have found it; and it would have encouraged you.

Do not despise the day of small things. Do not examine the new-born babe about Calvinism in its different shades, to see whether he is sound after your idea of soundness; ten to one he is a long way off sound, and you will only worry the dear heart by introducing difficult questions. Speak to him about his being a sinner, and Christ a Saviour, and you will in this way water him, so that his grace in the ear will become the full corn. It may be that there is not much that looks like wheat about him yet, but by-and-by you shall say, "Wheat! ah, that it is, if I know wheat. This man is a true ear of corn, and gladly will I place him among my Master's sheaves."

If you crush the blades, where will the ears come from? If you cut off the green ears, where will the ripe ones be? Expect grace in your converts, but do not look to see glory in them just yet. It is enough if you see heaven begun; do not look to see it complete in them here below.

Expect, then, brethren—for you may expect it—but do not expect to find every seed springing up. "There," says one, "that is a discouraging word." It may be so, but it is a true word. There is an old worldly proverb which saith, "Blessed are those who expect nothing, for they shall never be disappointed." I do not believe in that proverb, but I believe in a moderate form of it: "Blessed are those who do not expect what is unreasonable, for they will not get it." If you young people who begin to work for God expect that every word you speak will be useful to all who hear it, it will not happen, and you will grow discouraged; therefore I would raise your expectation as high as truth permits, and no higher. I would have you climb to the top of the ladder; but if I encourage you to go any higher you will soon be going down the other side, under the notion that you are ascending.

TO SEE A HARVEST,

The results of our ministry in these days will be mixed, even as they were when Paul preached, and some believed and some believed not; we must be prepared for that, and yet I bid you let your expectations be very large, for you may have sixty or a hundred-fold of fruit from the seed if God be with you, and that will abundantly repay you, even if the crows and the worms should eat their share of the grain.

IV. The last head is this,

WHAT SLEEP WORKERS MAY TAKE,

and what they may not take; for it is said of this sowing man, that he sleeps and rises night and day, and the seed springs and grows up he knoweth not how. They say a farmer's trade is a good one, because it is going on while he is abed and asleep; and surely ours is a good trade, too, when we serve our Master by sowing good seed, for it is growing even while we are asleep.

But how may a good workman for Christ lawfully go to sleep? I answer, first, he may sleep the sleep of restfulness born of confidence. You are afraid the kingdom of Christ will not come, are you? Who asked you to tremble for the ark of the Lord? Afraid for the infinite Jehovah that His purposes will fail? Shame on you! Your anxiety dishonors your God. You degrade Him by a suspicion of His failing. Shall Omnipotence be defeated? You had better sleep than wake to play the part of Uzzah.

Also take that sleep which leads to a happy waking of joyful expectancy. Get up in the morning and feel that the Lord is ruling all things for the accomplishment of His own purpose. Look for it. If you do not sleep you certainly will not wake up in the morning refreshed, and ready for more work. If it were possible for you to sit up all night and eat the bread of carefulness you would be unfit to attend to the service which your Master appoints for the morning; therefore take your rest and be at peace, and work with calm dignity; for the matter is safe in the Lord's hands.

Take your rest because you have consciously resigned the work into God's hands. After you have spoken the word resort to God in prayer, and commit it into God's hand, and then do not fret about it. It cannot be in better keeping—leave it there.

But do not sleep the sleep of unwatchfulness. The farmer sows his seed, but he does not therefore forget it. He has to mend his fences to keep the cattle out; it may be he has to drive away birds, to remove weeds, or to prevent floods. While he is not sitting down to watch the growth, he has plenty else to do. He never sleeps or even of inaction; for each season has its demand upon him. He has sown one field, but he has another to sow. He has sown, but he has also to reap; and if reaping is done, he has something else to do. He has never done; for in one part or other of the farm he is needed. His sleep is but an interlude that gives him strength to continue in his occupations. Consider that the parable teaches us that we have not to intrude into the domain of God; but with regard to the secret working of truth upon man's mind, we are to take our rest, and go on our way, serving our day and generation according to the will of God.

I want you, dear brethren and sisters, to come to that point this morning. "Lord, this is Thy work. Lord, thou canst do Thine own work. Lord, do Thine own work—we entreat and beseech Thee to do it. Lord, help us to do our work, both at the beginning of the chapter and at the end of the chapter, confident that Thou wilt not fail in the middle of the chapter; but that Thou wilt do Thy work. Help us to exercise faith in Thee, and to go about our labor in the confidence that Thou art with us, and we are workers together with Thee."

Up, brethren, to the mountain, to the brow of Carmel, up there and pray that God will send a shower of heavenly rain by His Spirit. Up, Elijah; put your head between your knees and cry till you are certain that the cloud, though it be little at first as a man's hand, will cover all the earth and water the land with blessing. Up and pray that God will sweep away all the doubts which, like locusts, devour the church to-day, and all love of sin and all rejection of Christ, that at this hour, even at this hour, God may glorify Himself by the feeble hand of His sower while He scatters the seed. I beg your prayers, my dear and faithful friends, this afternoon, and this evening, that the word of the Lord may be divinely victorious. I stand back that God may work, and then come forward that God may work through me, and to Him be praise forever. Amen.

A Missionary Service in Southern Africa.

DR. MOFFAT PREACHING AT MOSHEU.

In the year 1836 Dr. Moffat left his mission station at Kuruman and visited the towns on the Yellow and Kolong rivers. He then determined to proceed to the distant and isolated village of Mosheu. The chief, whose name was Mosheu, had visited Kuruman in 1834, and as he could understand the Sechuana language, the missionary availed himself of the opportunity to speak of the "one thing needful." He appeared to listen to what was said to him on Divine subjects, but without any particular attention. He asked nothing, and remarked on leaving, holding Mr. Moffat's hand in his own, "I came to see you; my visit has given me pleasure; and now I return home."

After some time Mosheu repeated his visit to Kuruman, bringing with him a very large retinue. He desired to enter the kingdom of God. "When first I visited you," he said to Mr. Moffat, "I had only one heart, but now I've come with two. I cannot rest; my eyes will not slumber, because of the greatness of the things you told me on my first visit." Before he left the missionary settlement, he entreated Mr. Moffat to visit his village as soon as possible.

After passing through a rough and bushy country, Mr. Moffat at length entered the village of Mosheu, and received a hearty welcome. It was nearly midnight before the people would disperse, and their departure was a great relief to the missionary. On awaking from a short sleep early in the morning Mr. Moffat was astonished to find a large congregation waiting before his wagon, to whom he preached from John 3 : 16 for more than an hour. The scene depicted above was in the centre of the village, composed of Bechuana and Coranna houses and cattle-folds. At a distance a party were approaching, riding on oxen. A few strangers drew near with their spears and shields, who instantly laid them down on being requested to do so. The native dogs could not understand the strange-looking being on the front of the wagon, holding forth to a gazing throng, and they would occasionally break the silence with their bark. After remaining for a few days among them, Mr. Moffat left, feeling assured that God would pour out upon the place a blessing. Mosheu is now one of the most flourishing missionary centres in that remote part of Southern Africa.

JUMBO.

At one of the meetings I noticed a young lad of fifteen seated with the rest, looking anxious, very timid, and very poor, and not long afterward I got from him his story, which ran as follows:

"My mother's dead; father and the two little 'uns are in the 'house.' I've a sister wot's in service over the water, and a big brother; but he's ill now, so I hearn, and he's out of work."

"Where does your brother live?" "I don't know; I've not seen him for a long time."

"Did your father use to drink?" "Yes, that's why he's in that there place now. He used to come home and knock mother about, so as she left home for weeks, afeard to come home; but she's dead now."

"How do you get your living?" "Wal, I used to sleep out o' nights, like 'Ginger' and them two," pointing to two lads. "For three years I did that, but I'as 'ad enough of it; and one day, as I were in the lodgin' house, guv'nor comes up to me, and he says, if I helped him to wash up the dishes and clean up the place he would let me sleep there for nothink, and give me money for my grub; and I stayed there ever since. I 'as 'ad enough o' sleeping out in them vans."

Soon after this conversation I went up to the lodging-house he referred to, where I found that he had told me the truth, and I was told that he was a very good lad. But it was not long after this when at one of the meetings I found "Jumbo" look very low-spirited. Presently I heard him saying to one of the lads, "I ain't a-goin' to lodgin'-'ouse to-night; I'm goin' to sleep out to-night." "What are you saying?" I asked. "Wal, mum," he said, in rather subdued tones, "Guv'nor knocked me about this morning, and I ain't a-goin' back to him no more." "Tell me all about it,' I said. "Wal, I sleeps over-late this mornin', and guv'nor comes upstairs with a strap, and pulls me out o' bed, and begins leatherin' me about; so I ain't goin' back to him no more," with a determined toss of the head. He never did go back again, except as a visitor when possessed of 4d., and has now to walk the streets or take refuge in some corner of a stable or van, like the others, when he has not saved enough during the day to pay for his bed.

is seventeen years of age. Of him, one of his companions said to me two years ago, and in desperate earnestness, "Satan is in him, mum; if we could only get 'Parrot' away from here, we might get on then, but it's useless trying to be good while he is round here." I am glad to say, however, that, bad as "Parrot" used to be, he is now much altered for the better, although I must admit that his character still affords room for further improvement. Poor "Parrot" is much to be pitied. He has no father, and in speaking to him about his mother one evening, I was greatly struck with the disrespectful tone of voice he used. "Kindness, indeed! She don't care about me, she don't," in a despairing tone. "She turned me out the other night, 'cause I was late, and I had to join them two in the vans;" this with a sneer and an expression of utter disgust, not only with his mother's conduct, but with the world in general.

"Parrot" has been one of the most regular attendants at the little room, and many a time in leaving he has said half-jokingly to me, "Won't you let us stay and watch that there lump o' coal out? We will be good, and them boys wot's gone won't know." And I knew it did them more good to "watch that lump o' coal go out" than to loiter outside exposed to dangerous temptations. Permission therefore has been often given to a few to remain behind after the meeting has dispersed. Then they would sit round the fire, I taking up needle and cotton and trying not to listen to all that was being said between my young friends.

"Now, then," says "Croppy," "let's have hymn 45." "No," says "Jumbo," "106." "No, let's sing 114, that' a fine 'un." "'Blessed Jesus,' that's my favorite; that's best, isn't it, Missus H—?" appealing to me; and so they would go on through nearly half of the well-known Sacred Songs and Solos. At another time it would be a talk about what happened during the day, or about "that bloke wot stabbed another in the back."

"Was it up in your yard, Croppy?" "Yes," o' course it was." "An' did yer know him?" "Ay, and a rare bad 'un he is too, although he is stabbed in the back."

Or it might be about "Old Copper." "Just as I wur a-comin' round the corner, he comes up to me, and slap he goes (at the same time imitating it) in my face, till I goes spinnin' on the other side." "What were you doing, Jerry, that the policeman should do that to you?" "Nothin', Missus H—, they allers boxes us if we stand still; we 'as to move on." "But surely you must have been doing something very wrong before the policeman would have beaten you like that?" "No mum! no!" from all, "Copper allers does that!" "Why, t'other night," said Bill, "me and Jack was rather late a-goin' home, and he says to me somethink, and just then old 'Copper' comes up and fetched me such a clout on my 'ead, and says, 'Take that! wot are you a-doin' of here.' We says, 'Nothink,' and he says, 'You be off, or—'"

The other evening, finding one of the most hopeful of my lads looking pale and ill, and with a very bad cough, I suggested to him to make haste home as soon as he could, and go to bed. The tears were in his eyes as he replied, "I have no place to go to, mum; they won't let me go home. I 'ad to sleep out in a cab last night, and I've caught this cold through it." "Was it the first time you slept out?" "Oh, no!" Jim answered, "for I've often found him a-bed in the stables." "But why do you sleep out?" "Why, mum, 'cause father won't let me go home 'cos I'se got no work."

Another lad of seventeen told me the same story about himself. "Father won't let me go home until I find work." "But do you try to get work?" "Yes, Missus H—, but it's no use on me goin' home, father'll only nag and knock me about." This lad's mother came to me the other day, with tears in her eyes, to thank me for my kindness to her son. She herself would gladly have her son home, even when he had no work. "But his father," she said, "has such a bad stubborn temper, and he is very angry with me for taking his part." "But has he considered that he forces his son down to the level of the beasts of the field? Does he know that he has to sleep with horses? or may have to walk the streets all night and be tempted to steal?" She burst into a flood of tears. "Oh!" she said, "my poor, poor boy!"

The other lad, who was still crying, said, "We 'as all to fly when father comes home, he is always a naggin' and leatherin' us about, and my sister can't sleep at home when she 'as no work in the factory." "I suppose your father gets drunk?" "I 'spects he does." "Well, don't cry, my poor lad, God will take care of you if you will only ask Him."

THE TOWN HALL OF LIVERPOOL,
Which the Skirmishers Attempted to Destroy.

IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 16th, on the page devoted to Foreign Topics, we described the attempt made on June 10th by the "skirmishers" to blow up the Town Hall of Liverpool. The above illustration is a picture of the building. It stands nearly on the site of the old Market-cross, memorable as having been the scene of the closing struggle of the first siege of this town in the civil war of the Parliament in 1648. Hard by stood the original Town Hall, called in the charters Domus beatæ Mariæ. In later times the original dedication seems to have been preserved, the building having been called variously Ladie Halle, Ladie Marie Halle, Ladie Mercer's Halle, Court House, and, in legal documents, Auli Consilii or Prætorium.

In the days of Queen Elizabeth it became the Comyn Hall, and as such it seems to have been used for a variety of purposes. There is some doubt as to what its real appearance was, but it was presumably thatched, since, in 1567, it was ordered for the first time to be covered with slates.

Such as it was the building lasted for another century, when it was replaced by what Blome calls "a famous town-house, placed on pillars and arches of hewen stone, and underneath is the publick exchange for merchants."

The present handsome and imposing building dates from 1749, but the interior, having been destroyed by fire, is the work of the early part of the present century only.

About four o'clock on the morning of Friday, June 10th, an attempt was made to blow up the west end of the hall by means of a bomb, which was placed against the door by two men who ran away across the Exchange pavement. They were observed by a policeman, who gave chase and captured one of them. The other jumped into the canal, but was afterward arrested. Both men had loaded revolvers, and are said to be Irishmen. Before giving chase to the men, the policeman took the bomb from the door of the Town Hall and threw it into the road, where it exploded with a loud report. The concussion broke a large number of windows both in the Town Hall and in some of the neighboring offices, but no further harm was done.

At the examination of the two men in court, evidence was given, proving that the explosive used was dynamite. It is also known that the men were connected with the band of Fenians known as the Skirmishers, whose avowed object is to inflict injury on public property in England in revenge for the English policy in Ireland. O'Donovan Rossa, of Brooklyn, N. Y., who is supposed to be chief of the band, stated that he did not know the men, but admitted some knowledge that the attempt and similar projects were contemplated.

DESTRUCTION OF THE BRITISH SHIP "DOTEREL."

ON Tuesday, May 3d, the Secretary to the Brit- Admiralty sent to the daily papers the following brief but significant telegram, received on the evening of that day from Monte Video: "Doterel blown up 26th April, Straits of Magellan, Sandy Point; cause unknown. Lieutenant Stokes stays at scene of disaster to ascertain cause with divers. Commander, paymaster, engineer Walker, carpenter, and seven seamen saved. Survivors returning home in mail steamer Britannia." Thus briefly was the terrible story told; 143 lives were lost.

A suspicion is prevalent that the explosion was caused by dynamite secretly conveyed on board the vessel by Irish skirmishers and placed in the hold. This suspicion is confirmed by admissions made by O'Donovan Rossa. It is also supported by the fact that the government had received an intimation that some such project was intended. A letter from the Pelican, at Panama, written a few days prior to the disaster to the Doterel, was received at Plymouth on May 6. It says:—

"We have got a kind of Fenian scare out here. It has come to the knowledge of the government that this kind of people are going to attempt to blow up the English men-of-war on this station, so we have orders to secure ourselves from being blown up by torpedoes during the night. Every night after dark we place a kind of protection over the side of the vessel, and the sentries on the upper deck have ball ammunition served out to them, so that if they should attempt any such thing they may expect a sharp reception. There is a vigilant look-out kept, and if a boat approaches and does not give a satisfactory account of herself they fire and send an armed boat after her."

In a telegram from St. Vincent, one of the survivors says that the first explosion was so slight that, although the ship seemed to lift a little, and then move astern, he thought it was a gun that had been fired, and laughed at the sudden terror of every one. Almost immediately afterward he saw a great tongue of flame leap up between funnel and foremast, and found himself in the water. The ship seemed to break in two, the fore part going down at once with a plunge, the after portion sinking more gradually. He was struck on the head with something as the mainmast fell across on to the port side and was entangled by the sail and carried down under water. He got free with great difficulty and was almost dead when he came to the surface. Fortunately some hammocks were floating near, and he clung to one until picked up.

The diving operations now in progress may reveal the cause of the disaster. Should it be found to have been the work of the Skirmishers it will embitter public opinion against them. It will show that, like the Nihilists, they do not care how many innocent lives they destroy in the prosecution of their dastardly schemes.

Meanwhile the Queen has manifested her sympathy with the friends and relatives of those who have thus lost their lives, by messages of condolence, which we may expect will be followed by more substantial evidence of sympathy, as Queen Victoria is one of the wealthiest women in Europe and can well afford to assist those who have been bereaved in her service.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Aleth's Inquiry—Hopes to Attend a Meeting—The Rector Reproved—A Visit to Sykes' Cottage—Sykes asks for Work.

"THERE is one thing I want to ask you," Aleth proceeded, while Etta listened. "Did papa send you something from me one day, in an envelope? He told me he would by the post."

The "something" Etta had avoided any mention of, in case the child should not have been let into the secret by her father. But now that she saw it was no secret, she was able to talk to her about it.

"Yes, darling!" she said, "that beautiful little envelope that came by the post will make all the men so warm and comfortable, and their new coffee-house so pretty and bright. You must come in and see it some day, and they will all give you a welcome!"

"How shall I know when they will all be there?" Aleth asked.

"If you come some evening, and tell me beforehand, I will tell Michael and the others; and then they will all be there."

Aleth clapped her hands.

"What fun it will be!" she said. "Would they like to have some of my pictures to put up on the walls?"

"We must ask papa about that, I think," said Etta. "But I daresay that if everybody gives us pictures or some texts the walls will soon look as gay as possible won't they?"

"How do you mean 'everybody?'" Aleth inquired.

"There will be you, and me, and my mother, and sisters, and Harold, and Mrs. Clemence, and a great many other people besides."

"And perhaps," said Aleth, "if they give us some pictures, they will come some day to see how the pictures look!"

"Perhaps they will," replied Etta.

And then the door opened, and in walked Mr. Habershon.

"I hear you are very busy," he said to Etta. "That will be a capital building, after all. I had no idea it was going to be anything so thorough. And positively ornamental too! Ha—ha—ha!" he laughed; "poor rickety old place it used to be!"

"Don't laugh at it, papa," said Aleth. "Do you know what they used to do in it? They used to pray."

"Well!" answered Mr. Habershon, talking rather to Etta than to Aleth, "it certainly was not much like a consecrated building!" and he smiled again.

"But I think that doesn't matter, papa! Because you know Jesus was in a manger, in a stable, and somebody said even the inns out in that country were 'tumbledown old places!'"

"Hush, my child! you don't know what you are talking about."

"No; then I won't say 'tumbledown,' if it's wrong, papa. But Jesus went into all kinds of places, boats and ships and cottages and houses and roads and markets and churches, and meeting-houses and everywhere. Didn't he, papa? You have often told me about it all. And I expect," she continued, "He's been pretty often in that old shed. Because old Bateman and Hutton are so fond of Jesus, and they ask Him to come there. Then He goes."

"Darling little heretic!" he said, fondly kissing her. "What would my lord the bishop say if he were listening to all this?"

"I know what he would say, papa!" promptly replied the child. "He would say, 'That's a good girl!'"

"Would he?" said the rector; "that is a marvellous assertion. How do you know he would say that?"

"Because he always says it when he takes me on his knee. And because he always asks me if I have been reading any more Bible stories; and if I say 'Yes!' he says, 'What were they?' and then when I tell him, he says, 'Good girl!' and gives me a kiss."

"The child always has the best of it," said her father sotto voce to Etta, as he turned from the bright eyes and golden hair, that exercised a daily fascination over him.

Then Etta bade "Good-bye" to the child, and followed the rector downstairs.

"What a dear child she is!" Etta remarked as they closed the door. "The people are all devoted to her."

"She is very fond of you!" said Mr. Habershon. "You have been very kind to her. Indeed, so much sympathy and friendship have been shown us during this illness, that it has made quite a fresh tie between myself and my parish. I could not have believed there was so much latent feeling behind many an ordinary exterior. But I hope we shall soon have her running about again now. The doctor speaks very confidently of her progress."

On her way home Etta called at Sykes's cottage. All smiles, the poor mother received her. She was wrapped in the soft, warm folds of the cross-over shawl that Etta had fashioned in double knitting yarn, both serviceable and bright; and right hospitably she welcomed her guest to the interior of her small abode.

The conversation naturally turned upon father Sykes, Tom, and Bill.

"I know 'twill be a good thing when that there new place is opened," said Mrs. Sykes. "Then, maybe, you'll ask 'em in pretty often, miss! There's my Bill, he's ever so much taken up about it. He says, 'Now, we shall see our young lady of an evening!' he says. I says; 'Don't be too sure of that,' I says; 'she's lots of 'em at home to look after,' I says."

"Oh no! I think they will quite spare me sometimes in the evening. I am sure they will. I am not busy then," she added, earnestly hoping her words would prove true, and feeling how utterly useless all this expenditure would be if she were not allowed to come down at that hour among the people.

In a few minutes Tom appeared on the scene. Work was over, and he looked hot and tired, not to say bashful and awkward in his manners. But he retired into an inner cupboard, from whence he reappeared with his face all rubbed up and redder than ever, and his hair wet but pushed off his brow; which symptoms proved that he had been having "somethink of a clean!" And he now felt more at ease in the presence of his mother's visitor.

"How are you getting on, Tom?" she asked.

"Pretty well! I thank yer," he replied.

"Or is it very well?" she inquired, smiling merrily. "You look all right, at any rate."

"Well!" confided Tom to his boots, looking persistently down at their toes; and then letting off a little more of his electricity, by scratching the top of his head, "Well! I'm afraid it's only very middlin'!"

"Middling! how is that?" Etta asked very gently, looking earnestly at him.

"Dear me!" ejaculated the mother, "there's that haporth of herrings I never got for your father's tea, and he'll be in d'rectly," and so saying she adroitly vanished, that the young lady might have a clear field for action.

Poor Tom did look a little more at his ease, when there was no longer the accustomed presence of one who only knew his faults too well.

"'Tain't much good a-tryin'!" he said first in a low voice, and then in a louder, as he scraped the hearth-dust backward and forward under his hob-nailed boot.

"No! it ain't, that's a fact!" said Tom, gaining courage as he proceeded. "'Tain't no use! I'm sure I though I'd almost a-given it over for a while (he meant drinking). And then what with one thing and another, I have had a drop more again now and then."

"But what's the 'one thing and another'?" Etta asked.

"Oh! when the work goes crooked; or the master gets out with ye; or if the others says, 'Come on, and 'ave 'alf a pint!' and all the rest of it. There's quite enough to make a chap drink, if he wants to, or if he don't want neither. It don't make much odds, seems to me! The drink's sure to go into you, somehow or other."

"O Tom!" said Etta, smiling; "you know your mouth is your own. You need not open it unless you like. The beer is everywhere. That is quite true; more's the pity! And the spirit shops are always facing you. That I know. But you need not drink it," she continued, looking into his face most earnestly.

"Well, I suppose there is something in that!" said Tom, kicking a cinder into the fire that was tumbling out of it. "I suppose my mouth is my own!" and he laughed.

"No, Tom! it isn't!" said Etta suddenly. "It is not your own!"

Tom turned round sharply, and looked inquiringly at his visitor. "What did she mean? that was an odd thing to say!" his look implied.

But now Etta had dragged a small Bible out of her pocket: and was opening it. As she turned over the leaves, she said:

"Listen, Tom! I was wrong when I told you just now that your mouth was your own; for here it says (Ps. 12):

"'The Lord shall cut off all flattering lips, and the tongue that speaketh proud things.

"'Who have said, With our tongue will we prevail; our lips are our own; who is lord over us.'

"You see God wasn't pleased with the people that said that. Because they had made a mistake."

Tom still looked rather surprised. And then Etta said:

"You see, Tom, we must neither let out nor let in things that harm us, for we are 'not our own.' We are 'bought with a price.' Jesus Christ, our dear, loving Saviour, shed His precious blood for us. That was the 'price' He paid. Nothing else could save us but this. It was paid down by Him. You must not let Satan have you, when Jesus wants so much to bless you now."

"Dear Tom!" she ended, seeing his eyes suffused with tears, "will you give your heart to this gracious, kind Saviour, who loves you so much? Will you? We will just ask Him to bless you!"

And without moving from her seat, she prayed, "O Lord! bless my friend, Tom Sykes! and do make him hate the drink and turn away from it altogether. And bless his companions too, and his father and brother, and his dear mother! Let them all serve Thee. May we all be friends of Jesus Christ's, and help one another to live nearer to Him!"

As she finished she put her hand on Tom's shoulder and said:

"I am sure, Tom, that you will be a great help to me with the new coffee-house when it is opened. You will often come in, won't you, and you will persuade the others to come too?"

"I'd like very well to do anything I could to help ye," said Tom. "You've been a good friend to us!"

The poor fellow's face was flushed and full of feeling, at the new and strong sensations of influence that had come over him. Though there was much, of course, in the fact that a young lady had been dealing with him, yet through that medium—the only one he would have allowed, as it happened—there had stolen over his heart a sweet breath of heavenly hope, a zephyr from the land from which he had been wandering very far. It bore a fragrance with it that had charmed him, and the impression was not to pass over. But there was still more than this! The power of God's Holy Spirit had been brought to bear directly upon his heart, through the Scripture read and prayer offered. And this power was omnipotent. It was Etta's increasing faith in this that made her feel glad and satisfied that she had been allowed this interview with poor Tom.

And yet, as she saw the others now return one by one into the cottage, she felt the overwhelming sense of Shenstone's need.

"What shall we do for them?" she still thought, as her ideas flowed on in an undercurrent beneath the friendly sentences that were already passing between herself and the father and younger son, who had just entered.

Bill's broad smile of wordless welcome was unmistakable, as much so as the father's homely suggestion, delivered with a sideways nod of the head :

" I hope I see you well, miss ! We shan't put ye about, if yer like to stop a bit."

From Sykes this meant quite as much as, and perhaps much more than, the grandest phrases from some of Etta's former fox-hunting or waltzing friends.

He merely meant that he was glad to find her there, and that he hoped she would not go away. However, the afternoon was going, gone ! the time was precious, and she had much to do ; so, after a very brief chat in her own simple, winning way, about matters likely to interest her host—his work, his son's health, and the herrings that were coming for his tea ! at which all laughed—she was preparing to leave, when the father Sykes stepped out after her.

Whispering mysteriously at the door, he said : " It's about that 'ere new coffee-house ! Do ye think there's a job of work anywhere along there that I could have, miss ? You see work's been dreadful slack lately, and I haven't got anything reg'lar now to do, only just a job here and there ! and there's the old wife,"—so saying, he nodded toward the door which she had just entered—" she's that anxious I should get on about that place. She's took a wonderful fancy to it, she has !"

" O Sykes !" said Etta, " you know why you have no work. It's just because you will go into these public-houses. Then that makes you tired. And then you get irregular and careless, and so it goes on. I know that you are such a strong man, and clever too, that it makes me quite sorry that you should have such troubles. It ought not to be so, you know."

A strong sob for a moment choked the tall man's voice, and then he replied :

" If only you'd been about these 'ere streets when I war a young 'un."

This he said almost violently, as he emphatically slapped the wall with his hand.

" 'Twould all have been different with me, and with a good many more too. Yes, I say it, and it's true !" he added. " There's our Bill. He won't go down nowheres near the publics, nor nothink of that. You might have twenty fiddles, I do believe, a-playin' for him, all of a row, and he wouldn't drink, no, not he !"

" Poor Bill," said Etta, " I am sorry he has lost his fiddles ; because he liked them so much. But he shall have plenty of music when I get you all into the new coffee-house.

" Then about this job ? Would you like to cart some gravel, if no one else has been engaged to do it ?"

"I'm your man !" said Sykes more blithely. " I could begin it a Monday."

THE CALL OF MOSES.

S. S. Lesson for July 17. Exod. 3 : 14. Golden Text, ver. 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

MOSES was forty years in Midian leading a life of retirement as Jethro's shepherd (Acts 7 : 30). While seeking pasturage for his flock, he " came to the mountain of God, even to Horeb. There the angel of the Lord " appeared to him in a flame of fire, out of the midst of a bush : and he looked, and behold the bush burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed." Every branch, spray, and leaf was livid with burning fire, but nothing fell into ashes. God is the living, life-giving God, a consuming fire (Heb. 12 : 29), but not the author of death. He purifies the work of His hands, but does not destroy it ; that which is of earth and flesh must die, but that which is divine, the " gold, silver, precious stones" (1 Cor. 3 : 12), stands the test, and passes through the Refiner's fire.

Probably the burden of his people's wrongs lay heavy on Moses' heart, and yet it seemed as though God had heard not ; year after year went by, and still the heirs of promise were slaves in Egypt, and he who believed he was to deliver them remained in his occupation of shepherd. Without realizing perhaps that the vision he saw was the first instalment of God's answer to his prayers, Moses said, " I will now turn aside, and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt." Moses knew that nothing could happen without the will of God, or independently of His power, and thus he would not look upon the burning bush as a mere meaningless sight. Although a scientific man, there was probably more than the curiosity of science in the attention which he gave to it. It was an attention which pleased God, " And when the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him out of the midst of the bush." Thus we may learn that God does not force Himself upon the attention of His children, it is man's place to be on the lookout for God, to hold himself ready at all times to hear His voice and to be at His disposal.

The Lord called him by name " out of the midst of the bush, and said, Moses, Moses ?" and instantaneously Moses answered Him, " Here am I." God's first words to him were such as should make him understand the holiness of Him with whom he had to do. " Draw not nigh hither : put off thy shoes from off thy feet ; for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground ;" ground made holy by the presence of God. It is a first necessity if we would have much to do with God, and especially if we have to do with God for others, that we should be penetrated with the consciousness of His greatness and His holiness. It is blessed to know His love ; but love which has no power to deliver is a poor succor to lost, undone, bound man. It was like God that after He had manifested His power, He should hasten to manifest His love and mercy. No sooner did He remind Moses of the holy ground on which he stood than he reassured His servant and said, " I am the God of thy father." He came down to His child, " the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob," the Holy One, called Himself after the names of His servants. But the lesson of God's holiness penetrated deeply into the heart of Moses ; he " hid his face ; for he was afraid to look upon God."

God, however, was looking upon him, right down into his burdened heart, on which the burden of his God and of God's people lay ; and He touched a spring of sympathy when He said, " I have surely seen the affliction of My people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their taskmasters ; for I know their sorrows ; and I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land into a good land and a large, unto a land flowing with milk and honey." Not one groan, not one cry, not one tear of the children of Israel had been lost, not one passed unnoticed ; " in all their afflictions He was afflicted" (Isa. 63 : 9) ; He was only watching for the moment in which to deliver them without injuring them, and for an instrument who should be fitted for the work.

He said, I have seen their affliction, . . . I know their sorrows. . . . I am come down to deliver them, . . . the cry of the children of Israel is come unto Me. . . . I have also seen the oppression wherewith the Egyptians oppress them, . . . Come now therefore I will send thee unto Pharaoh, that thou mayest bring forth My people, the children of Israel, out of Egypt." Did not God take upon Himself the whole responsibility, was not He equal to the task ? How then did Moses say unto God, " Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt ?" What did it matter who was Moses, or what was Moses ? The mightiest man without God is nothing ; the weakest man with God can do everything which God will. Truly Moses had learned his lesson in the desert. In his early self-confidence he had thought that his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them, and he was quite prepared to go forward without God. Now he had learned so much of his own nothingness that even when God called him he was unwilling to go. There was self-consciousness in both instances. In every service to which God calls us, our place is that of simple yielding ; not saying, Who am I ? but, Who is He that calls and empowers me to this service ?

God answered him, "Certainly I will be with thee; and this shall be a token unto thee, that I have sent thee : When thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain." When all might is united with utter weakness, who would consider the weakness ? who would think it worth mentioning ? " Certainly I will be with thee"—this should have been enough for Moses, this should be enough for us. Truly when we are uncertain whether God is with us, we may well tremble before every difficulty, for everything is impossible to poor, helpless man ; in himself he has no power to do good or to resist evil, but once assured that God is with us, then nothing can be impossible to us, because nothing is impossible to Him.

But the evil heart of unbelief clings with terrible tenacity to present and past experiences, and thus we find that Moses, instead of simply taking God at His word, commenced to argue with Him and to raise difficulties. He sought to know by what name he should speak to the children of Israel of the God of their fathers who sent him unto them " And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM ; and He said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you." " I AM," this is God's name and His character, ever present, ever near, ever powerful. To the poor oppressed children of Israel He was not I Was, not I Will Be, but I AM, Jehovah, the self-existing, ever-existing God. " And God said moreover unto Moses, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you : this is My name forever, and this is My memorial unto all generations." Not only God, but the God of your fathers ; not only the mighty I AM, but your God. O blessed are the people which have the Lord for their God (Ps. 144 : 15, P. B. V.). It was a blessed assurance which God gave to the people that the name which He had declared to them should be forever His name, that His relation to them should never cease.

Then God commanded Moses to go and gather the elders of Israel together, and tell them the glad, precious news of God's tender sympathy with their present afflictions and of His coming deliverance, and he was charged to say to them from God, " I have surely visited you." God be praised His thoughts are accomplished facts, so sure are they to be fulfilled. Therefore let us not fear when our experience does not seem to tally with the written Word of God, even after we have committed our cause to Him, for He cannot be unfaithful, and that which is given over to Him is already in hand to be accomplished. God told Moses beforehand what would be the result of his mission, i.e., that the children of Israel would hearken to him, but that Pharaoh would refuse their petition that they might go three days' journey in the wilderness to worship God. God does not always acquaint His instruments beforehand with the result of their mission, but in tenderness to the faint heart of Moses, He opened to him the future. We see in all this how the Lord prepares His workers for their time of service, and uses none which are untried.

Queenly Munificence.—After a meeting on behalf of the Church Missionary Society, in London, one of the poorest widows in the town brought a sovereign ($5) to the minister as her offering. He knew her deep poverty, and declined to receive it, saying that she must not think of giving so much, for he was sure she could not afford it. On hearing this she appeared disappointed and distressed, and urged him to accept it. " Oh, sir," she said, " I have often given copper to the Lord, two or three times I have had the pleasure of giving silver ; but it has been my earnest desire to have the great happiness of giving gold once before I die. I have long been engaged in saving every little mite that I could spare, that I might give this sovereign to-night. You must take it for the missions." The minister could no longer refuse the gift. It was added to the collection—the precious offering of a loving heart.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Most Prominent Topic in the European intelligence is the condemnation of Midhat Pasha to death for complicity in the murder of Abdul Aziz, Sultan of Turkey, in 1875. Two other Pashas and six court officers have also been sentenced to execution, and two other Pashas to ten years' penal servitude. The trial was conducted on principles grossly unfair to the accused, who were not even permitted to cross-examine the witnesses. They were informed that if after the trial it was discovered that perjury had been committed, the wrong-doers would be punished. All the condemned men have appealed against the sentence, and will be granted a hearing, but it is believed that eventually they will be executed.

The present Sultan was, it is stated, prompted to commence the investigation by the belief that the accused persons were plotting against himself, and adopted this means to get them out of the way. Midhat Pasha has always had the reputation of being a vigorous reformer, and the most advanced of Turkish governors; he has held several important offices, and the Western Powers have trusted him more implicitly than any other Turk. He was known to sympathize with the movement that issued in the deposition of Sultan Abdul Aziz, but until recently the death of that prince was supposed to have been that of a suicide. So the physicians attached to the foreign embassies pronounced it, and a large number of t e people in Constantinople still believe that was the true version, and that the recent trial is the result of a plot to destroy the prisoners.

An Affray Between the Soldiery and the tenant farmers occurred at Mitchelstown, County Cork, Ireland, on June 30th. The soldiers were employed protecting process-servers on the estate of a landowner who in 1873 advanced all the rents one hundred per cent. Twenty tenants were to be evicted, but at the last moment, through the mediation of a Roman Catholic priest, the arrears of rent were paid. The landowners at once gave orders to stop the expedition. By this time, however, the soldiers had reached the outskirts of the town, and the mob had thrown barricades across the streets. The soldiers and police charged right through into the square. The people hurled stones and fought with sticks, and but for the interference of the priest, who kept back armed tenants from the Ahalisk and Gurhane estates, there would have been a bloody affray. As it was, forty-two people and a number of police were injured. Reports from other districts represent the people as sullenly quiet. They are terrorized by the arrests of the Land Leaguers and the proclamations under the Coercion Act. There is no better feeling toward the Government, but on the contrary the hostility seems the more uncompromising on account of the fear which suppresses its outward manifestation. The prospects of a good harvest are reported as "promising." The population of Ireland has decreased from 8,175,000 in 1841, to 5,160,000 in 1881.

The Fren ch Government are Stated to Have organized an expedition to extend their African conquests. The same plea of keeping in order frontier tribes, by which the movement on Tunis was defended, is raised on behalf of the new movement, which is directed against Tripoli. Cable dispatches from Paris report that a French frigate is transporting Tunisian troops from Gabes to Zarziss for the purpose of restoring order among the tribes and watching the Tripoli frontier. Four regiments of troops are under orders to start for Tripoli. A quantity of war material is being sent to arm fully the native police. Both Italy and Turkey are stated to be deeply moved by the French policy of aggression, and a warlike feeling in both countries is manifested by the Governments and the people.

A Railroad Horror is Reported from Mexico. The disaster occurred at eleven o'clock on the night of Friday, June 24th, at a wooden bridge over the river San Antonio, near the village of Malpais. From the telegraphic report of the disaster it appears that for some time past this section of the country has been swept by fierce storms, swelling the creeks into torrents and laying waste many fertile fields. The bridge spanning the river at the point mentioned, although known to be unsafe, was still in use, when a train, bearing a battalion of soldiers, attempted its passage. The result was a crash as the undermined support gave way, and the engine and cars were hurled headlong down the chasm. For a moment after the plunge of the cars from the bridge all was darkness. Suddenly one hundred barrels of brandy, loaded on two of the vans, caught fire, and the burning fluid inundated the mass of passengers struggling in the ruins. Only a few, who were not disabled or hopelessly wedged in the timbers, escaped. The dead and living were wrapped in a sheet of flame, and slowly burned before the eyes of the survivors, who were unable to save them. The latest accounts of the disaster report that 17 officers and 197 privates were killed. This list does not include the railroad officials and employés, or the women and children of the soldiers, many of whom were on the train. Only sixty persons in all were saved alive, and of those forty are more or less injured.

Herr Most, he Editor of the Nihilist Journal, called the Freiheit, who was charged by the British Government with inciting to murder, has been sentenced to sixteen months' imprisonment, with hard labor. Lord Coleridge, the judge who passed sentence upon him, said the prisoner's offence was detestable and cowardly, and but for the jury's recommendation to mercy he would have inflicted a sentence of penal servitude. Herr Most, on leaving the prisoner's dock, exclaimed, "We might as well be in Russia." Herr Most published, in the first issue of his paper after the Czar of Russia was assassinated, an article approving that deplorable crime.

English Society Has Been Startled by a Horrible railroad murder, perpetrated on Monday, June 27th. The victim was an elderly gentleman who had been to London to collect some dividends and was returning to his home in Brighton. His assassin shot and stabbed him while the train was passing through a tunnel, and then threw his dead body out of the window of the car on to the track. The compartment bore evidence of the violence of the struggle that had taken place. The cushions of the seats were cut, and bullets were imbedded in the wood-work. When the train stopped, a man was found in the compartment bleeding from the head, but the police were satisfied with the explanation he gave of his injuries, and allowed him to go to his home. Afterward, when suspicion was excited against him and a warrant issued for his apprehension, he had made good his escape.

This crime has directed attention anew in England to the advantages of American railroad cars, in which such a crime could not have been committed. The compartments of English cars are small, generally accommodating only eight persons, and the conductors usually lock the doors, and only visit the passengers at long intervals.

Russian Nihilism Continues a Source of anxiety to the authorities. Many arrests have lately been made in connection with suspected plots. The commander, officers, and crew of the guard-ship lying off Peterhof, where the Imperial family have taken up their residence, have been changed in consequence of the discovery of a number of revolutionary proclamations on board the vessel. The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Paris Intransigeant states that the police have discovered, at the lodgings of a suspected person recently arrested, a map of St. Petersburg, specially prepared in view of a general rising in the city. None of the many bridges which span the Neva were indicated on the plan, and the conclusion was arrived at that it was intended to blow them all up, in order to render a combination of the military forces impossible. Search was made by divers, and mines were found in the supports of several bridges. It is reported that the explosives were taken from the State arsenals.

The Order Issued by the Roman Catholic Viceroy of India prohibiting street preaching in Calcutta is thus referred to in a letter dated May 9, by the Rev. J. A. D. J. Macdonald, a missionary on the spot. "To-day I have been in the police-court. Nearly all the missionaries of Calcutta were present. Five missionaries have been arrested for preaching in the squares, and the case was adjourned until Saturday next, on the promise that there should be no preaching in the squares in the meantime. One of the five made a decided stand, promising not to preach in the squares if allowed to preach outside, and ultimately this was allowed. The Chief Commissioner of the Police is a Roman Catholic, and he has clearly gone beyond the mark in prohibiting, without any proper notice or consultation, all preaching in Calcutta. I have no doubt but that the case will ultimately be decided in our favor, but there is a very strong element of officialdum to battle with here. In the north end of the town they have not stopped me preaching, although they took our names the other night. So I continue to speak as before."

A Band of Brigands near Salonica have been exterminated by Turkish troops. Mr. Suter, who has just obtained his release from captivity among them, has given a vivid account of his detention. A more wicked and inhuman life it is hardly possible to conceive than that led by these men. Some time ago they captured two young ladies aged respectively nineteen and seventeen. The brigands demanded a ransom from their friends. The parents of the elder girl were wealthy and promptly paid the ransom; but the friends of the younger girl were unable to pay the money, and the brigands brutally killed her and severing the body into seven pieces sent them to the bereaved family. A striking lesson of the narrative is that the robbers hoped to atone for their crimes by religious punctiliousness. They were strict in their religious observances. They fasted the whole of Lent, and celebrated Easter day with great solemnity. They burned incense, chanted an Easter hymn, and always crossed themselves before and after meals.

The Small-pox Epidemic Continues to an alarming degree in London and its suburbs, nearly four thousand people being ill with it. Medical men are earnestly recommending every one to be re-vaccinated as a preventive. A "small-pox" scare has found its way to Scotland, several German emigrants having been attacked in Glasgow. Thousands of emigrants have been landed this year at Leith from Hamburg; and as they are allowed to troop ashore without any inspection, the Edinburgh public are naturally alarmed. They pay $25 for their passage from Germany to the United States, by way of Glasgow. They are well fed, and ready to put up with any inconvenience save sea-sickness. Many of the emigrants never saw the sea till they left Hamburg; and it often happens that when they sight the land at Berwick or Dunbar, they throw their tin utensils overboard, in the belief that they have reached America.

The Work of the British Census Commissioners is rapidly approaching completion. The entire population of the kingdom will be shown to be above 35,000,000. The increase in a decade is a little over 4,000,000.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London) for June may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Price six cents.

THE large standing armies maintained by European nations are in many cases composed of the vilest and most abandoned part of the population. Military discipline is to some extent successful in controlling the more dangerous propensities of the men, but only the Grace of God can really change their hearts and make them new men in Jesus. Many Christian workers have been led by God to give their lives to the work of evangelization in the English army, and of these Mrs. Daniell was one of those most signally blessed.

DESCRIPTION OF ALDERSHOT.

Twenty-five years ago Aldershot, now the great military centre of Great Britain, where thousands of soldiers live in barracks, was a small, obscure country village, numbering scarcely six hundred inhabitants, a mere handful of thatched cottages clustered to right and left of the picturesque old parish church and parsonage. The surrounding landscape is most lovely, broken with ridges of low hills, dense plantations of fir-trees, and wide stretches of open moorland, fragrant in their season with gorse and heather. On the further side of the town stretches the "Long Valley," a place of wild desolation, though with a beauty all its own of form and color, and celebrated now in the annals of Aldershot as the scene of many a dusty battle and bloodless victory. In 1854 came the Crimean War, quickly followed by the horrors of the Indian Mutiny, and during this period a large tract of land about a mile from the village was purchased by government for the purpose of forming a permanent camp of instruction.

Acres of gorse and heather were soon burnt down, fir-woods cleared away, and upon the open space rose street after street of the dreary black huts which form "the camp." Below the hill on which the camp stands, were erected huge blocks of the "permanent barracks" for cavalry, artillery, and infantry. Close up to these, with nothing but a roadway between, is the town itself, a mass of irregularly built houses, dotted down without any apparent idea of order or plan, but approaching as near as possible to the government ground. By degrees this town has extended itself all the way back to the village again. In a few years the population increased from 600 to 7000, and the camp numbered from 12,000 to 18,000 soldiers.

This, then, is the place to which Mrs. Daniell went in 1862, and here her mission-work for soldiers began. She had already become well known by reason of the establishment of missions to the poor and the erection and support of mission halls in various parts of Great Britain for the benefit of the most ignorant, neglected, and depraved classes of the people. In this preparatory manner God led Mrs. Daniell to Aldershot; and it was also through the establishment of the village missions that she was brought into contact with the Country Towns Mission Society, through which she always engaged her agents; and it was the gentleman then acting as secretary of that society who first pressed Aldershot upon her notice, and entreated her to take it up and work it in the same way as her existing mission stations.

Having entreated help and guidance of the Lord, and consulted with judicious friends, Mrs. Daniell was led to see that she must undertake this special

WORK AMONG THE SOLDIERS.

She therefore availed herself of the annual Barnet Conference of 1862 to write a letter to the late Rev. Mr. Pennefather, which should be read to Christian friends at the conference. The communication was read, and made the subject of special prayer. Many friends at once came forward with generous aid, and expressed their gladness at the prospect of such a mission being commenced. An open door was now set before her which no man could shut, and Mrs. Daniell was fairly committed to the important enterprise of working among the soldiers at Aldershot.

At first she knew no one in the neighborhood, and was quite in the dark with whom to communicate respecting her design, when she received a letter from a lady in Scotland, saying, "I am sure you will be delighted to know that Dr. — (a friend of hers) is at Aldershot." Here again was the open door. She immediately wrote to the good doctor telling him of her wish, and he cordially replied, "Come at once."

Accordingly the next day Mrs. Daniell started, and was met by the doctor in a carriage. They drove straight to the camp, and while on the way thither she was told that the chaplain had invited her to tea, and after that to a soldiers' prayer-meeting. The soldiers had heard a rumor of the intention of a lady to endeavor to do something for them, and at their prayer-meeting they asked the Lord to bless her efforts. At the close of the meeting Mrs. Daniell was desired by the officers to tell the men her object.

Having addressed them in a kindly manner, the soldiers gathered round her, and said how thankfully they would help in every way they could. One of the Scripture readers also begged her to take his Bible-class on Sunday, which she at once consented to do, and at the meeting a poor backslider was restored through her instrumentality. A gentleman having given a splendid plot of land for the erection of a hall, a house was taken and fitted up, in October, for the purposes of the mission, and also a daily reading-room, in which to hold meetings of various kinds. Sunday evening services were commenced to crowded congregations, and much blessing followed.

A PUBLIC HOUSE WITHOUT RUM.

That was the problem now to be solved—a place which would attract both soldier and civilian from the low and debasing pleasures of Satan's votaries offered for them on all sides. Mrs. Daniell's desire was to erect a Mission Hall, with lecture-room, reading-room, coffee-room, and bath-rooms, with residence for the missionary staff. Her idea as a whole was carried out, and on February 11, 1863, the foundation stone of the new building was laid by the

EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

A hymn having been sung, accompanied by one of the regimental bands, Lord Shaftesbury stated the object of the institution—"Social recreation, religious instruction, and for communicating to every individual Christian knowledge. To give to every man the opportunity, as far as can be given him, of seeking social and religious intercourse, and of receiving and imparting instruction."

Lord Shaftesbury also powerfully repelled the objection that soldiers were a hopeless class, and that to attempt to Christianize them was merely the dream of pious enthusiasm. He appealed to the lives of Christian soldiers, whose names shine so brightly in the pages of history, and to examples of true piety in the British army. In the afternoon of the same day a prayer-meeting was held, and in the evening there was a public meeting, which many of the soldiers attended, and at which the Word of God was blessed to at least one soul, who was then added as a spiritual stone to the heavenly temple.

Only a few weeks before, Mrs. Daniell had received a letter from Mr. Pennefather, written by an Irish lady, asking him if he could interest any Christians at Aldershot in her son. He was going to join a cavalry regiment stationed there, and she was intensely anxious that he should be led to Christ. Mrs. Daniell at once sought out the young man, but, as she was just about going away for a time, opportunity for intercourse was very limited. After a very earnest talk, she said, "I do beg you in the midst of all the temptation by which you will be surrounded, never to forget and that you will have to stand before it."

They parted; but these few words, "the Great White Throne," remained fixed in his memory, and that few moments' conversation proved the turning point in his life; and at the evening meeting on the day the foundation stone was laid, he entered into peace, and learned that for the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ there was for him "no condemnation," and nothing to fear from coming judgment.

The new buildings were completed and opened in August, 1863, but the inauguration services were not held until Sunday, October 11th. The first address was given by Mr. Pennefather. The second address was given by Robert Baxter, Esq., the father of the Rev. M. Baxter, who from the first had been the most faithful friend and supporter of the mission in all its branches.

THE SOLDIERS' HALL,

a picture of which appears on our front page, stands on high ground near the Cavalry Barracks. It is in the Elizabethan style of architecture; a pretty, low-gabled building, surmounted by sloping roofs of red and black tiles, and covered with Virginia and other creepers. Over the porch is the inscription, "Our God, we thank Thee, for all things come of Thee, and of Thine own have we given Thee" (1 Chr. 29: 13, 14). Passing through the porch the large hall is seen straight in front. It is of beautiful proportions, comfortably fitted up with chairs, and the walls adorned with texts. From the open roof hang several flags, giving color and brightness to the room. To the left of the entrance is the refreshment bar, recreation, and dining rooms. To the right are the library and reading-room. Over the reading-room is the drawing-room—"the officers' room," as it was called at first, before the exigencies of the work demanded Mrs. Daniell's continual presence. The need for this room sprang out of the Bible-readings she began on her first visit to Aldershot, when, after mess of an evening, several officers would seek her lodgings to talk over the work. Such gatherings were almost always ended by Mrs. Daniell saying, "Shall we not have a little Bible-reading and prayer before we separate?" Other rooms for small gatherings were added in 1868.

A HIGHLANDER'S CONVERSION.

One evening, in the spring of 1864, Miss Daniell was standing outside the drawing-room watching the men as they filed out after their nightly Bible-class. During Mrs. Daniell's address her daughter had noticed a Highlander evidently under deep impressions. He was a steady, grave-looking man, an old soldier, with a thoughtful Scotch face, and as he passed her Miss Daniell asked him, "Are you happy?" "Oh, no, far from that," was his reply. And he then related how he had long been seeking and never could find peace, and how restless and unsatisfied he was. He was invited to come again the next night, and Mrs. Daniell would speak to him. The next evening but one he had an interview with her, with results of the most gratifying character. We give part of his story as contained in a letter to Mrs. Daniell some time afterward:

"YOU PRAYED FOR ME

that my heart might be opened to believe, and my eyes open to see all that had already been done for my salvation. I felt the same as a condemned criminal, and so I was until I believed. You read to me St. John 5: 24, 'He that believeth in Me hath everlasting life.' While you were explaining these words to me I was in an awful state of mind. I thought everything had been done that could be done now, and there was no hope. I spoke to you about my wicked heart. You told me I had nothing to do with that—that it would always be a wicked one. But, blessed be God that sent me to Aldershot, and for sending me to meet you there; and forever blessed be His holy name for sending Christ His Son to die for my sin, the happiest days that ever I spent were in Aldershot after my conversion." And so to the grave, thoughtful Scotchman, who, as multitudes before him, had gone heavily for so long because of the crushing burden of sin, "the grace of God which bringeth salvation appeared," and he was "translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son."

(The interview with Miss Daniell after the Bible-class is depicted in the left-hand corner of the upper portion of our frontispiece.)

The greatest interest in Mrs. Daniell's work was awakened in all parts of Great Britain. Much prayer had been offered at the Barnet Conference –nor at the Conference alone. All through the country the prayers of the Lord's remembrancers were daily ascending. The mission was literally steeped in prayer. Led on step by step in paths of which she little dreamed, the Lord continually enlarged the field of Mrs. Daniell's activities and sympathies, ever fulfilling the word of promise on which He caused her to hope.

During several years of happy work which Mrs. Daniell and her daughter experienced together at Aldershot. the desire was constantly growing to have in other military stations. It was felt to be a matter of great regret that when the men went away from Aldershot to other depots there was no Home to receive them and no one to take an interest in their welfare. The Master, however, did not see fit to give to the elder lady, to whom He had granted the honor of founding the Soldiers' Mission, that desire of her heart. At all times very far from strong, and constantly subject to weeks of illness, the marvel is not that she did not accomplish more, but that God enabled her to accomplish so much. The Lord had, in His great goodness, given her the joy not only of planting the five Village Missions, and that at Aldershot, but also of seeing them grow and flourish in a very remarkable degree. Then, after nine years of work at the latter place, He called her from earth to heaven on September 16, 1871.

"Finished the toil, the rest begun;
The battle fought, the triumph won."

And so the extension of the scheme to other military depots, planned together by mother and daughter, had to be carried out by Miss Daniell alone.

CHATHAM

was the first garrison suggested. Several of the Christian men in the Engineers were constantly going and coming between that place and Aldershot; and many and earnest were the entreaties that a Home should be provided for them there as well. Immediately after her mother's death, in 1871, Miss Daniell at once endeavored to raise a Home at Chatham as a memorial to her. An appeal was issued, and a few hundred pounds collected; but as it was most difficult to meet with a suitable site, and the sum required for the building was large, there was some delay in the commencement of the work. In the interval Miss Daniell's thoughts were successively turned to

WEEDON, COLCHESTER, AND MANCHESTER.

In the first-named place, which is located in Leicestershire, a Home was commenced in the spring of 1873. In July of that year Miss Daniell assumed the oversight of the home at Colchester. Five years later, through a generous donation of £2700 by a Christian lady, a fellow-helper in the work, a new and greatly enlarged Home was secured in this old Roman town, and a large blessing has rested upon it from the very beginning. In the autumn of the same year, another Home, similar in all essential respects to its predecessors, was inaugurated at Manchester.

BRANCH HOMES AT PLYMOUTH AND CHATHAM.

Just after the homes had been established at Weedon, Colchester, Manchester, and Plymouth. Though a visit had been paid to Chatham in the early part of 1872, and negotiations entered into for the purchase of a suitable site for a Home, the necessary preliminaries, collecting funds, etc., absorbed considerable time. The commencement of the other branch homes, also further retarded this particular work, so that it was not till September, 1875, that the building was actually commenced, and the Home was not ready for opening till June, 1876. The first service was held on June 10, presided over by Robert Baxter, Esq., and ever since has been a scene of very special enjoyment and blessing. Thus through God's goodness the devoted daughter has been enabled to carry out, to a certain extent, her mother's wishes; and though there is still "much land to be possessed," and many garrisons are still unprovided with a home which consecrated Christian liberality should supply, yet Christians thank God for all that He has accomplished, and that since 1862 He has raised up so many who have stretched out a helping hand to gallant soldiers in all parts of the kingdom.

It will be well to say something now of

through whose efforts, so ably seconded by her indefatigable daughter, such great blessing has been gained. It was in September, 1871, that after months of weariness and suffering it pleased God to call her to Himself. For nearly three years before her life had been most precarious, but till the previous May she had been able to superintend the work at Aldershot, and to the very last took the liveliest interest in everything connected with it. About ten days before her death a great sense of unworthiness seemed resting upon her.

"Ah, what has it all been?" she said. "I have only reached the scaffolding, they (referring to those converted in the Hall) will be all far above me. . . . I shall just get within the gates." To some dear friends who came to see her she spoke with the greatest interest of their work, giving them each a text, and speaking to them of her wishes for her own beloved mission. She said that her request from her dying bed was that the friends who had been interested in the work at Aldershot would continue their help and would never forsake it.

It was on Saturday evening, September 16th, that Mrs. Daniell entered the glory everlasting. The last words which she uttered, before unconsciousness came on, were the name of Jesus and the promise, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." She repeated "nor forsake thee" after her daughter, and then said, "I know —" but was too weak to finish the sentence. Miss Daniell said, "You know He never will, don't you?" She bowed her head in token of assent; and then the last exclamation was, "Let me go."

On the Monday preceding her death she said, "I'm going fast. It is sweet to lie in Jesus' arms." On being asked, "Isn't it sweet to be going home?" she answered, "Yes, lovely." Another time she repeated, "On this face is mortal pain, but glory in my soul;" and later still she joyfully exclaimed, looking heavenward, "I shall see His face; I shall see Him."

"Oh happy, happy bride!
Thy widowed hours are past!
The Bridegroom at thy side,
Thou all His own at last.
The sorrows of thy former cup
In full fruition swallowed up."

In response to the wish of several officers, her body was interred in the military cemetery at Aldershot, a quiet spot, where the sun touches it with his beams almost all day long, walled round by low hills, where, according to her own wish, those for whom she gave the last years of her life will be able to come and see her grave. It is a fit resting place for one whose life was lived so much in the light of eternity; fitting too that as a soldier's wife it should be among soldiers that the body waits for the voice of the archangel and the trump of God.

A PHYSICIAN'S TEMPERANCE STORY.

A Teetotaler is Induced to Take Stout as a Medicine—Falls into Drunken Habits—Abject Poverty—The Doctor Seeks Him Out—Means of His Reclamation.

AT a large and influential meeting held recently in the Lecture Hall, 337 Strand, London, Dr. Monroe, of Hull, made the following remarkable statement, which we give in his own words:

"I will relate a circumstance which occurred to me some years ago, the result of which made a deep impression upon my mind. I was not then a teetotaler—would that I had been!—but I conscientiously, though erroneously, believed in the health-restoring properties of stout. A hard-working, industrious, God-fearing man, a teetotaler of some years' standing, suffering from an abscess in his hand which had reduced him very much, applied to me for advice.

"I told him the only medicine he required was rest, and to remedy the waste going on in his system, and to repair the damage done to his hand he was to support himself with a bottle of stout daily. He replied, 'I cannot take it, for I have been some years a teetotaler.' 'Well,' I said, 'if you know better than the doctor, it is no use applying to me.' Believing, as I did then, that the drink would really be of service to him, I urged him to take the stout as a medicine, which would not interfere with his pledge. He looked anxiously in my face, evidently weighing the matter over in his mind, and sorrowfully replied, 'Doctor, I was a drunkard. I should not like to be one again.'

"He was, much against his will, prevailed upon to take the stout, and, in time, he recovered from his sickeness. When he got well, I, of course, praised up the virtues of stout as a means of saving his life, for which he ought ever to be thankful, and rather lectured him on his foolishness for being such a fanatic (that's the word) as to refuse taking a bottle of stout daily to restore him to his former health.

"I lost sight of my patient for some months; but I am sorry to say that, one fine summer's day, when driving through one of our public thoroughfares, I saw a poor, miserable, ragged-looking man leaning against the door of a common public-house, drunk, and incapable of keeping an erect position. Even in his poverty, drunkenness, and misery I discovered it was my teetotal patient, whom I had, not so long ago, persuaded to break his pledge. I could not be mistaken. I had reason to know him well, for he had been a member of the Methodist Church, an indefatigable Sunday-school teacher, a prayer-leader whose earnest appeals for the salvation of others I had often listened to with pleasure and edification.

"I immediately went to the man, and was astonished to find the change which drink, in so short a time, had worked in his appearance. With manifest surprise, and looking at the poor wretch, I said, 'S—!. Is this you?' With a staggering reel, and clipping his words, he answered, 'Yes, it's me. Look at me again. Don't you know me?' 'Yes, I know you,' I said, 'and am grieved to see you in this drunken condition. I thought you were a teetotaler?'

"With a peculiar grin upon his countenance, he answered, 'I was before I took your medicine.' 'I am sorry to see you disgracing yourself by such conduct. I am ashamed of you.' Rousing himself, as drunken people will at times, to extraordinary effort, he replied, 'Didn't you send me here for my medicine?' and with a delirious kind of chuckle he hiccupped out words I can never forget: 'Doctor, your medicine cured my body, but it's damned my soul!'

"I did not sleep much that night. The drunken aspect of that man haunted me, and I found myself weeping over the injury I had done him. I rose up early the next morning, and went to his cottage, with its little garden in front, on the outskirts of the town, where I had often seen him with his wife and happy children playing about, but found, to my sorrow, that he had removed some time ago.

"At last, with some difficulty, I found him located in a couple of rooms in a low neighborhood, not far distant from the public-house he had patronized the day before. Here, in such a home as none but the drunkard could inhabit, I found him laid upon a bed of straw, feverish and prostrate from the previous day's debauch, abusing his wife because she could not get him some more drink—she standing aloof with tears in her eyes, broken down with care and grief, her children dirty and clothed in rags, all friendless, and steeped in poverty. What a wreck was there!

"Turned out of the church of which he was once an ornament, his religion sacrificed, his usefulness marred, his hopes of eternity blasted, now a poor, dejected slave to his passion for drink, without mercy and without hope.

"I talked to him kindly, reasoned with him, succored him till he was well, and never lost sight of him, or let him have any peace until he had signed the pledge again.

"It took him some time to recover his place in the church, but I have had the happiness of seeing him restored. He is now, more than ever, a devoted worker in the church; and the cause of temperance is pleaded on all occasions.

"Can you wonder, then, that I never order strong drink for a patient now?"

SPIDERS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

WE are all watching for phenomena. A sky full of stars, shining from year to year, calls out not so many remarks as the blazing of one meteor. A whole flock of robins take not so much of our attention as one blundering bat darting into the window on a summer eve. Things of ordinary sound and sight and occurrence fail to reach us, yet no grasshoppers ever spring up in our path, no moth ever dashes into the evening candle, no mote ever floats in the sunbeam that pours through the crack of the window-shutter, no barnacle on ship's hull, no burr on chestnut, no limpet clinging to a rock, no rind of an artichoke but would teach us a lesson if we were not so stupid.

God in His Bible sets forth for our consideration the lily, and the snowflake, and the locust, and the stork's nest, and the hind's foot, and the aurora borealis, and the ant-hills. One of the sacred writers, sitting amid the mountains, sees a hind skipping over the rocks. The hind has such a peculiarly-shaped foot that it can go over the steepest places without falling, and as the prophet looks upon that marking of the hind's foot upon the rocks, and thinks of the divine care over him, he says : "Thou makest my feet like hinds', that I may walk on high places." And another sacred writer sees the ostrich leave its egg in the sand of the desert, and, without any care of incubation, walk off ; and the Scripture says that is like some parents leaving their children without any wing of protection or care.

In my text inspiration opens before us the gate of a palace, and we are inducted amid the pomp of the throne and the courtier, and while we are looking around upon the magnificence, inspiration points us to a spider plying its shuttle and weaving its net on the wall. It does not call us to regard the grand surroundings of the palace, but to a solemn and earnest consideration of the fact that "the spider taketh hold with her hands and is in kings' palaces."

It is not very certain what was the particular species of insect spoken of in the text, but I shall proceed to learn from it :

I. First, the exquisiteness of the divine mechanism. The king's chamberlain comes into the palace and looks around, and sees the spider on the wall, and says "Away with that intruder," and the servant of Solomon's palace comes with his broom and dashes down the insect, saying, "What a loathsome thing it is." But under microscopic inspection I find it more wondrous of construction than the embroideries on the palace wall, and the upholstery about the windows. All the machinery of the earth could not make anything so as the prehensile with which that spider clutches its prey, or as any of its eight eyes.

We do not have to go so far up to see the power of God in the tapestry hanging around the windows of heaven, or in the horses and chariots of fire with which the dying day departs, or to look at the mountain swinging out its sword arm from under the mantle of darkness until it can strike with its scimitar of the lightning. I love better to study God in the shape of a fly's wing, in the formation of a fish's scale, in the snowy whiteness of a pond-lily. I love to track His footsteps in the mountain mass, and to hear His voice in the hum of the rye-fields, and discover the rustle of His robe of light in the South wind.

Oh ! this wonder of divine power that can build a habitation for God in an apple-blossom, and tune a bee's voice until it is fit for the eternal orchestra, and can say to a firefly, "Let there be light," and from holding an ocean in the hollow of His hand, goes forth to find heights and depths and length and breadth of omnipotency in a dew-drop, and dismounts from a chariot of midnight hurricane to cross over on the suspension bridge of a spider's web.

You may take your telescope and sway it across the heavens in order to behold the glory of God ; but I shall take the leaf holding the spider and the spider's web, and I shall bring the microscope to my eye, and while I gaze, and look, and study, and am confounded, I will kneel down in the grass and cry : "Great and marvellous are Thy works, Lord God Almighty."

II. Second : Again, my text teaches me that

INSIGNIFICANCE IS NO EXCUSE FOR INACTION.

This spider that Solomon saw on the wall might have said, "I can't weave a web worthy of this great palace : what can I do amid all this gold and embroidery ? I am not able to make anything fit for as grand a place and so I will not work my spinning-jenny." Not so said the spider. "The spider taketh hold with her hands." Oh ! what a lesson that is for you and me !

You say if you had some great sermon to preach, if you only had a great audience to talk to, if you had a great army to marshal, if you only had a constitution to write, if there were some tremendous thing in the world for you to do, then you would show us. Yes, you would show us ! What if the Levite in the ancient temple had refused to snuff the candle because he could not be a high priest ? What if the humming-bird should refuse to sing its song into the ear of the honeysuckle, because it cannot, like the eagle, dash its wing into the sun ? What if the raindrop should refuse to descend because it is not a Niagara ? What if the spider of the text should refuse to move its shuttle because it cannot weave a Solomon's robe ?

Away with such folly ! If you are lazy with the one talent you would be lazy with the ten talents. If Milo cannot lift the calf he never will have strength to lift the ox. In the Lord's army there is order for promotion ; but you cannot be a general until you have been a captain, a lieutenant, and a colonel. It is step by step, it is inch by inch, it is stroke by stroke that our Christian character is builded. Therefore be content to do what God commands you to do. God is not ashamed to do small things. He is not ashamed to be found chiselling a grain of sand, or helping a honey-bee to construct its cell with mathematical accuracy, or tingeing a shell in the surf, or shaping the bill of a chaffinch.

What God does, He does well. What you do, do well, be it a great work or a small work. If ten talents, employ all the ten. If five talents, employ all the five. If one talent, employ the one. If only the thousandth part of a talent, employ that. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee the crown of life." I tell you if you are not faithful to God in a small sphere, you would be indolent and insignificant in a large sphere.

III. Third : Again, my text teaches me that repulsiveness and up into very elevated places. You would have tried to kill the spider that Solomon saw. You would have said, "This is no place for it. If that spider is determined to weave a web, let it do so down in the cellar of this palace, or in some dark dungeon." Ah ! the spider of the text could not be discouraged. It clambered on and climbed up, higher, and higher, and higher, until, after a while it reached the king's vision, and he said, "The spider taketh hold with her hands and is in king's palaces." And so it often is now that things that are loathsome and repulsive get up into very elevated places.

The church of Christ, for instance, is a palace. The King of Heaven on earth lives in it. According to the Bible, her beams are of cedar, and her rafters of fir, and her windows of agate, and the fountains of salvation dash a rain of light. It is a glorious palace—the church of God is ; and yet sometimes unseemly and loathsome things creep up into it—evil-speaking, and rancor, and slander, and backbiting, and abuse, crawling up on the walls of the church, spinning a web from arch to arch, and from the top of one communion tankard to the top of another communion tankard. Glorious palace, in which there ought only to be light, and love, and pardon, and grace—yet a spider in the palace !

Home ought to be a castle. It ought to be the residence of everything loyal. Kindness, love, peace, patience, and forbearance ought to be the princes residing there, and yet sometimes dissipation crawls up into that home, and the jealous eye comes up, and the scene of peace and plenty becomes the scene of domestic jargon and dissonance. You say, "What is the matter with the home ?" I will tell you what is the matter with it. A spider in the palace.

A well-developed Christian character is a grand thing to look at. You see some men with great intellectual and spiritual proportions. You say, "How useful that man must be !" But you find amid all his splendor of faculties there is some prejudice, some whim, some evil habit, that a great many people do not notice, but that you have happened to notice, and it is gradually spoiling that man's character ; it is gradually going to injure his entire influence. Others may not see it, but yon are anxious in regard to his welfare, and how you discover it. A dead fly in the ointment. A spider in the palace.

IV. Fourth : Again, my text teaches me that into the king's palace. It must have seemed a long distance for that spider to climb in Solomon's splendid residence, but it started at the very foot of the wall and went up over the panels of Lebanon cedar, higher and higher, until it stood higher than the highest throne in all the nations—the throne of Solomon. And so God has decreed it, that many of those who are down in the dust of sin and dishonor shall gradually attain to the king's palace.

We see it in worldly things. Who is that banker in Philadelphia ? Why, he used to be the boy who held the horses of Stephen Girard while the millionaire went in to collect his dividends. Arkwright toils on up from a barber's shop until he gets into the palace of invention. Sextus V. toils on up from the office of a swineherd until he gets into the palace of Rome. Fletcher toils on up from the most insignificant family position until he gets into the palace of Christian eloquence. Hogarth, engraving pewter mugs for a living, toils on up until he reaches the palace of world-renowned art.

And God hath decided that though you may be weak of arm and slow of tongue and be struck through with a great many mental and moral deficits, by His Almighty grace you shall yet arrive in the King's palace—not such a one as is spoken of in the text, not one of marble, not one adorned with pillars of alabaster, and thrones of ivory, and flagons of burnished gold—but a palace in which God is the King and the angels of heaven are the cup-bearers.

The spider crawling up the wall of Solomon's palace was not worth looking after or considering as compared with the fact that we, who are the worms of the dust, may at last ascend into the palace of the King immortal. By the grace of God we all reach it. Oh ! heaven is not a dull place. It is not a worn-out mansion with faded curtains, and outlandish chairs, and cracked ware. No ; it is as fresh, and fair, and beautiful as though it were completed but yesterday. The kings of the earth shall bring their honor and glory into it.

WHAT A PALACE MEANS.

Splendor of apartments. Now, I do not know where heaven is, and I do not know how it looks, but if our bodies are to be resurrected at the last day, I think heaven must have a material splendor as well as a spiritual grandeur. What will be the use of a resurrected foot if there is nothing to tread on ? or of a resurrected hand if there be no harp to strike, and no palm to wave, and no place to take hold in the King's palace ? Oh ! what grandeur of apartments, when that divine hand which plunges the sea into blue and the foliage into green, and sets the sunset on fire, shall gather all the beautiful colors of earth around His throne, and when that arm which lifted the pillars of Alpine rock and bent the arch of the sky shall raise before our soul the eternal architecture, and that hand which hung with loops of fire the curtains of morning shall prepare the upholstery of our kingly residence!

A palace also means

SPLENDOR OF ASSOCIATIONS.

The poor man, the outcast, cannot get into the Tuileries, or Windsor Castle. The sentinel stands there and cries "Halt!" as he tries to enter. But in that palace we may all become residents, and we shall all be princes and kings. We may have been beggars, we may have been outcasts, we may have been wandering as we all have been, but there we shall take our regal power. What companionship in heaven! To walk side by side with John and James, and Peter and Paul, and Moses and Joshua, and Caleb and Ezekiel and Jeremiah, and Micah and Zechariah, and Wilberforce, and Oliver Cromwell, and Philip Doddridge, and Edward Payson, and John Milton, and Elizabeth Fry, and Hannah More, and Charlotte Elizabeth, and all the other kings and queens of heaven. O my soul, what a companionship!

A palace means splendor of banquet. There will be no common ware on that table. There will be no unskilled musicians at that entertainment. There will be no scanty supply of fruit or beverage. There have been banquets spread that cost a million of dollars each; but who can tell the untold wealth of that banquet? I do not know whether John's description of it is literal or figurative; I cannot prove it. I do not know but that it may be literal. I do not know but that there may be real fruits plucked from the tree of life. I do not know but that Christ referred to the real juice of the grape when He said that we should drink new wine in our Father's kingdom. I do not say it is so; but I have as much right for thinking it is so as you have for thinking the other way. At any rate, it will be a glorious banquet.

Hark! the chariots rumbling in the distance. I really believe the guests are coming now. The gates swing open, the guests dismount, the palace is filling, and all the chalices, flashing with pearl, and amethyst, and carbuncle, are lifted to the lips of the myriad banquetters, while standing in robes of snowy white they drink to the honor of our Glorious King!

"Oh," you say, "that is too grand a place for me." No, it is not. If a spider, according to the text, could crawl up on the wall of Solomon's palace, shall not our poor souls, through the blood of Christ, mount up from the depths of sin and shame, and finally reach the palace of the Eternal King? "Where sin abounded grace shall much more abound, that whereas sin reigned unto death, even so may grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord."

In the far East there is a bird called the huma, about which is the beautiful superstition that, upon whatever head the shadow of that bird rests, upon that head there shall be a crown. Oh, thou Dove of the Spirit, floating above us, let the shadow of Thy wing fall upon this congregation, that each at last in heaven may wear a crown! a crown! and hold in his right hand a star! a star!

THE WOUNDED PRESIDENT.

THE gloomy forebodings to which President Garfield's condition gave rise on Monday, July 4th, were relieved by more hopeful intelligence the following day. A remarkable change for the better took place on Tuesday morning, and his despairing medical attendants gained fresh hope and imparted it to the general public through the medium of their bulletins. The patient took nourishment and retained it upon his stomach, gaining strength thereby. His pulse was lower throughout the day and evening, and altogether his symptoms were such as to afford encouragement.

On Wednesday the following announcement was made: "President Garfield has, in the opinion of his physicians, safely passed the first danger period. The much dreaded peritoneal inflammation has not set in. The wounded man has demanded solid food, and exhibited vexation when it was denied him; he took and assimilated a comparatively large quantity of nourishment. His pulse, for the first time since Saturday, fell below 100, and his temperature was not much above the normal. He rested well, and altogether the symptoms of his case were very gratifying. His physicians forbid the public to cherish a rash confidence, but are disposed to encourage hope."

No change of any moment occurred in President Garfield's condition on Thursday, and the attending medical men talked more hopefully than at any previous time of his ultimate recovery. They did not conceal the fact that many obstacles stand in his way, but they were not apprehensive of any of the changes which they can foresee. The President himself was reported as feeling confident of a favorable result in his case.

Some uneasiness was caused on Friday by bulletins indicating that the President's pulse and temperature were slightly higher, but this was relieved by the statement of the physicians that the increase was the effect of an irritative fever caused by suppuration, and an inevitable result of the wound. The President took considerable nourishment and was not troubled with vomiting; in the evening he was in a very jocular mood, although complaining of feeling tired. At 10 o'clock he was sleeping soundly. Secretary Hunt said on that day that he thought the President was "half way over the bridge," and that he would soon be off it.

In the opinion of the attending physicians and those admitted to the sick-room, the President's condition on Saturday showed a satisfactory advance toward recovery. The President showed himself, in the course of the day, anxious to enter into conversation with those around him. His three children at present in Washington were, for the first time since their father was shot, admitted to his presence. The President has repeatedly asked for them, but it has not been thought advisable to gratify his wish before.

On Sunday evening the feeling of confidence in the recovery of the President had become so general and so strong that his physicians thought the public needed to be reminded that he is very weak and still a very sick man. Yet they do not conceal their own growing confidence. The bulletins issued on Sunday stated that the President slept well Saturday night, awoke with a good appetite and in a cheerful frame of mind, and was better than at any time since Guiteau fired upon him. The bulletins issued later in the day showed a continuance of favorable symptoms.

On Monday Dr. Bliss said: "The patient is of course very weak. If you could see that strong man in his present condition you would realize how severe his hurt is. He is doing better continuously, than we could have dared to hope."

As will be seen from the foregoing daily report, the sufferer's progress toward recovery during the week was continuous, and a corresponding feeling of hope gradually took the place in the public mind of the desponding feelings which prevailed during the first three days after the attack.

EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY

have poured into the White House from all quarters, both at home and abroad, accompanied by earnest hopes for the President's recovery. At a special meeting of the Chamber of Commerce in New York on Thursday, the following resolutions were passed by a rising vote:

"Whereas, The Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York has met this day with a view to express on behalf of the entire membership of their ancient body, older than our Government itself, and including a large proportion of the leading merchants and bankers of New York, their unspeakable grief and indignation at the attempted assassination of President Garfield, and

"Whereas, We have watched with painful anxiety every bulletin from the Executive Mansion that has given intelligence of the condition of the President, and have been deeply moved by the Christian heroism with which he has met this appalling calamity that has alarmed the whole country, and compared with which all political contentions and personal interests have sunk into insignificance; therefore,

"Resolved, That we tender to President Garfield our heartfelt congratulations that, by the aid of Divine Providence, he has so far survived the perils that seemed deadly, and that he retains his intellectual faculties in full vigor and perfect composure of spirit.

"That we offer to his heroic wife, as well as to his aged mother and his children, our deepest sympathies in their sore trials.

"That we congratulate the country and ourselves on the fact that our chief magistrate, by his own display of the highest quality of manhood, has done so much to sustain the hopes of the people as to his final recovery, and we hope that a continuance of his life will be the means of bringing together the best men of all parties and sections, and thus give a pledge of the perpetuity of our so much valued institutions.

A subscription was also started by Mr. Cyrus Field toward a fund to be deposited with the United States Trust Company of New York, in trust, to be kept invested in United States Government bonds, and the income thereof to be paid to Mrs. Garfield, the wife of the President, during her life, and at her death the principal to be divided among the surviving children of James A. Garfield. On Saturday evening the amounts received on account of this fund aggregated $117,686.

Considerable curiosity is manifested as to

and the motives which induced him to commit the crime. It appears that he is well known both in New York and Chicago, having in both places earned a bad reputation for dishonesty and mendacity. His wife is separated from him on account of his misconduct, and though no one supposed him likely to perpetrate so desperate a deed, he has been generally regarded as a mean and unscrupulous swindler. The following particulars as to his past history have been obtained from Colonel Burnside, the disbursing officer at the Post Office Department, who says he knew Guiteau when he was a baby in his mother's arms. His father, J. W. Guiteau, was an old resident of Freeport, Ill. Some years ago he became deranged on the subject of "Perfection," and lectured extensively through the North and West on that subject. He married a very beautiful woman, with whom and the younger children he joined the Oneida Community. He afterward returned to Freeport, where from 1864 up to last September, the time of his death, he served as cashier of the Second National Bank.

When the family left the Oneida Community his son Charles, now in jail for the attempted assassination, then fifteen or sixteen years old, was left behind. He afterward went to Chicago, where he studied law, being cared for and supplied with money by his father. After completing his studies Guiteau went to Europe, where he traveled several years, imbibing socialistic and other eccentric doctrines. A few years ago he returned to this country and lectured on the second advent of Christ. He published a pamphlet on the subject, in which the egotism of the man was plainly shown. He spoke of himself as a messenger of God to announce His coming. Guiteau had forced himself upon the President before. He was an applicant for the Consulship at Marseilles and a few days ago obtained access to the President and acted so rudely that the President had him removed. "I have no doubt," said Col. Burnside, "that, feeling offended by this act, he determined on the course which culminated in the terrible tragedy of July 2d."

President Garfield's Letter to the International Sunday-school Convention recently held at Toronto, is especially interesting in the light of subsequent events. In response to an invitation from the secretary of the convention, the President wrote: "Please accept my thanks for the invitation, which I regret I am unable to accept owing to the exactions of my official duties and engagements made for the neighboring time. It would give me much pleasure to be present with you at Toronto, and in this way testify my earnest sympathy and deep interest in the good work to be done. With my sincere wishes for the individual efforts of the members of the convention and with the hope that the meeting may be productive of good and permanent results, I remain, very truly yours, J. A. GARFIELD."

Mrs. Graham's Narrative—Adventure With Three Armed Convicts—Two Bushrangers Carry off a Scotchman's Wife to Punish Her Husband.

ABOUT dinner time our men returned, and at night James. He was standing before the fire drying himself, as it had rained some hours before his return, when a violent knock came to the door. James asked who was there, for we feared it might be the blacks. A voice roughly answered that they were policemen, who had a warrant to search our hut. On James opening the door three men rushed in heavily armed, and levelling their guns at him told him he was a big fellow, but to stand back or they would scatter his brains on the ground. One of them, Scotchy, who was the captain of the party, ordered me to hand him a light, and in doing so I looked him in the face. He immediately drew a horse-pistol out of his belt, and putting it to my face, vowed if I dared lift my eyes at any of them again he would shoot me. They were afraid, of course, I would identify them if they should be taken.

After I had given him the light, Scotchy was going into our bedroom; a man named Witton was standing over us with his gun levelled and cocked; another called Russell was walking up and down sentry before the door. James said to me, "I hope, Selina, these men will behave as honorably to us as Scotchy did." He turned round and asked, "What was that I heard you say about Scotchy?" James then spoke of an encounter we had had previously, Scotchy looked steadily at him—it was a picture. There was James quite cool, with Witton holding the loaded gun before him, and the other threw the light full on his face. He said, "Is your name Graham?" He said it was. He then ordered Witton to lower his gun, and called in Russell from before the door. He said, "Boys, this is Mr. Graham," and they sat down by the fire, while he went into our bedroom for our firearms, which, he said, they must take, as they could not leave weapons to shoot themselves.

I assured them, and truthfully, that it was not for them we kept firearms, but as a protection against the blacks; and I told them that the double-barrelled gun had been the means of saving my life that day. Of course they asked me what I meant; and I told them with tears—for the remembrance of the previous night did make me weep bitterly—how I had been left alone in that wild, lonely place, and had barely escaped with my life.

It was the first of it—at least, the worst of it—that James himself had heard. I wish you had seen their indignation at the blacks, when they heard it all. I think they appeared more enraged than James. They vowed they would go to their camp and shoot all they could get. We entreated them not to do so. At length they said they were determined to frighten them; and they ordered me to bake them a damper, while they were gone to the camp, to carry them on their journey. Of course we were at their mercy, as they had our firearms in their possession, and I had to obey. I need not tell you that damper is flour kneaded without yeast and baked in the wood ashes, as you would roast potatoes.

Well, they started for the camp, and we soon heard a terrible noise—the jabbering of the blacks, and the howling of their dogs, and several shots. The bushrangers demanded how the blacks had dared to threaten a white gin. Of course they all denied having done so. The others told them they knew they had, and that they had come to punish them. Indeed, they appeared so zealous for my safety that the poor blacks, I suppose, thought they were officers of justice, and not robbers who had themselves threatened to shoot myself and my husband but a few minutes before. They told them that they would let them off that time with shooting some of their dogs (dingoes), but if they ever heard of them molesting a white gin again, they would follow them and shoot every one of them. They then went to work and shot several of their dogs, occasioning much consternation and grief in the camp.

On their return they told us what they had done; and we felt very much relieved to know it was only dogs were shot. Several of the blacks ran up trees, and others crawled into small bushes, and remained there all night, lest the terrible white men should come back and shoot them. They returned before damper and tea were quite ready, and sat down to joke and talk. Russell was from the north of Ireland, from near Londonderry, and entered largely into the affairs of that country in conversation with James. Having refreshed themselves, they left us, and so did the blacks a few days afterward, having kept very civil while they remained. In narrating these events I cannot but gladly perceive and gratefully acknowledge the kind over-ruling providence of God in all that happened.

The first thing Graham did, after the bushrangers left, was to send a man to warn our nearest neighbor, who lived at a place called Booga-boogalong. He had once been a convict, and was very much disliked for having been very cruel to Government men that he had been set over. It is wonderful how old convicts know the character of the settlers; and there is no one they hate so much as one of themselves that has been cruel to his fellow-prisoners. This man's name was O'Leary. He was from Dublin, and had then been married about seven weeks. The bushrangers did not then call on him; and he got fully armed to meet them if they came. At last he lost all fear of their coming; and used to run into the hut and playfully tell his wife "here they are," and they acted over in mirth a battle with the bushrangers.

They spoke very hardly of James and me, because we sat and talked with the robbers; but what could we do? They blamed me for not putting poison in the damper; but that I could not and would not do to any human creature, and especially to men who, however bad, treated us with some measure of humanity. If James had known who they were before he opened the door, he would have resisted them fairly; but he did not suspect, and it was best he did not.

About a fortnight after they visited us, when it was thought they were clean gone, they visited O'Leary. They had a spirit of determined revenge toward him, which was still more embittered by their hearing of his threats if they should come. They came to his door after dark and rapped loudly, and told who they were, and asked whether he intended to fight them or open his door. He made no reply, but crept cautiously to his stand of arms in the inner room; he cocked his piece, but was too much frightened to use it. They heard the noise of the gun a-drawing to full cock, and they said, "Once more we ask you to open the door."

On receiving no answer, they fired a volley. One of the balls passed through the two doors and through Mrs. O'Leary's thigh. She had on the brown cashmere dress in which she had been married; and several splinters of the door, together with pieces of the dress, lodged in the wound. I was present when the doctor probed the wound, and took out several of the pieces. After the poor woman received the shot she fell; and O'Leary cried out to them that he would open the door, as his wife was shot.

They entered, and went and lifted the poor woman, and expressed deep sorrow for what had happened. They told her it was the first blood they had shed, but that they had come to punish her husband for past cruelty to poor fellows that were prisoners, and were sorry she should be the innocent sufferer. They always had a strong pack-horse with them. So they went to the store and took tea, sugar, tobacco, and flour, and loaded the horse; and what they could not carry away they strewed about, leaving the place absolutely destitute.

Mrs. O'Leary was a long time before she recovered, and was lame for nearly two years. The medical man was a quack doctor. The whole of his drugs consisted of coarse salts, bitter aloes, and bread pills. He had been stopping at a house where there was a very young child—a boy. The child, by a chain, climbed up to the top of a set of drawers and swallowed half a cupful of the doctor's pills. The alarm of the mother was extreme; but our bush doctor quieted her by the assurance that they only consisted of chewed bread dipped in fine flour. This was poor Mrs. O'Leary's physician! I often went to see her; and it was perfectly ridiculous to hear how her husband comforted her in her anguish. In the strongest Dublin accent he assured her that her case would be stated in all the newspapers, and that even the queen would hear of it, and the scoundrels would be hanged, as sure as a gun. He appeared to wonder that this did not relieve her pain, which I could not but wish he had been bearing instead of the uncomplaining poor woman. How often in this life the innocent bear painful burdens for the guilty, even as the Saviour of the world died for sinners, "the just for the unjust, to bring us to God."

On another occasion, two bushrangers visited our hut when James was from home with a Scotchman we had hired. His wife was washing at a tub when they alighted at the door, fully armed. They said to me: "Mam, we do not wish to insult you even by a word; but this woman's husband has threatened us should we come this way. Had we got himself we should have preferred it; but we'll take his wife and he can come for her." I implored them, with prayers and tears, for Heaven's sake not to take the woman away; but away they took her on a horse before one of them.

When her husband and James came home and heard it, the latter grew pale with rage, and getting his gun offered to go to find them and rescue her. Her husband blubbered and cried, but thought it would be no use, and had his supper. The woman returned next day. James thought they might return; and he remained at home several days with his gun over his arm, resolved to shoot them or be shot. I was in dreadful anxiety, but was also prepared. I thank God they never showed their faces near us again. They were subsequently both taken and hanged. Others of the same gang took away several women, and kept them for weeks in their hiding-places in the bush.

There was one man to whom word was brought that they were coming. He was in bed when a man, out of breath, shouted, "The woman-lifters are at hand." His wife was nervous, and trembled and shook. He said to her, "Now, Sarah, I'll hide you so that they will not be able to find you." He ripped up the bed-tick and put her in it, leaving her a hole through which to breathe, and making all smooth, and then threw down the bed-clothes. When they came, he rose and let them in. They asked for his wife. He said she had gone to visit a neighbor. They saw the bed-clothes thrown down, and believed him. He made them a pot of tea, and they stayed and smoked and chatted at their leisure.

Surely it was nothing less than the watchful providence of God that protected us at that period through so many dangers, in any of which one or both of us might have fallen. God was then to me a "Shield," though alas! not a "Sun;" for though I heard James read of Him in the Bible, and I did believe there was a God, He seemed to me to be in the past or in the distance, and not what He really was—"a very present Help in trouble." I did not then know Him as the living God and my Father. Our religious privileges were then very few, but I have since learned the meaning of the words, "The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance."

The reader may be curious to know the latter end of these unceremonious visitors of Mr. and Mrs. Graham. The account of their capture shows the darkest side of bush-life, and the desperate character of the men with whom colonists at that time were not unfrequently brought into contact. The following is Mr. Graham's account:

You ask me, my dear J—, if the gang of Scotchy, Witton, and Co., were captured, and how? They were captured; for justice, even in the colonies, has a long arm and a sharp eye; and no delinquent finally escapes her. By self-interest she swears in every man as a special constable; and I think some of the most daring deeds ever done by man have been done by some settlers in capturing or killing bushrangers.

I had no hand in taking my old guests. They left my neighborhood for a distant district, and I was so intent on "tailing cattle" that I could not get time for any hunt except an occasional half-holiday to capture a haunch of kangaroo venison.

THE VISION OF THE EPHAH AND ITS FUTURE FULFILMENT.

By Rev. William Maude.

III. The Imprisonment of the Woman in the Ephah—IV. The Lifting up of the Ephah by the Two Women—Whence is it to be Borne Away?—V. The Ephah Transported to the Land of Shinar—VI. The Object of its Transportation—The Babylon of the Apocalypse.

III. THE IMPRISONMENT OF THE WOMAN IN THE EPHAH.

WHILE the prophet's eye was yet fixed in a kind of terrible fascination upon the mysterious woman seated in the ephah, he suddenly beheld "a talent of lead"—a heavy circular plate of that metal—lifted up in the angel's hand, from which it presently descended, crushing down the woman into the interior of the ephah, and, by closing its mouth, imprisoning her within it. What are we to learn from this? Two things, at least, it seems intended to teach us.

First. We may learn from it that the "wickedness" of trade is hidden under a specious appearance. It does not proclaim its lawlessness; on the contrary, it presents itself to those who view it from without under an aspect of utility and even of beneficence. It is the patron of science, the nurse of art, the employer of labor, the civilizer of the dark places of the earth, even the pioneer of religion. Nevertheless, its inward spirit, its animating principle, is "wickedness." The trade spirit is a selfish spirit, for it leads men to seek their own, not another's, good. It is a fraudful spirit, for the opportunities of deception which it presents are so frequent and so facile, that few indeed are not tempted to avail themselves thereof.

It is an unbrotherly spirit, for it sets class against class, and interest against interest; the employer against the employee; capital against labor. It is a cruel spirit, for it puts the profit of the master and the welfare or even life of the servant in opposite scales, and too often allows the former to outweigh the latter. It is an antichristian spirit, for it has, more than anything else, perhaps, hindered the progress of Christ's Gospel throughout the world, presenting so-called Christian nations to the heathen as coming to them with the Gospel in one hand, the false measure, the opium bag, and even the instruments of death, in the other. How much blood has England shed, how much injustice has she wrought, how much dishonor has she done to God in the lawless pursuit of her "commercial interests?" Let China, Japan, Africa, and the islands of the sea answer.

Secondly. The imprisonment of the woman in the ephah seems designed to teach us the solemn truth that this "wickedness" is inseparable from the trade system as it now exists and will be more fully developed in the world. The thought may naturally have passed through the mind of the reader of the preceding pages, "But all trading is not necessarily thus evil; every man engaged in trade is not a rogue." Assuredly not. I am speaking of the system—the prophet's vision has reference to the system—not to the individuals.

Moreover, the evil of the system has not yet culminated. The system itself, as the vision plainly indicates, is formed secretly, for it is represented as hidden in the ephah. "And nothing," says Mr. Newton, "can be more true. Sheltering itself under the excuse of expediency, England, which more than any nation owns the sway of the ephah, has secretly and stealthily adopted principles which it is still ashamed to avow as the fixed acknowledged rules of its conduct."

IV. THE LIFTING UP OF THE EPHAH BY THE TWO WOMEN.

"Then lifted I up mine eyes, and looked, and, behold, there came forth two women, and the wind was in their wings; for they had wings like the wings of a stork; and they lifted up the ephah between the earth and the heaven." It is at this point that the vision becomes definitively prophetic. The destination to which the ephah is to be borne is plainly revealed—it is the land of Shinar. But from whence is it borne away? The answer to this question is to be found, I think, in the scope of the whole series of visions, which manifestly have reference to the future restoration and blessedness of Israel, as well as in attention to that sound canon of interpretation—i.e., that in prophecy God ever speaks from Jerusalem.

Chronologically, this vision of the ephah belongs to the period when the Jews shall be restored to their own land, though as yet in unbelief, and before the manifestation of the last personal Antichrist. We know, as matter of history, that the people of Israel, while as yet under the Divine favor, and in the enjoyment of national prosperity, were not characteristically a commercial but an agricultural people. The blessing of Jacob was "the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine." But when in judgment ejected from the land of promise and scattered among the nations, they were, almost of necessity, driven to addict themselves to those commercial pursuits, and those various forms of petty trading, which have made the name of a Jew the synonym of usurer, extortioner, and cheat.

Now, when the Jews shall first return to the land of their fathers they will not have purged themselves of this evil leaven of trade. They will essay to carry the ephah with them and establish it in their midst. But this is not what God intends. Jerusalem is not the home of the ephah, for this Jerusalem is to be the city of the Lord, the Holy City. Therefore, the messengers of Divine judgment are sent forth, and by them the ephah is lifted up between the earth and the heaven, and the wind of God's providence being in their wings, by them it is swiftly borne away.

No name is applied to the two women who bear away the ephah, as is the case with her confined within it, by which circumstance we are, perhaps, warned not to seek particularly to identify them. But they are represented as women because they personify evil powers, and they are two in number, because two women at least were needed to carry so heavy a burden. And whither do they bear their evil load? Here, again, the vision affords us important prophetic instruction. Let us observe particularly what follows.

V. THE EPHAH TRANSPORTED TO THE LAND OF SHINAR.

"Then said I to the angel that talked with me, Whither do these bear the ephah? And he said unto me, To build it an house in the land of Shinar." In the identification of "the land of Shinar" there is no difficulty. Shinar is the ancient name of that vast alluvial plain through which the great rivers, the Tigris and the Euphrates, pass in their seaward course: the tract of country known in later times as Chaldea, or Babylonia. The first Scriptural mention of it is found in the Book of Genesis as the original kingdom of Nimrod (10: 10), and in the following chapter as the country in which Babel was built (11: 9).

It was a land of great cities; but peerless among these was Babylon, once the most magnificent city in the world, and yet to be restored (if we read the prophetic page aright) to more than its original importance and splendor. Nor is there any apparent reason for doubting that it is to the literal Babylonia that the prophet Zechariah here refers. Why should we assume that "the land of Shinar is an ideal land, contrasted with the land of Israel?" True, indeed, fifty, or even twenty years ago the rebuilding of the ancient Babylon might well have seemed to human foresight in the last degree improbable. But who can say as much now, when we see the effete Turkish empire so rapidly hastening to its fall; when the Euphrates Valley Railway is all but an accomplished fact; and when the whole Eastern world is being so marvellously opened up and coming so prominently into notice?

Hither, then, will the symbolic ephah be transported; here must it find its proper home and meet its final doom. But, observe, it is not said that the ephah is to be carried to the city of Babylon, but to the land of Shinar. Nor is this a mere archism. The ephah is not transported thither because there is a house ready to receive it; on the contrary, the house is to be built because the ephah rests there. In other words, when the Euphrates Valley becomes a great channel of trade, the new Babylon will not be already built; it will be built to accommodate the population which that trade will carry with it. And this brings us to the last feature of the vision which calls for notice.

VI. THE OBJECT OF THE TRANSPORTATION OF THE EPHAH.

"To build it an house in the land of Shinar, and when it is ready it shall be set in its own place." The house which is to be built for the ephah is the new Babylon; a city as literal as the old, and which shall become one of the great centres of the world's commercial activity. Here the trade spirit will manifest itself in all its moral repulsiveness, till it answers to the description given in the book of Revelation; and when the hour of her judgment comes, as come it quickly will,

"The merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn over her; for no man buyeth their merchandise any more: the merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet, and all thyine wood and all manner of vessels of ivory, and all manner of vessels of most precious wood, and all brass, and iron, and marble, and cinnamon, and odors, and ointments, and frankincense, and wine, and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and beasts, and sheep, and horses, and chariots, and slaves, and souls of men. . . . And the merchants of these things, which were made rich by her, shall stand afar off, for the fear of her torment, weeping and wailing, and saying, Alas, alas! that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea by reason of her costliness, for in one hour is she made desolate. . . .

"And the voice of harpers, and musicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, shall be heard no more at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft, shall be found any more in thee; and the sound of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee, and the light of a lamp shall shine no more at all in thee, and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee; for thy merchants were the great men of the earth; for by thy sorceries were all nations deceived."

It is impossible to harmonize this description with the characteristics of Rome as a literal city, and yet that a literal city is intended seems obvious from the particular details given, which are not susceptible of any spiritual interpretation. Nor is it any valid argument against the resuscitation of the ancient Babylon to say that, according to Daniel 2, the "stone cut out of the mountain without hands" is to smite the image of Gentile power on the feet, not on the head, which it must do, if Babylon is to be rebuilt, and to be destroyed only at the coming of the Lord; for we are also told in the 35th verse, that when the stone falls, not only the iron and clay, but also the brass, the silver, and the gold, are to be broken to pieces together, and become like the chaff of the summer threshing floors, which the wind carries away. Babylon, therefore, is to be in existence as well as Rome.

The whole truth would seem to be that the Babylon of the Apocalypse is at once literal and mystical; the mystical shining, as it were, through the literal, while the literal forms the nucleus of the mystical. Hence Protestant interpreters who find in the mystical Babylon a representation of apostate Christendom, headed up and embodied in the Church of Rome, are no doubt perfectly warranted in their interpretation; but they err, I apprehend, in not perceiving that it also embraces a reference to the literal Babylon, to be built hereafter in the land of Shinar, whither the symbolic ephah is to be transported, by means which providence seems already not obscurely to indicate, when Jerusalem shall be purged of the thieves and perjurers, in order that the promised day may come when there shall be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord; and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The One Distinct and Prevalent Emotion in the mind of the public during the past week is that of deep thankfulness that the life of the President has been preserved. As day by day the telegraph carried encouraging reports of his state to every city in the Union, patriotic citizens of all political parties joined in the general enthusiasm and expressed their joy at the good news. A few ardent politicians in the excitement of the time have shown a disposition to impute responsibility for the crime to their political opponents, but the majority of the people seem to have given a truce to political antagonism and have united in the general feeling of anxiety about the President's condition and hearty desires for his recovery. On another page we give an account of the President's progress from day to day, with some interesting details of the popular enthusiasm in his behalf. The outlook has been that of a nation stricken with grief, then that of a nation in suspense, and now that of a nation rejoicing in hope. Those who voted against General Garfield, as well as those who voted for him, have been animated by one and the same sentiment—horror at the crime, and ardent wishes for his recovery. From churches of every creed, from the cathedral and the smallest village chapel, from the Jewish synagogue, the Roman Catholic Church, and every denomination of Protestants, prayers have been offered to the Giver of all good, that the chief Executive of the nation may, if consistent with the Divine will, be restored to health. This spectacle of national unanimity is very gratifying, as showing what we too often forget, that amid our many divisions, political, social, and religious, we are really one people in heart and sympathy. We realize the fact, however, in witnessing the eagerness with which the bulletins from the White House are scanned, and in the expressions of sympathy for the sufferer to be found in every journal throughout the land. In these we heartily concur, and with all sincerity and reverence echo the cry that has ascended from millions of hearts during the past week, "God save the President."

A Republican Caucus was Called by the Conference at Albany on Thursday. The call was signed by sixty-two members of the Legislature. When the caucus assembled on Friday sixty-five Senators and Assemblymen were present, that number being three fifths of the Republican vote at Albany. The absentees were principally Conkling men.

Before the balloting for the Senatorial nominations took place, a letter was read from Mr. Chauncey M. Depew withdrawing his name from the list of candidates. The reasons assigned for the withdrawal are very honorable and show that he was ready to sacrifice his own prospects in the interest of the party with which he is identified. "You have been fruitlessly balloting for five weeks," Mr. Depew said in his letter, "and for four of them I have had the support of a majority of the Republican members of the Legislature. But I am convinced that feelings have become so embittered in this protracted struggle against those who have been longest and foremost in the fight, that neither by unity in caucus nor voting in convention can this question be settled while they remain in the field. A great crime has plunged the nation into sorrow, and in the midst of the prayers and the tears of the whole people, supplicating for the recovery and weeping over the wounds of the President, this partisan strife should cease."

The ballots then taken resulted in the nomination of the Hon. Elbridge G. Lapham for the short term, and the Hon. Warner Miller for the long term. Both gentlemen are members of Congress.

The Balloting in the Joint Convention at Albany for the United States Senatorships last week continued to be of an indecisive character. After the caucus had nominated two candidates, it was hoped that sufficient aid might be gained from the Stalwart camp to elect at least Mr. Platt's successor, but on Saturday the Stalwarts voted for ex-Vice-President Wheeler, and the caucus candidate consequently lacked seven votes of the number necessary to elect. For the short term the Stalwarts remained faithful to Mr. Conkling. The Democrats still continued solid for their candidates for both terms.

The Cotton Exposition at Atlanta, Ga., has aroused so general an interest that the influx of visitors will be far beyond the accommodation the hotels of the city are capable of affording. Some anxiety has been expressed on this head by persons wishing to attend. In view of these facts it is now announced that Mr. Kimball proposes to ask all the people of Atlanta, rich and poor, without regard to their own comfort, to open their houses to the visitors at a fixed schedule of prices. In accordance with this plan all arrangements for board and all payments therefor would be conducted by the managers through a special department which would be responsible to both householders and visitors. It is expected that the citizens will respond heartily to this appeal, as a general disposition has been manifested to do everything possible to make the exposition a complete success.

The Summer School of Christian Philosophy now in session at Warwick Woodlands, N. J., of which Dr. Deems is Dean, has deservedly attracted so much attention that a proposal to make it a permanent institution under the title of "The American Institute of Christian Philosophy," is under consideration. The following announcement indicates the character of the project "Among its objects will be a full and impartial investigation of questions of philosophy and science, especially those bearing upon the truths of Scripture; the association of men of science and authors who have already engaged in such investigations, and others who may be interested in them, in order to strengthen their efforts by association; and the consideration of the mutual bearings of the various scientific conclusions arrived at in the several distinct branches into which science is divided, in order to get rid of contradictory hypotheses and promote the advancement of true science."

The Students of the Berean Bible College held their annual meeting on June 23d in the college rooms, 78 Bible House, New York. The exercises were of a very interesting character, several excellent papers being read by the students. The past year appears to have been one of unqualified success, and is an evidence of the valuable character of the work for which the institution was designed. From the president, Rev. John Q. Adams, we learn that during the year, thirty regular students have been enrolled. There have been over 100 occasional students and visitors. In addition to attendance on churches of which they are members, the students have preached 120 sermons, led and attended 496 religious meetings, visited the hospitals twenty times, made visits to many sick persons, held religious conversation with inquirers, and distributed over 5,000 religious papers and tracts. Three students have been aided to the amount of $99.00. The whole expense has been a little over $600, of which about one half has been contributed by the president and students. Thus in a quiet, unostentatious way, and with but little pecuniary assistance from the public, many young men have received that mental aid which renders them more efficient in active Christian work.

A Temperance Congress at Saratoga, N. Y., is announced by the New York State Temperance Society, beginning on Thursday, August 4th, and closing Sunday evening, August 7th. Ex-President Hayes and wife, Gov. St. John of Kansas, Gov. Colquitt of Georgia, Senator Blair of New Hampshire, Mrs. Mary C. Johnson of Brooklyn, and many other well known ladies and gentlemen are expected to be present. Among the attractive features of the programme is a Sunday school picnic, to which all the Sunday-school and temperanc societies of twenty-five counties have been invited, at the Indian encampment on Thursday, August 4th. Gov. and Mrs. St. John will attend. All temperance organizations, churches, and Sunday-schools of the State are invited to send delegates to this congress. Further information may be had from Mr. Eli Johnson, Saratoga Springs, New York.

The Result of Two Years' Work in Norway and Sweden by Mormon agents was realized last Thursday, when 775 Mormon converts landed in New York from those countries. The energy displayed by the leaders of this corrupt system is deserving of the careful attention of the community. It is most probable that the converts are attracted by the offer of free emigration rather than by the repulsive tenets and practices of Mormonism, but once in Utah they will be absorbed into the Mormon body, and will add to its political influence.

A Terrible Steamboat Disaster Occurred near Maysville, Ky., on June 28th. As the packet steamer Phaeton was passing Brooks Bar, with about twelve passengers on board, her boilers suddenly exploded, shattering the vessel into thousands of pieces. Such an utter wreck has seldom been seen, the fragments of the boat being mere chips. Four persons belonging to the crew were killed, and many others, including some of the passengers, were seriously injured.

An Interesting Experience is Related in a New York journal by Dr. Peter Stryker, who recently visited the scene of a temperance organization. It commenced in a blacksmith's shop in a village called Ballston. Three men, all partially intoxicated, resolved on becoming total abstainers. They wrote their pledge with chalk on the blackened walls of the shop, and wisely resolved to keep together in their leisure hours to strengthen each other. On Sunday they brought their dinners to the shop and ate them together, and did not stir out of the place except to go to church. The following Sunday other tipplers who had heard of their movement joined them, and now there is a large temperance society in the village, which has grown by voluntary additions to the party in the blacksmith's shop. Dr. Stryker has been down to the village to deliver a lecture before the strangely organized society.

In a Remarkable Feature of a Railroad Accident which occurred on Friday morning we cannot fail to recognize the hand of an overruling Providence. Part of a long freight and emigrant train on the Hudson River Railroad left the track at the New Hamburg drawbridge. Several cars were shattered and property injured, but no lives were lost. The wreckage, however, was scattered about the track, and an express train was nearly due. There was no time to send any one back to stop the express, and it was feared that soon it would dash into the wrecked train with consequences too horrible to be conceived. But to the relief of all on the spot, the express was seen to be slowing up as it arrived, and it stopped just short of the train. One of the cars of the first train had in falling severed the automatic signal wire, and the signal at New Hamburg changed instantly from white to red, and so warned the driver of the express of his danger. But for this providential circumstance we might now be lamenting one of the most disastrous accidents of recent days.

President Garfield's Faith in the Power of Prayer.—Now that the attention of the nation is concentrated on the sufferer fighting his brave fight for life in the White House, many anecdotes are being related of him which serve to illustrate his character. Among these one published in the Cincinnati Gazette is especially deserving of notice. It relates to the period when the Chicago Convention adjourned over Sunday without making choice of a Presidential candidate. General Garfield dined with some friends at the house of Marshal Field, and in the course of conversation it was remarked that pressure had been brought to bear upon Judge Hoar, Chairman of the Convention, to ignore the approach of the Sabbath, and allow the work of balloting to be begun, with the hope that the work of the convention might be completed that night. Judge Hoar replied: "Never. This is a Sabbath-keeping nation, and I cannot preside over this convention one minute after twelve o'clock." Judge Hoar's conduct was freely criticized. All except Garfield said something, and when all were done he remarked quietly, but with earnestness, to one sitting beside him: "Yes, this is a day of suspense, but it is also a day of prayer, and I have more faith in the prayers that will go up from Christian hearts to-day than I have in all the political tactics which will prevail at this convention."

Cured in Answer to Constant Prayer" is the heading of a telegram published in the New York Tribune from Freeport, Ill., under date of June 29th. It is as follows: "Mrs. C. A. Newcome, a well-known lady of this city, was thrown from her buggy nearly seven years ago. By the accident she sustained very serious injuries, from which she suffered a "living death" for years following. After trying every possible medical aid without any apparent relief, she, through the advice of her friends, resorted to prayer, in which she persisted for six months or longer, assisted by an old colored woman of a very religious turn of mind. At the end of six months her condition was greatly improved, and to-day her cure is entirely complete."

A Rich Man's Son Died in a Gutter in New York last week. A notice was received at the police station in 19th Street, that a vagrant was lying in an alley at 230 West 44th Street. A policeman who was sent to take him to the station believed that he was drunk and endeavored to make him walk, but failed. The man fell down from exhaustion, and died. It was learned then that the vagrant was the son of a wealthy farmer who lives in Connecticut. The dead man was only twenty-five years old. Repeated efforts had been made by the father to reclaim him, but without avail, and he was at last disowned. He became a tramp in this city and led a life of intemperance and vice that ended in his death in the gutter. We denounce such a son as a wicked and foolish fellow, and we do so with reason, for he wilfully flings away his privileges; but we are apt to forget that "the right to become children of God" is offered to men (John 1 : 12), and is similarly despised.

The Oldest Methodist Minister in the World is believed to be the Rev. John F. Adams, of the New Hampshire Conference, who is ninety-one years old, and is said to be the oldest preacher in that section of the country. The Rev. Moses How, of Cambridge, Mass., who is said to have been the oldest ordained preacher in New England, died a few days ago at the age of ninety-two years.

A Band of Disgusted Gypsies are Returning to Europe, being satisfied after a week's experience that America is no place for their craft. The party consisted of a father, mother, and half a dozen children. They arrived some days ago on the steamship Assyrian Monarch, and as soon as shore was reached left New York for New Jersey, accompanied by an odd-looking cart. They purchased a horse for $25, and began their journey through the country. Crowds of people flocked to see them, and their experiences were far from pleasant. A company of young ruffians at one point on the road assaulted them with stones, and fearing for their lives they turned the head of the horse and hurried back toward their starting-point. They were admitted to Castle Garden to await the next steamer sail. They said, "We must go back to France and Hungary, where money is plenty, and where we can be happy." The mother offered to do business in telling fortunes for the immigrants, trying to earn nickels by her forecasts of the future. It may be hoped that the report they take to Europe will deter others of their class from coming. Our own frauds are too numerous to admit of importation of others from Europe.

Venomous Serpents at Large in the Streets of Salem, Mass., produced a panic in that city recently. There was a parade of Barnum's menagerie and circus, and during its progress the six horses drawing the big glass cage that held forty serpents of various sizes, became unmanageable and ran away. The cage was smashed and the streets strewn with a medley of anacondas, boa-constrictors and other serpents. There was a general stampede of the immense throng of spectators, the boys seeking refuge up lamp-posts and trees. The keepers succeeded, however, in recapturing the monsters without injury or loss. There was no need to advise the spectators to make good their escape; they did that promptly when they saw their danger, but a serpent that destroys body and soul preys on society day by day, and people witness the fate of its victims and go on heedless of their danger (Prov. 23 : 32).

The Descent of a Snow Avalanche in the Rocky Mountains is described by a traveller whose hairbreadth escape was almost miraculous. He was ascending the mountain and had stayed for a moment to rest leaning against a tree. He says, "When I looked up, I thought the whole hill, snow, spruces and all, had broke loose and was coming down on me. I had just time to sling my arms around the tree I was leaning against when the slide struck me. My legs flew out from under me like lightning, but I gripped the tree with a death grasp, though I thought the strain would pull my arms out of joint. The loose snow flew so I couldn't see an inch before me, and I couldn't hear a thing but that swish and roar that sounded about like what a heavy freight train makes when it's running with down brakes over a long trestle, and the crack of the big spruces as they gave way before it." Happily for him, the tree was not carried away, as sometimes happens, and he was saved. Such a safe refuge is provided for men in their last extremity, a refuge which nothing can remove (Isa. 25 : 4).

A Train Hanging on a Trestle was the thrilling spectacle witnessed near Greenville, S. C., on June 24th. A local journal says, "As the train came around the curve just beyond the Enoree trestle at the usual rate of speed, the engineer espied a hand-car on the track loaded with iron, just entering upon the trestle at the west end of it, going in the direction of the approaching train. The laborers in charge of the hand car deserted it on hearing the approach of the train. With all possible haste the air-brakes were put on, and by the sudden application of the brakes, the engine, and the entire train were thrown off the rails on the cross ties immediately over the trestle, which is about fifty feet high. The cars contained a large number of passengers, who remained some hours in their perilous situation before they were rescued. They were face to face with a terrible death, but by the providence of God none were injured. In a situation involving still more terrible risk does the sinner continually live, yet the rescue God offers him is neglected.

Two Brothers Recently Suffered a Strange death in Minnesota. They retired to rest in a small, ill-ventilated room, leaving their oil lamp burning. In the morning the room was found full of smoke, the lamp in fragments, and the men dead. The disorder in the room and the position of the bodies indicated that they had been unconsciously struggling for air, but were so far overcome that they could neither escape nor give the alarm. The room over as well as the one adjoining this chamber was occupied, but their last struggles were not heard. The sad fate of the victims suggests the thought of the numbers of men who are overcome by the wiles of Satan, and who only discover their danger when their moral strength is so decreased that they are unable to overcome evil habits and are too despairing to cry to God for help.

HEART-DISEASE CURABLE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted."—ISAIAH 61 : 1.

A Missing Text — Possible Reasons for the Omission—Capital out of a Loss—I. Heart Wounds—Frequently Despised—Often Avoided—Very Painful—Very Weakening—Generally Incurable—Fatal if not Healed—Reminiscence of a Sad Lady—II. Heavenly Healing—Mischievous Bible Revision — For all Kinds of Broken Hearts—Those Broken by a Sense of Guilt—By a Sense of Being Outcast—By Utter Helplessness—By Heavy Afflictions—By Bereavement—By Desertion—III. The Honored Physician — Gives Personal Attentions — Is Fully Qualified—His Person and Character—Has Suffered—The Place for Despair.

THIS text receives great lustre from the fact that it was one of the passages which the Saviour read when He entered into the synagogue at Nazareth and preached on the Sabbath-day. It is as fresh as ever, and we may still say of it, "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears." It is no small privilege that we poor under-shepherds should be permitted to take the same text as "that great Shepherd of the sheep." Our care must be to point to Him in it.

I intended to have preached from these words in Luke 4 : 18, but when I looked at the Revised Version and found that the words were not there at all I was somewhat startled. I began to ask whether the omission was a correct one or not; and, without making pretence to scholarship, I feel convinced that the revisers are acting honestly in leaving it out. It was not in the original manuscript of Luke, but probably some pious person added it with the intention of making the quotation more complete. Whatever the intention may have been, and however natural the added words may appear, it is a pity that the unknown brother ventured to improve that which was perfect from the beginning.

After revolving in my mind the fact, which I accept, that the passage was not written by Luke in his record, I have, I think, discovered the reason. When our Saviour unrolled the Book of Isaiah He read from it; but we are not certain that He read any one passage through. According to the Jewish law it was allowed in the prophets for the reader in the synagogue to skip, as we call it, to make selections, and read here a passage and there a passage, as he aimed at bringing out his subject. As the words are given in our Authorized Version you will notice that the portion of Scripture is not exactly like the prophetic words in Isaiah 61, and that one sentence at least must have been taken from another part of the prophetic book.

"But," say you, "why, then, if it be so, did He omit the words which describe Him as sent 'to bind up the broken-hearted?'" It may possibly have been His intention to leave out all allusion to healing. They were all looking out for Him to work miracles of healing that day, and, therefore, He either omitted the sentence for the moment or else He did not dwell upon it; for I take it that Luke is not giving us exactly the Scripture, but the sense of it, and those points in the Scripture upon which the Saviour enlarged. He probably gives us notes of those sentences which were both read and expounded, and the Lord may have purposely refused to expound even if He read the sentence before us: "He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted."

Possibly He gave them nothing about healing that day, because He knew that they were not broken-hearted. He who reads men's hearts knew that they were captives to their unbelief, blinded by prejudice, and fettered by sin, and therefore He said, "He hath sent me to proclaim release to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord?" but the tenderest part of the gospel being inapplicable to their case, He would not mention it in their hearing at that time.

This, it strikes me, is the reason why the passage is not mentioned in the original Gospel of Luke; and, if so, the omission is most instructive. Take heed lest you also should miss of the Gospel through being in an unfit state to receive it.

Concerning the fact of difference between the Revised and the Authorized Versions, I would say that no Baptist should ever fear any honest attempt to produce the correct text, and an accurate interpretation of the Old and New Testaments. For many years Baptists have insisted upon it that we ought to have the Word of God translated in the best possible manner, whether it would confirm certain religious opinions and practices, or work against them. All we want is the exact mind of the Spirit, as far as we can get it. Beyond all other Christians we are concerned in this, seeing we have no other sacred book; we have no prayer book or binding creed, or authoritative minutes of conference; we have nothing but the Bible; and we would have that as pure as ever we can get it.

By the best and most honest scholarship that can be found we desire that the common version may be purged of every blunder of transcribers, or addition of human ignorance, or human knowledge, that so the Word of God may come to us as it came from His own hand. I confess that it looks a grievous thing to part with words which we thought were part and parcel of Luke; but as they are not in the oldest copies, and must be given up, we will make capital out of their omission, by seeing in that fact the wisdom of the great Preacher, who did not speak upon cheering truths when they were not needed, and might have overlaid His seasonable rebuke.

Now turn to the text: "He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted." Here are three matters for consideration: heart wounds; heavenly healing; and an honored Healer.

I. First, let us think upon

HEART WOUNDS.

Many in this world live with broken hearts. Bad is a broken limb of any kind; bruised and wounded flesh is hard enough to bear; but when the fracture is in the heart, it is a sad business. Of all cases of distress, these are the most pitiable, and yet they are very frequently despised. When a man's spirit is cowed, and his heart is crushed, and he is despairing and utterly wretched, others get away from him, for he is dreary company. As the herd leaves the wounded stag to bleed and die alone, so do men instinctively avoid the society of those who are habitually gloomy.

God has smitten some men, and their hearts are sore broken beneath His rod, therefore do their fellows hide their faces from them and despise them. Many blame them, and say they ought to shake off their gloom, and make an effort to be brave. I know not all they say; but certain it is that among the despised and rejected of men we find a company who carry with them heart-breaks day and night.

What wonder that they are frequently avoided. Common humanity calls us to help those who are injured in limb, and if there be an accident in the street a crowd will soon be gathered, and human kindness will exhibit itself; but if there be breakage of the heart, sympathy is soon exhausted, and love itself grows weary of her hopeless efforts to console. Those who are taught of God will help the broken-hearted, but human sympathy is soon worn out because it is conscious of its inability to succor. You can set a limb, and the bones will grow; but what can we do in the resetting of a fractured heart? So, not liking to attempt the impossible, not caring to be continually baffled, it seems to be natural even to good men to be little anxious for the company of the desolate.

Apart from this, it is exceedingly painful to have a broken heart. The heart is the centre of sensation, and hence its being broken involves the acutest of pangs. Sorrow hangs over the spirit in clouds which cannot be dispelled. They rest not day nor night; how can they? No pain of the flesh can at all equal heaviness of heart. Give me all the aches and pains which my body can endure, but spare me the heart-ache; break me alive on the wheel, but let me not live to be broken-hearted unless it be from the grand cause of penitence. "A wounded spirit who can bear?" When the arrows penetrate the soul, then the life-blood becomes as liquid fire, and the man is a mass of misery.

Besides, it weakens us, for when the heart is wounded the source of strength is impaired. A man who hath a strong heart can do anything. However weak, and feeble, and crippled, and diseased he may be in body, yet if he keeps up his spirits he can laugh at all his pains; but if the heart be crushed, what can he do? what can he hope? what can he endure? When fear is in the heart, the grasshopper becomes a burden, they that look out of the windows are darkened, and the keepers of the house do tremble. Far worse than the infirmities of old age are the miseries of a broken heart.

Ordinarily a broken heart is utterly incurable. How many times have I had to learn this lesson to my own deep humiliation. It has been my happy, happy lot to speak to broken-hearted ones and see them gradually rise to be of good cheer when my Lord has spoken through me; but apart from His presence, I have argued, pleaded, explained, and persuaded, but all in vain. I have been almost dragged down into the wretchedness from which I hoped to rescue my fellow-man; for the sympathy I have felt for the desponding has well-nigh made me despond myself.

What a variety of advice physicians give, and what is the good of it all? "Take a journey," they say, "into foreign lands; see new cities, or amuse yourself among the Alps." Yes, but if the man carries out with him a heart weary of life, he is apt enough to bring it back with him; and what good hath he gained? "Attend the baths; resort to the best physicians; use electricity; try strong exercise." This is all very well, for the body may need strengthening, or purifying, or arousing, or resting, but if the secret of the disease is a broken heart, and the hammer of God has smitten it, all the physicians in the world can be of no service: it shall end as with her of old, who spent all her living upon physicians and was nothing better, but rather grew worse. There is a cure for this grievous malady of which we shall speak full soon; but there is none in Gilead, or in the whole of nature's fields.

This heart-break in the end will be fatal, if it be not healed. We are frequently reading of men who fall dead suddenly, and the certificate states that they died of disease of the heart. That is a way which physicians have of saying that they do not know what ailed the deceased. The heart is very much like Africa, a region unexplored. Mentally and spiritually it is so, and when the heart is broken true life is well-nigh gone. Existence ceases to be desirable when the spirits fail. Such morbid minds say with Job, "My soul chooseth strangling rather than life."

It is a sad story, this tale of the broken-hearted one; but in many a house it is well known. I invite you, beloved, if you do not know the disease, to pray that you never may; and if you have any friends afflicted with it, be very tender and gentle with them. I recollect the impression made upon my young heart, as a child, when I was taken to a house where there was a sad lady, always dressed in black, who said that she had committed the unpardonable sin. I remember the horror that I felt as I sat in the room with her, and wanted from very fear to get away, thinking she must be a dreadfully wicked woman. Yet it is probable that she came out into the light again ere she departed this life. These crushed ones are often the best of people. The fairest of our lilies are often broken at the stalk. Our ripest fruit is visited by the worm. Thank God, they shall yet have beauty for ashes, and the oil of joy for mourning. Sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

II. We will now, for a little while, speak upon the HEAVENLY HEALING.

The Lord Jesus Christ has come into the world to bind up the broken-hearted, and surely it means all the broken-hearted. I do not think we have any right to restrict texts of Scripture, as we very often do, to square them to our theological systems. In this case you will hear the passage interpreted to mean the spiritually broken-hearted, and then people look within to see whether their pains are spiritual, and thus they are kept from going to Christ. I do not mind revised versions provided they really get at the original, but I do not mean to let you revise the version by putting in such qualifying words as you may think fit.

What a host of revised versions we have! Everybody has one of his own. Certain texts which will not fit into our system must be planed and cut down. Have you never seen the hard work that some brethren have to shape a Scripture to their mind? One text is not Calvinistic, it looks rather like Arminianism: of course it cannot be so, and therefore they twist and tug to get it right. As for our Arminian brethren, it is wonderful to see how they hammer away at the ninth of Romans: steam-hammers and screw-jacks are nothing to their appliances for getting rid of election from that chapter.

We have all been guilty of racking Scripture more or less, and it will be well to have done with the evil forever. We had better far be inconsistent with ourselves than with the inspired word. I have been called an Arminian Calvinist or a Calvinistic Arminian, and I am quite content so long as I can keep close to my Bible. I desire to preach what I find in this Book, whether I find it in anybody else's book or not; and as I do not find "spiritually" in my text, I shall take the liberty of giving a wide range to this broken-heartedness.

Many are broken-hearted from a sense of guilt. This is the best form of broken-heartedness in the world; when the hammer of God's law comes down with its ten strokes, and every commandment pounds the heart to powder, it is well. When a man once hears the law of God proclaimed from burning Sinai with voice of thunder he ceases to trifle and is sore afraid. Some of us knew in the days of our conviction what it was to hate the light of day, and to dread the darkness of night, to long for our bed that we might sleep, and yet to toss there restlessly upon a pillow harder than Jacob's stone. O sin! sin! sin! If its weight be once felt, if the terrors of God once break loose upon an awakened conscience, the misery reaches to agony, and the agony nears to death. But, beloved, our Lord Jesus has come to heal the anguish of the conscience by declaring that there is forgiveness with God that He may be feared, and by showing how God can be just and yet the justifier of sinners who believe.

This form of heart-break, if it be present here this morning, is in dealing with this He is altogether at home, for He delighteth in mercy. I have seen Him apply the liniments to the wounds with tender, downy-fingered hand, swathing the limb with bands so soft, and yet so strong, that the gash has closed never to open again. So speedy and so sure is His surgery that the broken heart has begun to sing as soon as He has touched it. Do it again, great Master; do it at this very hour. Say, poor sinner, "Lord, do it unto me." He can heal when all others have failed. He can heal you now.

Another brokenness of heart is felt by those who regard themselves as outcasts. Few of you have ever felt that dreadful weight upon the soul, as dreaded as a millstone about the neck. The woman whose sin may not be in God's sight more gross than that of others is yet regarded by society as utterly fallen and defiled, a thing to be flung from hand to hand, and cast on the dunghill as a faded flower. Words cannot describe the shudder which passes over the mind of one betrayed and deceived when she perceives that she is henceforth numbered with castaways.

A like thing happens to the man who has been guilty of embezzlement, or some other form of dishonesty. He is found out, prosecuted by his employer, set before the court, and sent to prison to be henceforth a branded criminal. Ah me! How dreadful must be the waking up on the first morning in a prison cell. He who was once courted will henceforth be shunned: he is a broken man without a character, marked by all as an offcast. Ah, poor man, poor woman, Jesus receives sinners such as you.

"That Christ will receive him no sinner need fear.
The poorer the wretch the welcomer here;
Though you may be outcast and banished afar,
Your welcome is certain, come just as you are."

Another brokenness of heart is that of utter helplessness, in which a man feels that he is too feeble to fight the battle of life. He is not only given up by others, but he has given himself up. He floats like a deserted vessel, derelict, water logged, abandoned. Sin has beset him, he has given way to temptations, and now Satan binds him fast. Perhaps he has backslidden from the profession of religion and brought great dishonor upon the name of Christ, and now he cries, "My last end will be worse than the first. I have crucified the Lord afresh, and shall die in my sins. I neglected the means of grace, I became slack in prayer, I turned my face away from God, and now He has left me, and I cannot get back again." Alas, for men who are bound with such fetters; the iron enters into their souls.

My gracious Lord Jesus Christ comes to you, backsliders, who are filled with your own ways, who labor and are heavy laden with the fear that you are cast away forever, and he says, "Return, ye backsliding children." He will help you to return. He will draw you and you shall run to Him. The love of Jesus has not changed; He loves even to the end. He will not cast away a soul that looks to Him. O taste and see that the Lord is good. Return to Him this morning. He will receive you graciously and love you freely, and you shall render to Him again the calves of your lips as once you used to do; for Jesus healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds.

Many are broken in heart because they are afflicted so heavily. When sickness first comes to our door and we are new to it, it is a very unwelcome guest. New pains are sharp, fresh griefs appear intolerable; for as yet the bullock is unaccustomed to the yoke. By-and-by we bear our woes more patiently, but at the first the man afflicted with a disease which he knows will bring him to his grave is sadly cast down; the man who sees business ebbing away, and foresees bankruptcy, and perhaps destitution, is crushed. Brother, if you receive Jesus Christ into your heart, He will ease you by teaching you a sweet submission to the divine will; He will tell you that "all things work together for good to them that love God;" He will explain to you the doctrine of providence; He will make you to consider the end of the Lord, for He is very pitiful even in His sharpest dispensations: and He will supply you with such strength of grace that you will be able to endure pain or poverty. Thus will He support you, till your heart shall become strong, and you shall bravely face the afflictions and conflicts of life.

Some are broken-hearted through

BEREAVEMENT.

One laments, "I have lost my wife." Another bemoans herself, "I have lost my husband;" or a third cries, "My mother is gone;" or a fourth with motherly tenderness mourns the dearest child that ever nestled in a woman's bosom. "Alas," cries each one, "I can never survive the stroke!" We have all endured sorrow, but bereavements are a sharp sword. Friends can do little to fill up the great gap which death has made. Ah, it is indeed an aching void which is left in an affectionate heart when the dear object of love is torn away. The best of people in this respect suffer most. Herein is comfort from Jesus. The blessed doctrine of the resurrection cheers the darkness of the sepulchre. Jesus says, "Thy brother shall rise again." The blessed thought of the eternal felicity of those that we fain would have detained below is a sweet recompense for their loss. We remember our Lord's prayer, "I will that they also whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am, that they may behold my glory."

Sometimes in prospect of losing our beloved ones we pull very hard earthward, and cry, "Father, I will that they be with me where I am." Did you ever feel a pull the other way, and start, and look to see who pulls heavenward. You watch and see that it is Jesus praying, "Father, I will that they be with me where I am." Whenever Christ and you come to cross purposes I know you will yield, for you will gladly own that the dear ones are more Christ's than yours. Let them go. Jesus, we can part with all for Thee. It is no parting, when we know that our beloved are with Thee. Thus doth Jesus, who Himself wept for Lazarus, heal broken hearts whose joy is buried with those they loved so well.

There are many other forms of this disease. I have known hearts to be thoroughly broken by desertion. One whom you loved and trusted proves false, and the early love of a true heart is broken like a potter's vessel. What desolation fills many a soul that once was blithe as the birds; for treachery wasteth like the scourge of war. Yet is there consolation; for He who had His Judas and bitterly cried, "He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me," and He knows how to bind up such a broken heart, for He becomes a friend that sticketh closer than a brother, and He makes us feel in the sweet tenderness and faithfulness of His divine companionship that we are not alone, for the Lord is with us. He is better unto us than ten friends.

I am certain that there is no form of broken heart present but what there is medicine for it in the Word of God, and in Jesus who is the word. The leaves of this tree are for the healing of nations. Christ Jesus brings a cure-all to those who are else incurable. In His dispensary there are remedies compounded by divinest art which will touch the heart and act upon it like a charm till it shall throb with pleasure as much as it now palpitates with anguish. This is no quackery. His is a scientific system of surgery which has borne the test of ages, and has been proved by the experience of countless sufferers to be infallible. Here we stand, ourselves, living witnesses of His skill. He hath bound us up, and we are now saved from heartache, and made to praise Him with our whole heart.

III. Our third theme is

and this is the central point of the text. Jesus saith, "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted." Observe, first, that this honored Physician gives personal attendance to the broken-hearted. He says, "He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted." The Lord hath sent Jesus Christ Himself because the task needs a divine hand. The Lord's servants without their Lord can do no more than the staff of Elisha did when Gehazi laid it upon the dead child, but there was neither voice nor hearing. The great Prophet Himself is coming, and wonders will be seen among us. He is here at this moment in His own proper person, and He will not fail in any case that is brought to Him. Many a great physician has so much practice that he is compelled to take a partner or an assistant, but my Lord is able to do all His work, and none can interfere in it. Jesus Himself personally, with His own pierced hands, continues to bind up the broken-hearted.

This Physician is fully qualified. He is called Christos, or Christ, which signifies anointed; "The Lord hath anointed me." I am sure that Jesus can cure broken hearts, because God has given Him the Spirit, even the Comforter, to rest upon Him without measure, that His words may drop with the oil of comfort. O, trust Him now. He has all the fitness for His work that God can give Him. He is complete, and we are complete in Him. The good Samaritan poured in oil and wine; but here is heavenly oil in the hands of one who is Himself the health of our countenance.

As if this were not enough, notice that our Lord is commissioned. "He has sent me," He says. First, "anointed me;" then, "sent me." Our Lord said to the blind man, Go and wash in the Pool of Siloam, which is, being interpreted, sent. How I wish that you who are broken-hearted would go and wash in this pool, and find comfort in the blessed fact that the anointed is sent of God to you. The Great Father thought so much of you that He sent a special messenger to heal you; yea, sent the best one there was in heaven, to be a Missionary to you. No other was fit to be second to Him; but God emptied heaven of its superlative glory and sent His own Son down below that He might bind up broken hearts.

I cannot imagine a failure of this Messiah—the sent One. This is the Shiloh for whose salvation Jacob waited, looking for Him who should be sent. This is the Apostle, or sent One of our profession, sent on purpose that He might comfort all the heirs of sorrow. Jesus is carrying on a mission, a mission for the desolate. Observe, then, his qualifications and his commission. He bears a diploma of the highest value. He is surgeon in ordinary to all bleeding hearts; O that you would put your mournful cases into His hands.

Remember also what He is in person and character, and I think you will at once say, "I will submit my broken heart to Him, that He may heal me." For Jesus, your Physician, is one who knows heart-break by having felt it. He said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death." I will tell you one of the most terrible tormentors in the world, excelling even an Inquisitor, it is an unfeeling comforter. Save me from a man who comes to console me wearing a face of marble and a heart of stone. His words put grit into your wounds, or what if I say—salt? Job knew this dreadful affliction. Look, then, at the reverse of the picture: the surest comforter is one who is touched with a feeling of our infirmity, seeing He was tempted in all points like as we are.

"No," says the broken heart, "Christ never knew my pain." Ah, but He did. What is it? That you have been slandered? Jesus cries, "Reproach hath broken my heart." Is it that you are forsaken by friends? Is it not written, "Then all the disciples forsook Him and fled?" Is it that you are forsaken by God? Did not Jesus cry, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" Is it that your cup is bitter? Did He not pray thrice that the cup might pass from Him, and still the cup was not removed? He leads you through no darker rooms than He went through before, and in all He is so tenderly sympathetic with you that He is the best Physician you can desire.

O that you knew my Master. If you had seen Him as my broken heart saw Him on my first spiritual birthday, when I heard the word that saith, "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth;" I say, if you had seen Him as I then saw Him you would have rushed to His feet for healing. I was at the ends of the earth: I thought I was ready to slip over the bounds altogether, and sink into the abyss; but in obedience to His command, I looked. It was the dim look of a half-blinded eye; I looked through my tears, but hardly hoped to see Him. Still I looked: I turned my eyes that way, and I resolved that if I were lost it should be lying at Jesus' feet. I believed He was able to save me, and I left myself with Him, and He has done great things for me, to which I cheerfully bear witness. He keeps on blessing me, and He will complete His work ere long. I know whom I have believed, and I rest in Him. O dear hearts that are breaking, I wish you would do as I did: I would to God the same grace would lead you at once to fall at my Lord's feet.

If you must despair, despair yourself into Christ: I mean by that self-despair which is the next of kin to humble faith in Jesus drop into His hand. Faint upon Christ's bosom and lie there in happy helplessness. May the Lord disable you for anything else, and lead you to believe in His Anointed. God has sent you Jesus; will you not admit Him? He is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him. Come, then, at once and believe in Him whom God hath sent.

Boycotting an Irish Tradesman.

BOYCOTTING AN IRISH TRADESMAN.

BOYCOTTING is a word unknown to the dictionaries, but recent events have rendered its meaning very clear to all readers of newspapers. Its origin was in the course of treatment adopted by the Irish people toward Captain Boycott, an Irish farmer. He had rendered himself obnoxious to his poorer neighbors by an arrogant and oppressive demeanor. He was thoroughly disliked, and the Land League resolved on punishing him, and if possible driving him from his farm. The plan of operation was not unlike the ancient Roman Catholic weapon of excommunication. The people were warned against rendering him or his family any service, or of buying anything from him or selling anything to him. He was thus reduced to great straits, being forced to perform the laborious work of the farm without any aid other than that of his family. How he suffered this treatment, the devices he was forced to adopt to procure the common necessaries of life, and how at length a troop of soldiers was sent to protect the laborers from a distance who volunteered to help him gather the harvest, must be fresh in the recollection of our readers.

So effective was the persecution of Captain Boycott that the Land League, in their unscrupulous disregard of the right and justice every member of the community is entitled to from others, adopted the engine of persecution and extended its operations against other people who had fallen under their displeasure. Thus the verb "to Boycott" became incorporated in the language, and is freely used and well understood on this side the Atlantic, where some of the trades unions have tried its effects on the employers.

Our illustrations represent the process of Boycotting an Irish tradesman who had disobeyed the tyrannical commands of the League, and who was thus publicly proclaimed an enemy of the League. The efforts of Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues may possibly by removing some of the most intolerable of the grievances of the people, obtain a truce in this social war, but it is little likely that there will be permanent peace while the moral, educational and religious condition of the people remains in its present state.

"Jimmy," another boy who works at the stables here, and who looks most unhappy, has been lately out of work for some weeks. Seeing him looking so miserable I could not help saying to him, "Don't you feel well, Jimmy?" "No, Missus H—," he replied quietly. "What makes you so unhappy? have you done something wrong at home?" "No, Missus H—, only I'se been out o' work, and they won't let me go home only to sleep. I 'as to find my grub; I shan't have it there."

As already mentioned, we have, besides several of these more or less homeless and destitute lads, others attending our classes who are in more fortunate circumstances, living at home and engaged as butcher-boys, costermongers, stable-boys, horse-cleaners, etc. But I can say of every one of them that they have to work and mix with boys and men who are of the lowest class of society, most of whom spend their lives with horses at the stables when at work, or in the public-house for pleasure and amusement; and I feel that each lad who comes to us is entitled not only to pity and kindness, but to an earnest endeavor to help him. I have tried to get several of the most helpless into homes or into the navy, but after spending a good deal of time and trouble I have always had to give it up, finding it impracticable to comply with the regulations laid down, in consequence of the peculiar circumstances and difficulties of these lads' cases. So I have gone on trying to do for the most needy what little I could myself, by taking a general interest in them, and sheltering them from the streets for a few hours every evening.

In carrying on the meetings we had many difficulties at first, and some of them of a trying kind. One of the greatest is that these youths vary so much in temper from one time to another. A lad who may be one evening as good and as quiet as a lamb may be very different the next.

The reader may ere this have wondered how it has been possible to carry on a work of this sort in a private house without inconvenience to the domestic arrangements and to neighbors. There is a difficulty about this. At first, my intention was simply to show kindness to a few destitute and helpless lads, and no material inconvenience arose. But now that the allotted room has become a regular meeting-place, and the members who attend are increasing in numbers, although without any effort on my part to attract a large number, inconvenience has been felt in more ways than one

The principal difficulties, however, are owing to the room being too small for such a work. My aim is to keep these lads from the streets, from the public-houses, and from the common lodging-houses. If they and their fellows have no other place to go to in the evenings, what can they do but go to the public house, or hang about the streets, to see and hear what they ought not to see and hear, and to meet with bad men and women whose example would lead them to ruin?

Then again, as regards the lads who sleep at the common lodging-houses, it is very sad to think that they have to go there; the description of these places, given by those who frequent them, and my own experience of a visit to one of them, have made me wish earnestly to have a place where I could offer these lads clean beds and a ventilated room. Apart from the fact that sleeping in such places must be injurious to their health, they have to associate there with the moral dregs of society—thieves of all ages, and men and women of the lowest character; and yet these lads have a wish to do what is right.

Through the kindness of some friends we were able to distribute free soup twice a week during the severe winter weather to the most destitute of the lads and to some workingmen out of employment. At these meetings a few words of Scripture are read, a short address is given, and a few hymns are sung. I have been much gratified to find that several who attend seem to enjoy, not only the soup, but the short meetings held afterward.

Poor lads! How I pity them! Although often very wicked and very trying to deal with, yet what suffering they have to bear in many ways! They simply live and suffer; for their lot is cast among the lowest. Is it not for such as these that the sweet comforts of the Gospel were intended? Is it not of such as these that Jesus calls, 'Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden?" Let us help them—they are to be found in almost every part of this great city. Let us shelter them and give our smiles to them. Who knows but we may win them to Jesus, and so life eternal with Him in glory?

The Child and the Austrian Cavalry.

THE CHILD AND THE AUSTRIAN CAVALRY.

THE following incident occurred during a general review of the Austrian cavalry, not long ago. Not far off some thousands of cavalry were in line. A little child, a girl of not more than four years, standing in the front row of the spectators, from some cause rushed out into the open field just as the squadron of hussars came sweeping around from the main body. They made a detour for the purpose of saluting the Empress, whose carriage was drawn up on that part of the parade-ground. Down came the squadron at a mad galop.

Directly under the feet of the horse was the little one—another instant must seal its doom—when a stalwart hussar, who was in the front line, without slackening his speed or losing his hold, threw himself over by the side of his horse's neck, seized and lifted the child, and placed it in safety upon his saddle-bow; and this he did without changing his pace or breaking the correct alignment of the squadron. Ten thousand voices hailed with rapturous applause the gallant deed, and other thousands applauded when they knew. Two women there were who could only sob forth their gratitude in broken accents—the mother and the Empress—and a proud and happy moment it must have been for the hussar when his Emperor, taking from his own breast the richly enamelled Cross of the Order of Maria Theresa, hung it upon the breast of his brave and gallant trooper.

The reward thus obtained may well remind us of that infinitely higher reward, which is held out to all those who seek to rescue their fellows from spiritual danger. "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever."

A FATAL BULLET OPENING THE DOOR OF LIFE.

MAJOR EVERED POOLE, speaking at the Army Scripture Readers' Meeting at Mildmay Conference Hall, London, read some extracts from several letters, which a young soldier, George Stunt, had written, who was afterward killed in the Ingogo campaign. "I praise God and our Lord Jesus Christ," he wrote, "that I can testify this day that the Spirit of our God beareth witness with my spirit that I am His child, and that my soul is greatly refreshed by His Spirit. I have been greatly refreshed by the coming of our Saviour. When I think of how Jesus suffered for me, and how I have mocked Him and despised Him and His dear servants, how I hate and loathe myself. What amazing love and mercy to such a hell-deserving wretch as I was! My faint heart cannot find words to utter His praise. And, blessed be God, nothing can separate us from the love of Jesus. I have had sore struggles with Apollyon; but, praise God! I have come off victorious, through Him who loved me and gave Himself for me.

"It grieves me to see the sin around me. How I hate it! I have prayed in agony of soul for my poor comrades, but they count me their enemy because I do not countenance their sin. I pray for that love to sinners which Jesus had; I do not want to be guilty of the blood of souls. I have great difficulty at times in doing my duty, having every one opposed to me. I get hooted at all over the place as a 'sneak' and a 'hypocrite.' If it were not for Jesus what should I do? It is Jesus, Jesus only, who sustains me. I feel sometimes that my heart will break; then it is that I feel Jesus so precious to me. The Great Physician binds my heart up and comforts me, and I am able then to pray for my persecutors. I have learned what the world's friendship is, how shallow and deceitful. There is no real friendship out of Christ."

With the prospect of death and battle before him, six days before the engagement at Laing's Nek the young soldier wrote to the Scripture Reader: "'Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life.' What a glorious promise! May we both obtain it, dear father! Tomorrow I think we are to advance to commence the attack on the Boers. Pray for us that we may be kept faithful. I go trusting in Him who is able to keep me. Many Christian brethren came to bid us farewell as I left Pietermaritzburg. How could I feel dull accompanied by the prayers and good-wishes of so many of God's dear children? What an honor and a privilege to be among such! This is my last testimony, if I am not spared to write again, 'Jesus is mine and I am His.'"

On January 18th came the memorable engagement at Laing's Nek and George Stunt escaped unhurt. On February 9th the Boers determined to cross the Ingogo River; and with a quiet trust in God George Stunt joined the attacking force and marched forward. The engagement lasted for more than five hours, and at the close among the heaps of dead on that fatal field was found the body of the brave soldier. He had been shot dead. George's faithful friend, the Reader, with deep grief had to see the name of the young soldier who always when writing to him subscribed himself "Your affectionate son in the faith" among the list of "killed" after the Ingogo engagement. The Reader wrote to Major Poole. The bullet that shot him opened the gate of heaven to him.

CONVERSION OF A ROYAL MARINE.

AT one of Miss Daniell's visits to the Soldiers' Institute, Plymouth, in May, 1874, the first-fruits of what has since proved a most abundant harvest, were gathered in. One evening the little library was visited by a man of the Royal Marines. He looked thoughtful and sad. He was found to be in an anxious state of mind. Feeling the burden of sin, and dissatisfied with all his attempts at reformation, he yet could not appropriate to himself the finished work that the Lord Jesus Christ had wrought out for him. Day by day he grew more restless and uneasy, till his agony of mind became almost unendurable, and he wandered about for miles in his wretchedness. Again and again he was told of the Lord's readiness to receive him, and how much he grieved Him by doubting Him. At last, after praying with him, Miss Daniell said:

"Now will you kneel down here by yourself, and just go to Christ with all your sin and all your unworthiness, and believe that when you go He receives and pardons you at once?" Very quietly he agreed to this, and he was left alone. A few minutes afterward Miss Daniell returned, and found the whole expression of his face changed. Though the tears were falling, yet the despair and wretchedness were all gone, and it was radiant with his newly-born joy. All he could say was, "Oh, miss! why could I never see it before? How blind I've been! Now I know it's all done for me, and I'm saved!" He is still living in the joy of divine assurance and forgiveness and peace, kept by the mighty power of God, and anxious to do anything he can to help in the work.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

The Morals of Dinner Customs — Woman's Rights—The Improvement in the Men—A Proposal to Shorten the Church Service—An Entertainment at Ferncroft.

WHILE Etta was hurrying home to get at least half an hour in the family circle usually assembled at that time, she thought of her friend Lady Isabel. She knew that she was away from home just then, paying one or two visits to relatives of her own and her husband's. But she did not know that, at that particular moment, Lady Isabel was seated at a large fireside gathering composed of miscellaneous persons all united more or less at least on one point, viz., the propriety of social intercourse at the close of an afternoon, and before rallying for the still more dazzling function of dinner.

Strange that meals, once so pristinely simple, should in our day have assumed proportions of such severe magnitude! While dress, art, ornament, manners and customs, are alike striving to struggle back two hundred years in the era of civilization, would that dinners, luncheons, and teas could be persuaded to join their backward path! How much time and money, weariness, gossip, and folly might we all be saved were it only so! Public opinion! be evoked on our behalf, and we will render to you a greater meed of heartfelt homage than we have ever laid at your feet before.

But to return to the low chairs and the ornamental tea table.

Lady Isabel attracts the notice of two clever-looking ladies sitting near her, and to her their next remarks are addressed.

"I suppose you approve of Woman's Rights!" they say to her.

"Oh no!" says Lady Isabel, shrinking back, and thinking as she does so, "Are those their colors?"

One of them rather abruptly remarks:

"Oh indeed! I should have thought you would certainly have upheld the cause!"

"Yes, that is a surprise!" says the taller one. "It seems very inconsistent!"

Lady Isabel's eyes are opened rather wider than usual, as she says:

"Inconsistent! I do not think I quite understand you. You were talking of 'Woman's Rights,' were you not?"

"Just so," is the reply, followed by a smile.

The other sister explains.

"Don't you hold forth to men, and women, too, and harangue them on their various duties? So we have been informed at least, though, never having been in your part of the country, we only know it on hearsay."

Poor Lady Isabel's complexion heightens, and her eyes unwontedly fill. She hesitates, while the surrounding ladies rustle their dresses indignantly. Happily, before the short sister can be abetted by her taller counterpart, Lady Isabel is able to hold her own.

In the gentlest of voices she says:

"I don't think I harangue! At any rate, I hope not; I only talk with the men and women—who like to come and see me—very quietly, and tell them about the love of Jesus."

The "Woman's Rights" ladies seem to get rather a shock to their inner systems at the sudden and unexpected mention of that Name, to which they are evidently not accustomed. Rallying from their slight recoil, however, they argue:

"That is not the point! Whether the subject be religion, morality, education, or politics, you teach the men You hold forth to them; and, in fact, you assume the position of dictator. Not that we consider there is any harm in that—on the contrary, we approve. But such a line of proceeding simply proves that you consider the other sex on an equality with yourself, or beneath you. You take the superior position, that is all."

"You quite mistake me," is Lady Isabel's unruffled reply, spoken so softly that the other members of the group involuntarily lean forward to hear the solution of a mystery that had already interested them, and now has fully arrested their attention.

"I do not go as a 'dictator' or as a superior among the people," Lady Isabel continues. "On the contrary, when I read and talk with them, either individually or collectively, I do so as their servant! They have not been accustomed to read the Bible very much, and many of them do not pray. So, at their own request—at their bidding, I may say—I try to help them. I assure you that if I were to assume any other attitude than this, I should miss my aim. I should have no influence with them at all. Indeed, they would not listen to me!

"I am quite certain of this," she added, seeing many attentive glances fixed on her. "The only way for a woman to work is to take the second, or lowest, place. Then she wins her way. Gentleness is her power, and the only one she has any right to assert."

"Hear, hear!" say one or two of three gentlemen who have drawn near to hear the discussion.

"Oh! of course you think so!" says one of the "Woman's Rights" advocates. "You will have all the men on your side, Lady Isabel, if you assume a position like that!"

"So I do," said Lady Isabel simply.

"You do? I should think that part of the argument was true enough," says one of the gentlemen.

"Yes, I do," Lady Isabel answers; "from my husband downward. And as for these poor fellows that drink and swear and lead miserable lives that is all I want, or how could I ever win them?"

"Well, that's capital! Bravo!" said different masculine members of the tea-party, while smiling nods and whispered, as well as vocal, assents testified that to the community present Lady Isabel had won her laurels in the argument.

Yes! It was quite true. Hal and his friends delighted in taking advantage of the various opportunities permitted them for hearing of their Saviour, and receiving into their hearts the simple truths from His Word, which were gradually proving the very life of their souls, and without which they were constantly saying to one another, "How could they have ever lived before?"

Poor fellows! Numbers of them were certainly living a new life now! and continually they were bringing in fresh guests to the prayer-meetings, the Bible-classes, the Sunday evening readings, and the temperance gatherings. Each fresh comer again, would draw in men and women from his circle of acquaintances; and thus the coffee-house and its entourage prospered, and its number of supporters ever increased. Deeply encouraging it was to Lady Isabel and her laborious coadjutors, to see the enthusiastic sympathy manifested persistently by the working classes of Thornham, as well as by its tradespeople, in her earnest efforts.

Even the vicar would say occasionally, "I can't say it is doing any harm! so I suppose it is doing good!"

And this was a great deal from him, as he did not ordinarily admire novelties of any kind, that sprung up outside the walls of his own church and school. Inside these walls he was not so unwilling to admit varieties, as some of his parishioners would have wished.

"Do these newly-respectable men go regularly to church?" the brewer's wife asked rather sceptically one day.

"Yes, many of them do. Several were at the communion last Sunday. And many more would be there were the service simpler and shorter, more earnest too, and, in fact, more like the gatherings held by our Saviour and the apostles," was the answer.

"How dreadful!" said Mrs. Hodges. "Do you know that is almost heresy? Then do you disapprove of the Church service?"

Disapprove of the Church service! said Lady Isabel. "Oh no! I only say that without many of its more recent and artistic additions, and shortened to one hour, accompanied by very earnest, simple, spiritual sermons, which every one could understand, it would be far more largely attended by the masses of the population, and much more extensively blessed to their good."

"Oh! I understand," said Mrs. Hodges. "You would wish modifications introduced—"

"By lay—or lady—advisers!" chimed in Mr. Hodges, as he drew on his gloves, in preparation for a departure.

"You must not think I am saying anything under the rose!" said Lady Isabel. "I have often chatted this over with our vicar. He knows that I think that if there were less appeal to the human senses, and far stronger appeal to the souls of the people, by presenting Christ to them, our dear old church in Thornham would be a much greater power in the place than it is. I am sure he agrees with me, too; for he has never denied it yet."

"Though she looks so gentle, she is very immovable," said the brewer's wife, as they took their places in the carriage that was so well known in the neighborhood of Thornham, and that had so irritated poor Hal in his drinking days. Now he never saw it but to lift up his heart in prayer to his God, that "Muster and Missus Hodges might be changed, and converted, and made quite different, just like the men."

For it never entered his simple soul, for one moment, that if their heart principles were altered by the entrance of grace, pure and perfect, they could continue dealing out the destructive liquor to their neighbors, and thereby making themselves rich! Such an idea was beyond his comprehension; and no doubt he was right; and that, if those renewing influences had passed over the man and his wife, who owned those little public-houses and all their contents, Thornham would have been as near a state of Paradise, as it would have been possible to conceive in the condition of an English town.

Glance from the gay carriage and its complacent occupants to the humbler precincts of Ferncroft. As they conclude their drive at the handsome stone porch, Mrs. Clemence is standing with a very grave, though benevolent, expression on her face in the "little room" beside her hall door.

This was the night she had set apart lately for the instruction of two or three very rough boys who had attracted her attention lately by throwing stones and shouting verly loudly outside the Ferncroft gate. With one of her usual kind impulses she had gone out to the gate and asked them they would like to have some flowers.

You could not shape Mrs. Clemence into mould. She did things in her own way, and thus she succeeded in accomplishing most that she undertook. But had you tried to shape her into cut-and-dried performances, she could not have managed them. Signal failure would have been the result. Like David before Saul she would have said—or might have, for it would have been true—"I cannot go in these (new articles of armor), for I have not proved them." With the simple weapon to which she had been long used, she was marvellously skilful and generally victorious.

So it was proved on this occasion. Open-mouthed, the boys were too much taken aback to say anything but "Yes!"

And they were then ushered into the garden labyrinths of roses, clematis, and creeping wester that festooned itself about the housewalls and eve drooped over some of the slender iron archwa that bridged the gravel paths.

Their amazement was depicted plainly enough their candid faces.

"My!" was the only expression that their li formed. Involuntarily they tried to smooth th hair from their foreheads, and for one moment least to look less like elements out of place in t new-found paradise.

As Mrs. Clemence went from bed to bed, pic ing her treasured beauties for them, they sto stock still, admiration in their attitude, watchi her movements, listening to a perfect chorus birds, and generally wondering that such love ness should have been so close beside them and unknown.

As each of the boys was presented with a sm bouquet, she said to them:

"Where do you work?"

"At the distillery," was the answer of m than one.

"And do you live close by?" she continued.

"Down at t'other end of Shenstone," they replied.

"I suppose you are too big to go to any schools or classes!" she suggested smilingly.

"Don't have much time for that kind of thing," said one of the lads. "It's pretty hard work down at our place."

"Do you like reading stories?" she next inquired.

"Wars!" said one.

The others looked amused.

"I likes about 'Meriky," said another; "'cause my brother's gone there."

"Oh, then you can read quite well?" said Mrs. Clemence.

"No! not so very well," was the reply.

And then they looked at one another, until at last the secret came out.

"One-legged John tells us lots about it, and Woppy too."

"Where do you hear them?"

But no answer came to this question (because these recountals usually took place at a drinking saloon especially used by boys), and the group began to shuffle toward the gate.

"Now, boys!" said Mrs. Clemence, "would you like me to read you a story about America and about the wars!"

"Shouldn't mind!" was the answer.

"If you will come and see me to-morrow evening, you shall have a story and see some pictures," said Mrs. Clemence as they departed, flowers in hand.

MOSES AND AARON.

S. S. Lesson for July 24. Ex. 4:27-31; 5:1-9. Golden Text, Ps. 105:26. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Moses had not yet ceased to look upon himself, and he fell into the sin of flatly contradicting God. The Lord had assured him that when he went unto the children of Israel, they should hearken to his voice, and yet he said, "But, behold, they will not believe me, nor hearken unto my voice: for they will say, The Lord hath not appeared unto thee." Looking at his past experience of the people, and at his own conscious weakness, there was nothing else to expect; but Moses had yet to learn that wherever God sends His messengers He makes a way for them through every obstacle; whenever He speaks a word, He makes Himself responsible for the fulfilment of that word. We have no right to think whether a thing is possible or impossible, probable or improbable; when once the Lord has said it, it must and it shall be.

God's patience was not yet exhausted, and He gave Moses two signs which He allowed even then to take place, that His servant's faith might be strengthened. Still Moses shrank back from the Lord's call, and continued to make difficulties; O my Lord, he said, I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor since Thou hast spoken unto Thy servant; but I am of a slow speech and of a slow tongue. Still looking to himself, still considering his own capacity! O did he think then that his eloquence was to do the work of God? There was more of pride than of humility in his spirit. Yet God continued patient, "Who hath made man's mouth? or who maketh the dumb, or deaf, or the seeing, or the blind? have not I the Lord? In His fatherly love, God sought to draw His servant's thoughts away from himself, and to occupy him with God. But he continued still to look on self and answered, "O my Lord, send, I pray Thee, by the hand of him whom Thou wilt send."

It was in anger against Moses, in just indignation that he should carry his distrust of God so far, that God gave to Moses Aaron his brother to be spokesman for him. Had Moses fully trusted God perhaps the awful sin of the golden calf which Aaron afterward made would never have been perpetrated. Was Moses more obstinate and unbelieving than are God's instruments in this day? more so than you, dear reader, more so than me? He has called us to preach the Gospel "to every creature," to cast out devils, to heal the sick. What are we doing? The most of God's children shift their responsibility to preach the Gospel on to the shoulders of ministers or missionaries, and they explain away the command to heal: is this less guilty than the conduct of Moses? When a Christian says, "It is not my calling to do anything in that open kind of way; I can serve God quietly, I have no gift for speaking to people about their souls:" is this less guilty than Moses was when he said, "O Lord, I am not eloquent," and God was angry?

Yet how tender was God! In spite of Moses' obstinacy and his continued reluctance, the Lord was gracious to him and made his way so blessedly. When he went to his father-in-law, and spoke of returning into Egypt, although it would be a personal loss to Jethro if he went, and although he must part with his daughter Zipporah, yet Jethro only said, "Go in peace." Although generally "a man's foes shall be they of his own household" (Matt. 10:36), yet God is He who "maketh men to be of one mind in an house;" and when we commit the unconverted or half-hearted members of our household into His hands that He may work out His will not ours, through them, He never allows them to be a real hinderance to us. Then God told Moses, in order to strengthen his courage, that all the men were dead who sought his life. So Moses returned to the land of Egypt with his small family. But there was yet one thing which was not in order, his son was uncircumcised, and before Moses could represent God to the people and to Pharaoh he must be obedient to all the will of God. It would seem that his wife had been the hinderance in this thing.

God helped Moses still further: he sent Aaron his brother to meet him, and there in the mount of God, alone and undistracted, Moses told Aaron "all the words of the Lord who had sent him, and all the signs which He had commanded him." Strengthened by his brother's presence, Moses then went and gathered together all the elders of the children of Israel, spoke the Lord's words and did the signs in the sight of all the people. His fears were not realized; but God's word was fulfilled, "The people believed: and when they heard that the Lord had visited the children of Israel, and that He had looked upon their affliction, then they bowed their heads and worshipped."

But just as surely as the word of God had been fulfilled in regard to the people, so must it be also in regard to Pharaoh; Moses and Aaron went in together unto Pharaoh and said, "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let My people go, that they may hold a feast unto Me in the wilderness." God had prepared Moses beforehand for Pharaoh's refusal; therefore they could not be astonished when the king replied, Who is the Lord, that I should obey His voice to let Israel go? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go." Had Pharaoh never heard of the time of famine when God sent His servant Joseph to save Egypt? Was it not one among the most remarkable facts in the history of the country, how then should this blasphemer say, "Who is the Lord that I should obey His voice?"

Now came the time of trial. Pharaoh accused them of false motives, "Wherefore do ye, Moses and Aaron, let the people from their works? get you unto your burdens." The same day a commandment went forth that the oppression of the people should be much augmented, the provision of straw for binding the clay in their brick-making was to be discontinued, but they must nevertheless turn out an equal amount of work. All seemed to be against them, the momentary hope seemed to vanish, and the people were scattered here and there to seek for straw, and when the work was exacted from the taskmasters and they appealed unto Pharaoh, he cast all the blame upon God's two messengers, and then the taskmasters in their bitterness said unto Moses and Aaron, "The Lord look upon you and judge you;" they regarded God's servants as their greatest enemies instead of their true friends.

It is one of the hardest crosses which God's workers have to bear, and yet one of the most needful of all, when God's people mistrust their vocation, when that which God has sent them to do or to say apparently causes evil. Then they are shut up alone to God and to His Word; then they learn to be independent of man, and to "look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen," not at their success, but at the bare promises of God's Word, and to hold steadily on to them through blame, misconstruction, opposition, until God justifies His Word, and takes the matter into His own hands; it is by means such as these that He prepares His instrument. Moses came back in the bitter grief of his heart to God, and told out all his sorrow. It is touching to see that when he had to do with man Moses needed Aaron, but when he had to do with God he sought His face alone. With how many believers is it the case that they are bold enough in speaking to man, but they come more readily into God's presence when helped by the prayers of another; this is an unhealthy, unsatisfactory state of soul.

God gave Moses another revelation of Himself. The process of weaning him from himself was a long one before his eye was fully fixed on God, and all this time the deliverance of the people must wait. Now God reiterated His promise of deliverance with a strong hand, He repeated His newly-revealed name Jehovah, which Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had not known, spoke of the covenant which He had made with the people to give them the land of Canaan, and sent Moses to speak unto them and tell them of their coming deliverance. But they were not in a state to receive the message, their increased oppression was an actual fact—"they hearkened not unto Moses for anguish of spirit and for cruel bondage." O how often have we met with those who through the slavery of sin or from the terrible oppression of long continued, poignant, physical suffering were unable to listen to or understand the blessed tidings of Christ's redemption. All hope seemed to be at an end; God sent Moses again to Pharaoh—it seemed to be like a fool's errand; he said unto the Lord, "Behold the children of Israel (those who once have listened to me) have not hearkened unto me; how then shall Pharaoh hear me who am of uncircumcised lips?" The strain had reached its utmost limit; but salvation was at hand.

STORY OF AN INTENDED SELF-MURDERER.

Visiting Manchester in the beginning of 1874, Miss Daniell learnt the following from the husband of one of the workers in the great Lancashire city, himself among the fruits of the Manchester mission. We give the substance of the woman's own words: "My present husband is a liar and a drunkard, and oh, he is such a villain! He has led me such a life that I have often wondered how I am even now alive. My life has been such a burden to me that I often wished I was dead, and it was only the thought of what would become of my poor soul that kept me back from committing suicide long ago.

"One day I went to the town and purchased some poison. I brought it home, cleaned up the house, set everything in order, said my prayers, committed my soul, as I thought, to the keeping of the God who gave it, went to the table, took the bottle, poured the poison into a tea-cup, had it in my hand, going to raise it to my mouth and drink it, when a knock came to the door. I put down the cup and opened the door, thinking it might be some of the soldiers' wives come for something, and they would not detain me long. I covered the cup with a towel so that it might not be seen.

"Well, had an angel or some other supernatural being appeared to me at the time I could not have been more astonished. There was a lady at the door, and she said, 'May I come in, Mrs. C.?' I could not speak; I could not say no nor yes; but she did come in, and oh, thank God she did! She spoke to me just as if she knew what I was going to do, and how her words went home to my soul! After she prayed I thought really that she came direct from the throne of mercy to prevent me from committing that dark deed which would have hurled my soul for ever from the presence of its God and Saviour." She was plucked as a brand from the burning, gave herself to Christ, and finds unspeakable joy in His service.

The Irish Land Bill is Making but Slow Progress in the British House of Commons. Less than half the clauses had been passed on July 9th. The probability of its passing the House of Lords this session becomes therefore increasingly doubtful. The postponement of the question until the next session of Parliament is viewed with apprehension by all classes of society, as the suspense produced in Ireland, combined with the numerous evictions now taking place, may lead to a renewal of the disturbances in an aggravated form. The second day of the much-anticipated Mitchellstown evictions passed over quietly. There was the usual bursting in of doors and throwing out of furniture, while a company of constabulary formed in the farmyard. But the rent in every case was paid on the entry of the sheriffs, and the few peasants who assembled in the neighboring tenants' houses were dispersed without any trouble. From a safe distance they contented themselves with jeers and yells at the constabulary. The series of evictions in this vicinity is now complete, but the military will remain encamped in Lady Kingston's park for some time.

The Skirmishers, Whose Outrages in England O'Donovan Rossa so heartily indorsed, are repudiated in very emphatic terms by other Irish leaders, even by those who are avowedly Fenians. Mr. O'Leary, who is now in Paris, recently expressed his opinion on the subject in unequivocal terms. He said: "In my own name and in that of my friend Kickham, now in Ireland, and I might add in the names of Mr. Luby and Dr. Carroll in America—and of nearly all the nationalists, I say that I utterly abhor and repudiate what Rossa and his followers call the skirmishing policy. We mean to do our best now and hereafter to prepare for the eventual struggle with England, but we have not a word to say for the absurd attempts to blow up mansion houses, custom houses, post-offices, and public buildings. This sort of thing may serve to amuse Rossa's dupes in America and may help a few madmen in England to the gallows, but instead of even remotely tending to free Ireland it can and will too surely only help to prolong her slavery." Those who are contributing money to the skirmishing fund will do well to consider Mr. O'Leary's opinion.

Lefroy, the Man who is Suspected of Committing the murder in an English railroad car on June 27th, has been arrested. On July 7th the coroner's inquest into the death of the murdered man concluded with a verdict of wilful murder against Lefroy, and a reward of £200 was offered for his apprehension. During the day information was conveyed to the police which induced them to visit a house in East London, where a person resembling Lefroy had been lodging during the past week. The inspectors visited the house and immediately recognized the suspected murderer. As soon as the officers entered the room Lefroy said, "I expected you." On being informed that he was charged with the murder of Mr. Gold, Lefroy replied, "I am not guilty." He had shaved off his whiskers and cut his hair, and although he denies all knowledge of the crime, his flight, concealment, and attempt to disguise himself really amount to a plea of guilty. He took his arrest yesterday very coolly, but this morning he was rather depressed and frightened at the menacing attitude of the mob at the railway station.

A Thrilling Narrative of an Escape from Siberia is published in an English journal. The escaped convict is named Mokrievitch. He is about thirty-three years of age, the son of a country gentleman and highly educated. In January, 1879, Mokrievitch being captured, was sentenced by a court martial to fourteen years' penal servitude in Siberia. In July following he and some other State convicts set out on their long journey for Oust Kara, where they had to undergo their sentences. They travelled part of the way via Nijni Novgorod, by railway, steamboat, and on horseback. The remainder of the journey (1450 miles) had to be done on foot and in chains.

On November 13th, 1879, a few days after leaving Irkoutsk for Balaganask—his final destination—M. Mokrievitch eluded his captors. As soon as his flight was discovered a number of Bouryats, half savage Mongol horsemen, as keen as sleuth-hounds and as cunning as Red Indians, were sent after him, but he succeeded in evading their pursuit and reaching Irkoutsk. To avoid recapture, which, had he gone west would have been almost certain, he made off toward the Chinese frontier, and after a walk of 700 miles in the depth of a Siberian winter he doubled back in the direction of European Russia, which he reached after a journey of 4000 miles, performed mostly on foot. He underwent terrible hardships, but eventually succeeded in getting safely out of the country, and a few days ago reached Switzerland. Except Wiotrowsky, in the last century, M. Dabagoria Mokrievitch is the only State prisoner condemned to hard labor that ever escaped from Siberia.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the Infidel Member of the British House of Commons, has applied to Mr. Gladstone for assistance to enable him to take his seat. Mr. Gladstone informed him that the Cabinet had decided not to proceed further with the Parliamentary Oaths bill at this session of Parliament. He has now written to the Speaker of the House of Commons, stating that he disregards the order of the House expelling him as illegal, and that he will therefore again present himself at the table of the House to take the oath. In the House of Commons the Speaker informed the House that he had given orders to have its resolution observed, which was that Mr. Bradlaugh be excluded from the precincts of the House until he promised to not further disturb its proceedings.

The Eastern Question in Europe is Once more revived by the French policy in Northern Africa. The rumors in circulation two weeks ago of an intended attack by that Power on Tripoli are confirmed. A Paris despatch to the London Times says: "The French Consul at Tripoli has begun the same kind of agitation as that with which M. Roustan forced the Tunis expedition on France, but Tripoli is really a Turkish province, and cannot be touched without provoking the intervention of Europe." The Pall Mall Gazette in a leading article on the attitude of France says: "The situation in Northern Africa is very serious. There are points in the Sultan's African dominions to threaten which would compel England to enter the field. The interests of France and England would be best served by making that fact clearly understood on both sides of the Channel." The relations between France and Turkey are strained to the utmost extent. The Sultan declared that he would never again receive M. Tissot, the French Ambassador at Constantinople, and M. Tissot sent as a reply that the Sultan might possibly learn some day what it costs to insult a great country in the person of its representative.

A Tunnel Between England and France has often been suggested, but those who have had the temerity to hint at such a thing have been regarded by many as the victims of a distempered imagination, or of one of the midsummer night dreams of engineers; but such a scheme is now fast approaching the stage of realization. Already a trial shaft has been sunk about a quarter of a mile on either side of the Straits of Dover, and this may be carried through to meet in the middle in about five years. As soon as the borings have been tested in this way as sound and watertight the enlarging of this small tunnel is merely a question of capital, which is expected to be forthcoming when it has been thus demonstrated that there is no fault in the chalk from end to end. The London Times, a few days ago, expressed grave apprehensions that the tunnel would be used for the conveyance of troops in the event of an invasion of England in case of war.

The International Monetary Conference finally adjourned on July 8th. The members before separating unanimously adopted a resolution proposed by the French and American delegates expressing a desire that negotiations should be opened between the states which participated in the conference and that the conference be summoned to meet on April 12, 1882, to settle the details of a monetary convention, which, it was hoped, would soon be concluded. The Americans in Paris are unanimous in thinking that the results of the conference are satisfactory. Mr. Thurman expressed the conviction that the offers of England and Germany would not warrant the United States in allowing the free coinage of silver. "The United States," he said, "did not insist on immediate and unqualified bimetallism, but were ready to accept approaches thereto, believing it would eventually prevail; but they could not incur the risk of alternating the standard through the conflicting or unharmonious action of other States."

The Jews and Spain.—In the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, the Jews, after suffering dreadful persecutions at the hands of the Inquisition, were driven, to the number of 160,000, from the country, and since then Spain has held the peculiar position among Christian nations of having no Jewish population. King Alfonso has now, however, issued a decree allowing Jews to return to Spain. This decree originated in a communication from Constantinople pointing out that sixty thousand Jews have recently taken refuge in Turkey from the persecution in Russia and the adjoining States, and hinting that many desired to return to the homes of their ancestors in Spain.

A Scapegoat.—During the last Illness of the late Maharajah of Travancore, a ceremony was performed like the Jewish institution of the scapegoat. A man was found willing, on being paid a sum equivalent to five thousand dollars, to bear the responsibilities of the Maharajah's sins. He was brought into the royal presence, and after the Brahmins had performed certain ceremonies over him, the sick man tenderly embraced him. He was then led out of the country of Travancore into the Tinnevelly district, with a charge never to return. This man performed a sham service for money, but we rejoice to know that a real release from our sins was gained for us by Christ who has become the scapegoat to bear our sins without money and without price.

A Silent Burial, the First of its kind that has ever taken place in Great Britain, was performed at Sheffield on May 3d. The deceased having been deaf and dumb, and all the twelve mourners being afflicted in a like manner, the funeral service was conducted entirely in sign language by the superintendent of the Sheffield Deaf and Dumb Association.

A Lady's Maid's Courage.—The Rev. G. Shaw mentioned at the All Day Conference recently held at Belfast, Ireland, by Messrs. Whittle and MacGranahan, that some years ago he knew a young lady of high social standing who was being dressed for a ball by her maid, who, recognizing the value of her young mistress's soul, risked her own dismissal from her service, by speaking to her about eternal things. The young lady went to the party, but convicted of sin, the dance had lost its charms. Her conversion soon followed, the love of Jesus swept out of her soul the love of the world, and a long life of Christian usefulness ensued; all this the result of a young girl recognizing the value of a soul.

A STRANGER witnessing the solemn and impressive gathering—the throng of mourning citizens, with grave and tear-stained faces, the ministers of the Gospel of all denominations, who crowded the First Presbyterian Church of Richmond, Va., on Sunday, October 24, 1880, and asked the cause of the unusual solemnity might have been appropriately answered in the words of David, "Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?" The occasion was the last obsequies of Rev. William S. Plumer, D.D., LL.D., the former pastor of the church, a man justly celebrated as a preacher, an author, and a professor, not only in the Southern States, where he was best known, but throughout the entire land. More than half a century had he labored in his Master's cause, and among those who assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to his memory, not a few owed to his instrumentality all they valued most highly for this world and the world to come.

Of the life and work of such a man it is fitting that every Christian should possess a knowledge as of "an ensample to the flock."

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

William Swan Plumer was born at Greersburgh, now known as Darlington, Pa., July 26, 1802. He traced his descent back through seven generations, to one Francis Plumer, who in colonial times emigrated from England and whose name appears among the early settlers of Newburyport, Mass. During his infancy a heavy trial fell on the Plumer household. The father became involved, as many good and generous men have done, in liabilities he had no share in contracting, and their discharge resulted in his financial ruin. Disregarding the proverbial advice not "to be of them who are sureties for debts" (Prov. 22 : 26), Mr. Plumer Senior, pledged his name and credit for another, and when the fulfilment of that pledge was required, all his possessions were swept away before it was met. But the surety made no effort to evade the claim, he gave up his all and went westward with his young family to found a new home. He stayed a short time in Ohio, and afterward removed to Kentucky. The struggle of commencing life again with a spirit broken by disaster, with failing health and advancing years those realize best who have witnessed such an effort, and all know to be very sore and bitter.

Only by the strictest frugality and most untiring industry could the Plumer household maintain itself free from debt. There were no idle hands in the family, and many years afterward when the boy William had become the Rev. W. S. Plumer, D.D., LL.D., he alluded to this period of his life in graphic words. "I have swung the axe," he said, "and grasped the grubbing hoe. I have handled the plough, the cradle, and the scythe. I have had to work till this stiffened arm bears proof of its severity; but all this is play—mere play—compared with the labors of a studious, diligent, and faithful pastor." But while he worked on the farm, he did not neglect the cultivation of his mind. Such books as he could beg or borrow in the village, he procured and eagerly perused, giving to study the hours of the evening, few enough for rest and recreation. By the time he had reached his fourteenth year he had acquired sufficient learning to teach a country school, and having obtained an appointment in Kanawha County, W. Va., he bade farewell to his father and the loved ones at home, and went out to battle with the world on his own account.

His journey to his new home was performed on foot. Arrived there he found among his pupils many who were older and larger than himself. One of his biographers writing of him in the Baltimore American recently, describes those early days, and recalls an incident which illustrates the decision and vigor which characterized him throughout his life. Young Plumer encountered at the outset of his career as a teacher an insubordinate pupil, but the first case of insubordination was the last. His firmness, his determination, and his undaunted courage floored the bully, and ever afterward his authority remained undisputed.

While in Kanawha County he became a member of the Presbyterian Church. He was then eighteen years of age. Many circumstances had been used by the Holy Spirit to impress his thoughtful mind and to direct his attention to spiritual concerns. From his early boyhood he had been the subject of religious impressions, which were deepened by a tragical occurrence in his own family. A near relative had been drowned in a swollen river, and a very impressive sermon was preached on the subject from the text, "Thou carriest them away as with a flood;" a sermon which the young man never forgot and to which he often referred in after years. A short time afterward a young man with whom he was acquainted died despairing and impenitent, and his deathbed scene profoundly affected the young man. These and other circumstances, combined with early religious training, led to his conversion and his open profession of religion.

His connection with the church led to increased Christian activity, and very soon those who worked with him recognized in their young colleague talents which fitted him for a higher sphere. He was counselled to devote himself entirely to ministerial work, and one or two wealthy friends offered him as a loan a sum of money sufficient to defray the expenses of a college education. The offer was accepted, and among the happiest hours of his after life, Dr. Plumer was accustomed to say, was that in which he was able to repay the advance so generously made and to feel himself a debtor no longer.

HIS COLLEGE EDUCATION

was commenced at Lewisburg, W. Va., and there for the first time he opened a Latin grammar. At Lewisburg he was under the care of the eminent John McElhenny, D.D., for whom throughout his after life he entertained feelings of profound veneration and gratitude. Hence he proceeded in 1822 to Washington College, now Washington and Lee University, in Lexington, Va., where he graduated in 1824. In order to complete his theological studies he entered himself a student at Princeton, where he spent two years, at the end of which period he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. Although several flattering invitations were sent to the young minister, offering him the pastoral charge of wealthy and influential churches, he felt called to devote himself to the work of which the Apostle Paul was the most eminent example (Romans 15 : 20). He therefore accepted a commission from the Philadelphia Presbytery as an evangelist in Virginia, North and South Carolina. He commenced operations at Warrenton, N. C., and there he established his first church.

While laboring at Warrenton he received other invitations, but clinging to the work of an evangelist he continued laboring at Warrenton until the cause had progressed sufficiently to be intrusted to other hands. Then he removed to Danville, Va., where, when he first went, he found only one Presbyterian in the neighborhood, but before he left he was the pastor over a thriving, vigorous church. Still bent on the work of a pioneer, he spent several years in evangelistic work through North Carolina, his longest period of service being that of one year at the Briery Church, Charlotte County, Pa. While laboring there he made the acquaintance of Mrs. Eliza Garden Hazel, of Hillsboro, N. C., whom he married, and who remained his faithful and devoted companion until, in 1878, death removed her from his side.

The year 1834 found him in charge of the First Presbyterian Church

AT RICHMOND,

Va., where he remained twelve years and three months, the longest period he ever spent in one sphere of labor. But even in this sphere the same spirit of energetic activity which had characterized him elsewhere was manifest, only in a different form. Before this he had accepted the indications of prosperity in a church as evidence that his work there was done, and having planted, he left the duty of watering to another. But at Richmond, when by his energy a new church was founded, he thought that his duty lay with his original church, and when he succeeded in obtaining for the new church the services of the earnest and eloquent Dr. Hoge, he left the work in his hands, confident it would be faithfully performed. The result justified Dr. Plumer's sagacity, Dr. Hoge has remained pastor of the church to the present time, and it fell to his lot to deliver the funeral discourse when nearly a year ago the remains of his beloved friend were committed to the dust.

Dr. Plumer's life at Richmond was one of ceaseless activity. Not only did he carefully prepare for his pulpit efforts, but as a Christian citizen and as a philanthropist he recognized his duties, which he strove to perform with conscientious care. It was mainly through his efforts that the institute for the deaf, dumb, and blind at Staunton, Va., was inaugurated, and he succeeded in establishing a Christian newspaper called "The Watchmen of the South," which, after undergoing various changes of name and management, is still regarded as the organ of the Southern Presbtyerian Church. While at Richmond he was selected by his ministerial brethren to represent them in opposition to trained lawyers, when the vexed question of the taxation of ministers was under the consideration of the Legislature of Virginia. So ably did he conduct his case, and such marvellous forensic skill did he display, that one who was opposed to him on that day, in relating its incidents said, "Though the whole bar of the State was arrayed against him he beat them all and was wrong besides." On the latter point there was naturally a difference of opinion, but there was no difference on the question of the position Dr. Plumer might have attained had he chosen to devote his talents to a worldly pursuit rather than to the service of his Master.

In 1847 the Franklin Street Presbyterian Church was built. A wide field of usefulness was opened in that city, and the earnest Christian men who had been active in the erection of the new church were anxiously considering the choice of a suitable man to occupy the pulpit. An invitation was sent to Dr. Plumer, whose character as an organizer and a worker was by this time well known throughout the churches. The prospect of doing in Baltimore a work similar to that he had been enabled to perform in Richmond and other places, was too congenial to be disregarded, and deeply to the regret of his church in Richmond the invitation was accepted. Here, as in his former spheres of labor, the blessing of God was upon him, and he was enabled in a short time to build up a church so strong that it could afford to send from its midst a colony of its most energetic members to organize a new church which was known as the Westminster Church.

Dr. Plumer remained at Baltimore until 1854, when the General Assembly, by a large majority, selected him to fill the responsible post of of Didactic and Pastoral Theology in the Western Theological Seminary, Alleghany, Pa. His work hitherto had been that of an evangelist, the father and founder of new churches; now he was to devote his time to the work of training young men for the work of filling the pulpits of such churches.

There was a fitness, a congruity in the change of occupation which indicate not only the development of Dr. Plumer's character, but the estimate the churches placed on the man and his labors. Soon after the commencement of his work at Alleghany, the University of Mississippi conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws; he had previously received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Washington College, Pennsylvania, Lafayette College, Pennsylvania, and Princeton College.

Some idea of the success which attended Dr. Plumer's labors as a professor may be gained from the fact that during the eight years he occupied the chair the number of students rose from fifty-six at the commencement of his term, to one hundred and sixty-eight at its conclusion. It was with deep regret on the part of Dr. Plumer that his connection with Alleghany terminated. The year 1862 was a trying one in all senses of the word.

May we never see such another year as that, and those that immediately followed. Dr. Plumer's sympathies were altogether with the Southern States, and his separation from his charge became a necessity.

From 1862 to 1866 he was actively employed preaching in various cities, and in literary labor. From 1865 to 1867 he labored at Pottsville, Pa. One who knew well both pastor and people writes of that period: "The church had been worn out by political preaching, and cheerfully took refuge under the doctrine of the Cross, which was the only gospel Dr. Plumer ever offered to his hearers."

In 1867 Dr. Plumer was called upon to resume the work for which he always entertained the greatest affection, that of training young men for the ministry. He was elected to the professorship of Didactic and Polemic Theology in the Theological Seminary of South Carolina. He promptly accepted the position and went to Columbia. He entered upon his duties there, filling that chair eight years, when he was transferred at his own request to the chair of Historic, Casuistic, and Pastoral Theology. Here as at Alleghany his labors were signally successful, and the number of students rapidly increased, while the financial position of the college materially improved. Nor did he neglect pastoral work while fulfilling the arduous duties of his office. His custom throughout his periods of professional work was to lecture every day of the week, and on Saturday to leave the college to render help to some sick brother or to preach in some vacant church. During his residence at Columbia he also accepted the position of agent of the Southern Relief Association, and personally investigated the applications for assistance and superintended the work of dispensing money and goods. When the seminary was closed Dr. Plumer was made Professor Emeritus with a salary of $1000 a year, and the Assembly cordially indorsed the action of the board.

In August of last year Dr. Plumer first became aware that he was the victim of the which ultimately proved fatal. He was told that by a difficult surgical operation there was a possibility of his life being prolonged, and though he was sixty-eight years of age he arranged to have it performed. On September 25th he underwent the ordeal, but although the operation was successful, other symptoms appeared which baffled surgical skill and on October 22d he passed away to his reward.

During his last illness, inexpressibly painful as it was, Dr. Plumer's friends have the gratification of knowing that he had throughout the support of the Master whom he had served so long and so faithfully. When near the close he said: "Jesus Christ has most lovingly died for me, and brought in a glorious and everlasting righteousness, which is infinitely well pleasing in His Father's sight. I trust Him—I trust Him only—I trust Him altogether—I trust Him forever. I wanted to give my testimony that the Gospel I have preached for so many years has not failed me in my hour of need. I did not want to die without giving my testimony on this bed that God is a faithful God." One of his latest utterances during a season of much suffering was: "One night in Jesus' bosom will be worth all this."

AS AN AUTHOR

Dr. Plumer was well known and of the good that has resulted from his works large and small it is impossible to form an estimate. It will be known only at the last day when "the books are opened, and another book is opened, which is the book of life." In addition to the larger works of which he was the author, such as "Studies in the Book of Psalms" and "Commentaries on the Epistles to the Romans and Hebrews," he published hundreds of tracts for the Presbyterian Board of Philadelphia, for the Methodist Book Concerns of Nashville and New York, for the American Tract Society, for the Board of Publication of the Protestant Reformed Dutch Church, for the Baptist Publication Society of Philadelphia, for the American Sunday School Union, and for the Presbyterian Committee of Publication of Richmond. Some of these works were republished in Europe. Others were translated into German, French, and Modern Greek. Of one of these tracts, that entitled "Don't put it off," above a million and a quarter copies have been circulated.

We may appropriately close this sketch of the distinguished laborer in the cause of Christ with the touching words in which Dr. Hoge spoke of him in his eloquent funeral discourse: "We cannot say of such a man that he is gone. He lives in his descendants, whom he might have addressed, in the parting hour, in the words of the old patriarch, 'Behold I die, but God shall be with you.' What more could he wish for them than the guidance, the protection, and blessing of the angel of the covenant? He lives in the truths he preached and in the examples of his long and laborious life. He lives in the writings which have fortified the faith and comforted the sorrows of countless readers. He lives in the labors of more than five hundred young ministers who were his pupils in the Theological Seminaries in which he taught, and who are now scattered all over the world—some of them in these States, some among the Indian tribes of the West, in Brazil, Siam, Japan, India, and China. He lives in the souls of those converted by these varied instrumentalities. 'They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever.'"

WALKING WITH GOD.

By the Rev. Dr. Horatius Bonar.

Enoch, Noah, and Phineas, Levi's Grandson, were Three who Walked with God—They were Our Representatives—Walking with God is a Walk of Confidence, Affection, and Intimate Communion—Hewitson's Remark—I. How Does this Walk Begin?—II. How is it Carried on?—III. How is this Walking Consummated?—What are the Hindrances in the Way of this Walk?—Worldliness and the Spirit of Unbelief which will Culminate in the Future Personal Antichrist—Open Ears and Itching Ears—The Effect of the Walk.

IF we were asked, What is a Christian? we should say he is one who has selected God as His companion through life; or, looking at the other side, we should say he is one whom God had selected for His companionship. It is this mutual selection of companionship that is embodied in the simple but wondrous words, walking with God. We find the expression or figure walking used in three different aspects.

There is walking before God. He said to Abraham, "Walk before Me and be thou perfect." And in realizing it we feel as if we had continually the eye of God behind, looking on and watching us.

Then, again, there is the other expression, walking behind or following, "Follow Me," an Old Testament and New Testament word, taken up specially by the Master when He said, "Follow Me." "If any man serve Me, let him follow Me." "Where I am there also shall My servant be." "If any man serve Me, him will My Father honor."

But the words on which we come to meditate today are not these. It is neither the going before nor coming after—it is walking side by side. We find two special characters thus described in the Old Testament. Enoch walked with God and was not. And, again, Noah walked with God. Enoch walked thus until he was carried up—carried away from the evil thing. Noah walked and he was carried through the deluge safely, landed on the other side.

But there is a third, which we often overlook, in the Book of the Prophet Malachi. We read "He walked with peace and equity, and did turn away many from iniquity." Who is this he? If you look at the previous verses you will see the name of Levi; but if you turn up the references you will find that it was not Levi nor Eliezer his son. It is Phineas, Levi's grandson, who from the various notices we have of him in the Book of Exodus and in the Psalms, seems to have been a man pre-eminently of faith and signalized by his zeal for the living God. Phineas is the third walker with God.

We are called upon to be Enochs, Noahs, and Phineas, in these last days; and we shall find the days of Enoch, and the days of Noah, and the days of Phineas correspond very remarkably to our own in these last times. We need the faith of those elders who obtained a good report through faith.

But who are these walkers with God? are they simply these three prominent saints, or are there others? Dear Christian brethren, it is the Church, the whole Church of God, that is represented by these three. It is each believing man and woman—and who are these? They are sons and daughters of Adam—fallen children of a fallen father; it is sinners whom God calls to His companionship, and it as sinners that we enter into this companionship through the blood of the everlasting covenant, under the covering of that perfect righteousness which enables Him in looking at us, the chief of sinners, to say, "Thou art all fair, My love; there is no spot in thee."

But we ask, brethren, what this walking is—what it expresses and embraces. Is it a walk of confidence? We begin with that mutual confidence, for there can be no walking without this confidence, no walking without agreement. But it is the walk of affection, the walk of love, love on both sides—the love that comes down from above to us here—love that goes up from us to Him yonder in mutual love—that love which casteth out fear, for "he that feareth is not made perfect in love."

And then along with this confidence and this affection, which is interchange of thought and feeling—God unbosoming Himself to us, and we unbosoming ourselves to Him daily, hourly—so that there shall be a constant intercourse, and an intimacy such as cannot be represented by any earthly intimacy—an intimacy between God and us which leads us to the fullest, frankest communications—we telling Him everything and He answering in response to us—intimacy, communication, communion—this is essential to walking with God.

In the biography of an old Puritan minister there occurs this concluding sentence, as if summing up the whole of his life, giving us the climax of his character: "He was one very intimate with God." Simple words, but of profoundest meaning; and I remember my friend William Hewitson, now many years with the Lord, using this striking expression, and he did it unfeignedly and without affectation. He said: "I am far more intimate with the Lord Jesus than with any earthly friend." His whole life manifested that intimacy with the Father, and with the Son, and with the Holy Ghost. This is walking with God.

But we are asked such questions as these in reference to the walking: How does it begin? secondly, How is it carried on? and thirdly, How is it consummated?

FIRST, HOW DOES IT BEGIN?

It begins with the reconciliation. There can be no walking till that is accomplished. Can two walk together except they be agreed? It begins, in other words, with our acceptance of the glad tidings that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing unto men their trespasses. It begins here, it begins at the Cross—nowhere else. It begins at the altar—nowhere else. It begins at the blood of sprinkling; and if I speak to any here who have begun what they call a religious life at any other point, I tell them that their religion is vain. All true religion begins at the Cross of Christ, and only there in the reception of the reconciliation. That Cross is the meeting-place between God and the sinner which He has provided for the sons of men. This is our message: "We are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."

And if I speak to any in this great assembly conscious that there is no such agreement, no such intimacy between God and them, then I proclaim anew what, it may be, they have heard a thousand times. I proclaim the reconciliation of the Covenant and of the Cross, and beseech such uncertain ones, such unbelieving ones, in Christ's name, on this very spot, at this very hour, in this very hall, and upon these very seats, be reconciled to God. Then the walk will begin.

(To be concluded.)

THRESHED OUT.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod. Bread corn is bruised, because he will not ever be threshing it."—ISA. 28: 27, 28.

Trial Proportioned to Strength—The Threshing Instrument Adapted to the Material—Trouble not Selected by the Sufferer—Specimen Trials—III. Christian Sorrow has Sure Terminus—Why There is No Crying in Heaven—The Salve in the Text—Drops of Anodyne—The First Day in Heaven—The Relief of Lucknow—The Final Triumph.

THE heat has been almost insufferable; in the furnace much human life has been consumed; many families have been broken; misfortunes of various kinds have come upon various people; and I suppose, standing in any congregation to-day, in this country the great need of ninety-nine out of a hundred is solace. Look, then, to this unfrequented allegory of my text.

There are three kinds of seed mentioned, fitches, cummin, and corn. Of the last we all know. But it may be well to state that the fitches and the cummin were small seeds, like the carraway or the chick-pea. When these grains or herbs were to be threshed they were thrown on the floor, and the workmen would come around with staff, or rod, or flail, and beat them until the seed would be separated; but when the corn was to be threshed that was thrown on the floor, and the men would fasten horses or oxen to a cart with iron-dented wheels; that cart would be drawn around the threshing-floor, and so the work would be accomplished. Different kinds of threshing for different products. The fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod. Bread corn is bruised, because he will not ever be threshing it.

The great thought that the text presses upon our souls is that

WE ALL GO THROUGH SOME KIND OF THRESHING PROCESS.

The fact that you may be devoting your life to honorable and noble purposes will not win you any escape. Wilberforce, the Christian emancipator, was in his day derisively called "Doctor Cantwell." Thomas Babington Macaulay, the advocate of all that was good long before he became the most conspicuous historian of his day, was caricatured in one of the quarterly reviews as "Babbletongue Macaulay." Norman McLeod, the great friend of the Scotch poor, was industriously maligned in all quarters, although on the day when he was carried out to his burial a workman stood and looked at the funeral procession, and said: "If he had done nothing for anybody more than has done for me, he should shine as the stars forever and ever." All the small wits of London had their fling at John Wesley, the father of Methodism.

If such men could not escape the maligning of the world, neither can you expect to get rid of the sharp, keen stroke of the tribulum. All who will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution. Besides that, there are the sicknesses, and the bankruptcies, and the irritations, and the disappointments which are ever putting a cup of aloes to your lip. Those wrinkles on your face are hieroglyphics, which, if deciphered, would make out a thrilling story of trouble. The footstep of the rabbit is seen the next morning on the snow, and on the white hairs of the aged are the foot prints showing where swift trouble alighted.

Even amid the joys and hilarities of life, trouble will sometimes break in. As when the people were assembled in the Charlestown theatre, during the Revolutionary war, and while they were witnessing a farce, and the audience was in great gratulation, the guns of an advancing army were heard, and the audience broke up in wild panic and ran for their lives, so ofttimes while you are seated amid the joys and festivities of this world, you hear the cannonade of some great disaster. All the fitches, and the cummin, and the corn must come down on the threshing-floor and be pounded.

I. My subject, in the first place, teaches us that it is if we escape great trial. The fitches and the cummin on one threshing-floor might look over to the corn on another threshing-floor and say: "Look at that poor, miserable, bruised corn. We have only been a little pounded, but that has been almost destroyed." Well, the corn, if it had lips, would answer and say: "Do you know the reason you have not been as much pounded as I have? It is because you are not of so much worth as I am; if you were you would be as severely run over." Yet there are men who suppose they are the Lord's favorites simply because their barns are full, and their bank account is flush, and there are no funerals in the house. It may be because they are fitches and cummin; while down at the end of the lane the poor widow may be the Lord's corn. You are but little pounded because you are but little worth, and she bruised and ground because she is the best part of the harvest.

The heft of the threshing-machine is according to the value of the grain. If you have not been much threshed in life, perhaps there is not much to thresh! If you have not been much shaken of trouble, perhaps it is because there is going to be a very small yield. When there are plenty of blackberries the gatherers go out with large baskets; but when the drought has almost consumed the fruit, then a quart measure will do as well. It took the venomous snake on Paul's hand, and the pounding of him with stones until he was taken up for dead, and the jamming against him of prison gates, and the Ephesian vociferation, and the skinned ankles of the painful stocks, and the foundering of the Alexandrian corn-ship, and the beheading stroke of the Roman sheriff to bring Paul to his proper development.

It was not because Robert Moffat, and Lady Rachel Russell, and Frederick Oberlin were worse than other people that they had to suffer: it was because they were better, and God wanted to make them best. By the carefulness of the threshing you may always conclude the value of the grain.

II. Next, my text teaches us that to what we can bear. The staff for the fitches. The rod for the cummin. The iron wheel for the corn. Sometimes people in great trouble say: "Oh, I can't bear it!" But you did bear it. God would not have sent it upon you if He had not known that you could bear it. You trembled and you swooned; but you got through. God will not take from your eyes one tear too many, nor from your lungs one sigh too deep, nor from your temples one throb too sharp. The perplexities of your earthly business have not in them one tangle too intricate.

You sometimes feel as if our world were full of bludgeons flying haphazard. Oh, no; they are threshing instruments that God just suits to your case. There is not a dollar of bad debts on your ledger, or a disappointment about goods that you expected to go up but that have gone down, or a swindle of your business partner, or a trick on the part of those who are in the same kind of business that you are, but God intended to overrule for your immortal help. "Oh," you say, "there is no need talking that way to me—I don't like to be cheated and outraged." Neither does the corn like the corn-thresher; but after it has been threshed and winnowed it has a great deal better opinion of winnowing-mills and corn-threshers.

"Well," you say

"IF I COULD CHOOSE MY TROUBLES,

I would be willing to be troubled." Ah, my brother, then it would not be trouble. You would choose something that would not hurt, and unless it hurt it does not get sanctified. Your trial, perhaps, may be childlessness. You are fond of children. You say: "Why does God send children to that other household, where they are unwelcome, and are beaten and banged about, when I would have taken them in the arms of my affection?" You say: "Any other trial but this." Your trial, perhaps, may be a disfigured countenance, or a face that is easily caricatured, and you say: "Oh, I could endure anything if only I was good-looking." And your trial, perhaps, is a violent temper, and you have to drive it like six unbroken horses amid the gunpowder explosions of a great holiday, and ever and anon it runs away with you. Your trial is the asthma. You say: "Oh, if it were rheumatism, or neuralgia, or erysipelas, but it is this asthma, and it is such an exhausting thing to breathe."

Your trouble is a husband, short, sharp, snappy, and cross about the house, and raising a small riot because a button is off! How could you know the button is off? Your trial is a wife ever in contest with the servants, and she is a sloven. Though she was very careful about her appearance in your presence once, now she is careless, because, she says, her fortune is made! Your trial is a hard school-lesson you cannot learn, and you have bitten your finger-nails until they are a sight to behold.

Everybody has some vexation, or annoyance, or trial, and he or she thinks it is the one least adapted. "Anything but this," all say; "anything but this." Oh, my hearer, are you not ashamed to be complaining all this time against God? Who manages the affairs of this world, anyhow? Is it an infinite Modoc? or a Sitting Bull savage? or an omnipotent Nana Sahib? No; it is the most merciful and glorious and wise Being in all the universe. You cannot teach omnipotence anything.

You have fretted and worried almost enough. Do you not think so? Some of you are making yourselves ridiculous in the sight of the angels. Here is a naval architect, and he draws out the plan of a ship of many thousand tons. Many workmen are engaged on it for a long while. The ship is done; and some day, with the flags up and the air gorgeous with bunting, that vessel is launched for Southampton. At that time, a lad six years of age comes running down the dock with a toy boat which he has made with his own jackknife, and he says: "Here, my boat is better than yours. Just look at this jibboom and these weather cross-jack braces;" and he drops his little boat beside the great ship, and there is a roar of laughter on the docks!

Ah! my friends, that great ship is your life as God planned it—vast, million-tonned, ocean-destinied, eternity-bound. That little boat is your life as you were trying to hew it out, and fashion it, and launch it. Ah! do not try to be a rival of the great Jehovah. God is always right, and in nine cases out of ten you are wrong. He sends just the hardships, just the bankruptcies, just the cross that it is best for you to have. He knows what kind of grain you are, and He sends the right kind of threshing-machine. It will be rod, or staff, or iron wheel, just according as you are fitches, or cummin, or corn.

III. Again, my subject teaches that God keeps trial on us

UNTIL WE LET GO.

The farmer shouts "Whoa"! to his horses as soon as the grain is dropped from the stalk. The farmer comes with his fork and tosses up the straw, and he sees that the straw has let go the grain, and the grain is thoroughly threshed. So God. Smiting rod and turning wheel both cease as soon as we let go.

We hold on to this world with its pleasures, and riches, and emoluments, and our knuckles are so firmly set that it seems as if we could hold on for ever. God comes along with some threshing trouble and beats us loose. We started under the delusion that this was a great world. We learned out of our geography that it was so many thousand miles in diameter and so many miles in circumference, and we said: "Oh, my, what a world!" Trouble came in after life, and this trouble sliced off one part of the world, and it has got to be a smaller world, and, in some estimations, a very insignificant world; and it is depreciating all the time as a spiritual property. Ten per cent off, fifty per cent off, and there are those who would not give ten cents for this world—the entire world—as a soul possession.

We thought that friendship was a grand thing. In school we used to write compositions about friendship; and perhaps we made our graduating speech on commencement day on friendship. Oh! it was a charmed thing; but does it mean as much to you as it used to? You have gone on in life, and one friend has betrayed you, and another friend has misinterpreted you, and another friend has neglected you, and friendship comes now sometimes to mean to you merely another axe to grind!

So with money. We thought if a man had a competency he was safe for all the future; but we have learned that a mortgage may be defeated by an unknown previous incumbrance; that signing your name on the back of a note may be your business death-warrant; that a new tariff may change the current of trade; that a man may be rich to-day and poor to-morrow. And God, by all these misfortunes, is trying to loosen our grip; but still we hold on. God smites us with a staff; but we hold on. And He strikes us with a rod; but we hold on. And He sends over us the iron wheel of misfortune; but we hold on.

There are men who keep their grip on this world until the last moment, who suggest to me the condition and conduct of the poor Indian in the boat in the Niagara rapids, coming on toward the fall. Seeing that he could not escape, a moment or two before he got to the verge of the plunge, he lifted a wine-bottle and drank it off, and then tossed the bottle into the air. So there are men who clutch the world, and they go down through the rapids of temptation and sin, and they hold on to the very last moment to life, drinking to their eternal damnation as they go over and go down.

Oh, let go! Let go! The best fortunes are in heaven. There are no absconding cashiers from that bank, no failing in promises to pay. Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth. Let go! Depend upon it that God will keep upon you the staff or the rod or the iron wheel until you do let go.

IV. Another thing my text teaches us is, that Christian sorrow is going to have

A SURE TERMINUS.

My text says: "Bread corn is bruised, because he will not be ever threshing it." Blessed be God for that! Pound away, O flail. Turn on, O wheel! Your work will soon be done. "He will not be ever threshing it." Now the Christian has almost as much use in the organ for the stop tremulant as he has for the trumpet. But after a while he will put the last dirge into the portfolio forever. So much of us as is wheat will be separated from so much as is chaff, and there will be no more need of pounding.

They never cry in heaven, because they have nothing to cry about. There are no tears of bereavement, for you shall have your friends all round about you. There are no tears of poverty, because each one sits at the king's table, and has his own chariot of salvation, and free access to the wardrobe where princes get their array. No tears of sickness, for there are no pneumonias on the air, and no malarial exhalations from the rolling river of life, and no crutch for the lame limb, and no splint for the broken arm; but the pulses throbbing with the health of the eternal God, in a climate like our June before the blossoms fall, or our gorgeous October before the leaves scatter.

In that land the souls will talk over the different modes of threshing. Oh! the story of the staff that struck the fitches, and the rod that beat the cummin, and the iron wheel that went over the corn. Daniel will describe the lions, and Jonah leviathan, and Paul the elmwood whips with which he was scourged, and Eve will tell how aromatic Eden was the day she left it, and John Rogers will tell of the smart of the flame, and Elijah of the fiery team that wheeled him up the sky-steeps, and Christ of the numbness and the paroxysm and hemorrhages of the awful crucifixion. There they are before the throne of God. On one elevation all those who were struck of the staff. On a higher elevation all those who were struck of the rod. On a highest elevation, and amid the highest altitudes of heaven, all those who were under the wheel. He will not ever be threshing it.

Oh! my hearers, is there not enough to make a plaster large enough to heal all your wounds? When a child is hurt, the mother is very apt to say to it: "Now, it will soon feel better." And that is what God says when He unbosoms all the trouble in the hush of this great promise: "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." You may leave your pocket handkerchief sopping wet with tears on your death pillow, but you will go up absolutely sorrowless. They will wear black, you will wear white. Cypresses for them; palms for you.

You will say: "Is it possible that I am here? Is this heaven? Am I so pure now I will never do anything wrong? Am I so well that I will never again be sick? Are these companionships so firm that they will never again be broken? Is that Mary? Is that John? Is that my loved one I put away into darkness? Can it be that there are the faces of those who lay so wan and emaciated in the back room that awful night dying? Oh, how radiant they are! Look at them! How radiant they are!

"Why, how unlike this place is from what I thought when I left the world below. Ministers drew pictures of this land, but how tame compared with the reality! They told me on earth that death was sunset. No, no! It is sunrise! Glorious sunrise! I see the light now purpling the hills, and the clouds flame with the coming day."

Then the gates of heaven will be opened, and the entranced soul, with the acuteness and power of the celestial vision, will look ten thousands of miles down upon the bannered procession—a river of shimmering splendor—and will cry out: "Who are they?" And the angel of God, standing close by, will say: "Don't you know who they are?" "No," says the entranced soul, "I cannot guess who they are." The angel will say: "I will tell you, then, who they are. These are they who came out of great tribulation, or threshing, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

Oh! that I could administer some of these drops of celestial anodyne to these nervous and excited souls. If you would take enough of it it would cure all your pangs. The thought that you are going to get through with this after a while, all this sorrow and all this trouble. We shall have a great many grand days in heaven, but I will tell you which will be the grandest day of all the million ages of heaven. You say: "Are you sure you can tell me?" Yes, I can. It will be the day we get there. Some say heaven is growing more glorious. I suppose it is; but I do not care much about that. Heaven now is good enough for me.

History has no more gratulatory scene than the breaking in of the English army upon

LUCKNOW,

India. A few weeks before a massacre had occurred at Cawnpore, and two hundred and sixty women and children had been put in a room. Then five professional butchers went in and slew them. Then the bodies of the slain were taken out and thrown into a well. As the English army came into Cawnpore they went into the room; and oh, what a horrid scene! Sword-strokes on the wall near the floor, showing that the poor things had crouched when they died; and they saw also that the floor was ankle-deep in blood. The soldiers walked on their heels across it, lest their shoes be submerged of the carnage. And on that floor of blood there were flowing locks of hair and fragments of dresses.

Out in Lucknow they had heard of the massacre, and the women were waiting for the same awful death; waiting amid anguish untold; waiting in pain and starvation, but waiting heroically—when, one day, Havelock and Outram and Norman and Sir David Baird and Peel, the heroes of the English army—huzza for them!—broke in on that horrid scene, and while yet the guns were sounding, and while cheers were issuing from the starving, dying people on the one side, and from the travel-worn and powder-blackened soldiers on the other—right there, in front of the King's palace, there was such a scene of handshaking, and embracing, and boisterous joy as would utterly confound the pen of the poet and the pencil of the painter. And no wonder, when these emaciated women, who had suffered so heroically for Christ's sake, marched out from their incarcerations, one wounded English soldier got up in his fatigue and wounds, and leaned against the wall, and threw his cap up and shouted, "Three cheers, my boys, for the brave women!"

Oh! that was an exciting scene. But a gladder and more triumphant scene will it be when you come up into heaven from the conflicts and incarcerations of this world, streaming with the wounds of battle, and wan with hunger; and while the hosts of God are cheering their great hosanna, you will strike hands of congratulation and eternal deliverance in the presence of the throne. On that night there will be bonfires on every hill of heaven, and there will be illumination in every palace, and there will be a candle in every window—ah, no; I forget, I forget; they will have no need of the candle or of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign forever and ever. Hail! hail! sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty.

SACRED FRAGMENTS.

AT the recent annual meeting of the Naval and Military Bible Society, in London, England, the chairman, Sir Harry Verney, said:

A REMINISCENCE OF LUCKNOW.

"I well recollect my son, who was at the siege of Lucknow, telling me that there were two English ladies, Mrs. Ord and Mrs. Jackson, who when a great number of English men and women were murdered at Lucknow, escaped, and were received into the house of a native. They remained in that house for nearly a year, and were never able to go out.

"Mrs. Ord having a child who was sick, sent to an apothecary's shop or store for some medicine for it, and the medicine came back wrapped up in a part of the book of Isaiah. It was part of the 51st chapter, and I think there were on one side the 12th and 13th verses of that chapter, and on the other the 22d and 23d verses. These ladies had no English book, and these four verses were the whole of the English print or writing that they saw for a whole year. Probably the Bible of which that formed a portion had been issued either by this society or by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and what a blessing must it have been for those two poor ladies, who had no other comfort of any sort, to have even those four verses of God's Word to read!"

A SCOFFING EMIGRANT CONVERTED.

Major Cooper Gardiner said: "In addressing sailors in the Pool (the Thames) I have found similar benefit arising from the circulation of the Scriptures.

"In one case a man on board an emigrant vessel who had repeatedly rejected an offer of part of the Holy Scriptures from a missionary, at last received it, and immediately tore it up. As he was undressing at night he found a portion of God's Word in his clothes. His eyes fell upon the words, 'The blood of Jesus Christ,' which he afterward asked the missionary to explain to him, and the result was that he was converted to Christ."

THE INFIDEL BRADLAUGH AS A SOLDIER.

The Rev. R. C. Halpin said: "I am reminded of something that occurred about twenty years ago, when I was connected with the 7th Dragoon Guards.

"Regularly on Tuesday morning, after the services on Sunday I received an anonymous letter, not criticizing my remarks as the preacher, but attacking and assailing Christianity, and denying the very existence of Almighty God. At last it was discovered that my atheistic correspondent was the notorious Mr. Bradlaugh, who was so zealous in propagating his lamentable views that he used to get up at night to address the soldiers in the barrack-room in atheistic orations. At last he became a little too energetic for his own purpose. Attention having been called to what he was doing, the thing was crushed, and soon after Mr. Bradlaugh left the service."

The Dangers of Kangaroo Hunting—More Serious Peril of Capturing Bushrangers—The Murder of a Settler—A Gang of Convicts Visit Dr. Gibson—A Troubled Sleeper—The Gang Arrested and Punished—Spiritual Destitution—Graham's Sundays—He Commences Business on His own Account.

ONE reason why I was not eager to join in pursuit of this gang of bushrangers was that I had once been put in jail, as you will remember, on the false charge of absenting myself from my station without leave, which might almost have made a bushranger of a braver and more reckless man. But the great mercy of God, who has ever watched over all my wanderings, prevented me taking such a foolish step.

Again I never fancied bushranger-hunting excursions. They are not at all pleasant if the game comes to bay. Did I ever tell you how I was nearly killed by a kangaroo brought to bay by my two dogs Settler and Fly? The old fellow, after a long hunt, chose to come to bay in a pool, where, standing six feet high, he caught the dogs in his forepaws and soused them, till I feared they would be drowned. I went in to help with my clasp-knife. When near enough I attempted blood-letting; but the old fellow did not like my surgery, and lifting his hind leg and thrusting it forward put his immense long nail (he had got two such on each hind foot), most unceremoniously into my waistcoat pocket, ripping down my waistcoat, trousers, and boot. Half an inch deeper would have killed me. There was very little, I assure you, between me and death. The muscles of the hind-quarters of a kangaroo give him a terrific power in a thrust or kick.

Well, I had rather face my meek-looking old antagonist in the pool than face a bushranger brought to bay; for they are often deadly shots. I certainly should, nevertheless, have joined in the chase after Scotchy and Witton, had duty or self-defence called; but, as said, they went elsewhere. They had a terrible grudge against two men, whom they visited in succession. One was a Mr. Oaks. Why they nursed revenge for him I do not know. Generally in such cases, it is having been reputed as cruel to Government men, or convicts, that brings them to seek blood.

Oaks lived at Paramatta, near Sydney, but had a head-station at the Crookwell River, on our side of the Blue Mountains. At his station he had a beautiful library, which he had collected with much care, for there he and his family resided part of the year. He had just arrived to visit the station, bringing with him a confidential man as overseer. This man, being dressed in a black coat and hat, they took for Mr. Oaks, and shot him dead. They burned the station and the library, and pursued the stockman for his life into the bush. Mr. Oaks hid till they were gone.

They next visited the station of Dr. Gibson, where a Mr. Fry was overseer. With this latter gentleman they had a heavy account to settle. Once, when he was going through the Badger Bush, near Sydney, a gang of two had attempted to rob the mail coach. He was on it, and was demanded to deliver up. He hesitated; but at length consented. "Well then," he said, "all I have is tied up in this opossum-rug." He was ordered to give it out. "If I must, I will," he said; and opening his rug he drew his revolver to full-cock, and shot the robber who was covering the driver, and took prisoner the other, who was receiving the booty. The necessity for such severity was of course to be deplored, but was unavoidable.

The gang of Scotchy, Witton, and Russell had been joined by another desperado, called Reynolds, before they visited Dr. Gibson's. They then commenced their attack on Dr. Gibson's house, but Fry, his hut-keeper, made so courageous a defence that they fled.

Sergeant Frere and two policemen went in pursuit of this gang of Witton. They employed a black tracker, and traced them to a hut, where they had lodged the previous night. They had compelled the hut-keeper to make tea for them, just as once before they had compelled us to do; and they took watch through the night in turns. They appeared careworn and anxious. At length all fell asleep. Witton, the coxswain of the crew, often started convulsively in his sleep, and at length sprang up from a troubled dream, crying, "Here they come!"

How one's heart sorrows to think of men so lost, and having such a present hell in their souls! For, after all, their gaiety is but the verdure that must soon wither over the thin crust of the volcano, whose fiery flood of wrath is wearing ever nearer the surface. Their pursuers, like stern ministers of Divine justice, tracked them from the hut, for about twelve miles, till they came to the angle of a rock that hid their farther view. There they kindled a fire.

Presently Russell shouted, "To arms, nere they are." One of the policemen, in leaping a creek that lay between, broke the butt of his carbine, for which he was afterward dismissed. The two civilians dismounted and took to the trees; the troopers kept to their horses. Sergeant Frere called to Russell to come from behind his tree, and fight him fair. He accepted the challenge, and coming out took deliberate aim at Frere's breast. At that instant the sergeant's horse threw up his head, and the ball striking his withers grazed his rider's hat. The horse staggered and fell to his haunches, and Frere dismounting commenced the duel with Russell. His first shot did not take effect. His second struck Russell in the groin, and he fell. He rose again, but fell; and after shouting, "Boys, I'm shot, but fight till you die," he drew a pistol, and putting it in his mouth, scattered his brains about. The other two were then covered on all sides, and threw down their arms in rage and despair; having, it may be, some hope of life in the chapter of accidents. But every promise in that "Bible of fools" is a snare, especially to evil-doers.

Witton and Reynolds were lodged in contiguous cells in Goulbourne jail, where they concerted to commit suicide by hanging, at a signal. Reynolds heard the signal and hanged himself; Witton was prepared to do so, but was prevented by the turnkey. He was publicly executed; and, it was believed, through the efforts of a godly man, was led to see himself as a sinner, and Christ as the Saviour, and died truly penitent. When Parson C—— visited and preached to him, it is reported he wept bitterly, and said, had he "heard that in time he should not be hanged to-morrow." He laid his dying injunction on the parson that he should come up through our district "up country" and preach the Gospel to those who were as ignorant as he was. This was not very complimentary to us, but it was benevolent and true of the dying man.

The people around were living like heathen. The sermons were bush-yarns, often amusing, often obscene and profane, adding fuel to the fires of depravity. The occupations of the Sabbath were lounging, clothes-mending, rum-drinking, and a variety of sins and secularities. There was neither church nor chapel nearer us than a hundred and twenty miles. My wife through the years of her girlhood never heard a sermon, except in Sydney; and for the first seven years in the Lachlan district I never heard a sermon but one. That we owed to "the dying thief" Witton; from Parson C——, who did come and preach once in our neighborhood, and I heard him.

His wife, who was a youngish lady, read and spoke beautifully, quite the better parson of the two; some coarse fellows laughed at him, but none at her. She gave a Bible and prayer-book to Selina, which she has still in her possession; and I have known men ride ten and even twenty-five miles through the bush to borrow that prayer-book to read the funeral service over the dead. I have seen some solemn sights, and many tears, by groves in the bush. I lived to engage a schoolmaster and missionary for that district.

Till then the moral mass had little or none of the salt of the earth in it, and was left to its corruption unrestrained. Some, that once had salt, had then lost their savor, through being swallowed up in stock-caring and mammon-hunting. They could not serve God and Mammon, and so, deluded by the arch-deceiver of souls, they decided to choose the present, risking—yea, imperilling—their all for eternity. I am perfectly sure, though, that the settlers would support missionaries, if they were the right men who went among them. Proof of that I may give you in some future yarn.

I have often thought it strange what an unequal distribution of things there is over the world; among other good things, of parsons. In the British Islands there you have two or three preachers in every village, elbowing each other for want of flock and sheep-run, while out here you will have squatter flocks without a shepherd, and "the run" of hundreds of miles never trodden by a spiritual shepherd's steps. There sects are fighting for windfall proselytes: here are thousands to be converted. At home you have the living waters so plentiful that the flocks can hardly be got to drink; here they may travel for leagues and find but muddy pools or "wells without water." In truth it is marvellous to think how many here may say, "No man careth for my soul." It is awfully true.

But it is to be hoped the churches will not always neglect us baptized bush heathen, and that the waters of life will not always be pent up in their reservoirs at home, but find their level and flow to us. Oh, for Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Churchmen—any men who would preach the Gospel of Christ, and show us the way to a better life! You ask me how I spent my Sundays? I never did any work on Sunday. I do not say my mind did not break the yoke and work on Sunday at the plans of the coming week—especially before bush-journeys; but I always found it to my mental and bodily advantage to remember the Sabbath day and rest on it. I often used to slip away from circles of men who were smoking and chaffing, and get by myself into the closet of primitive solitude, and read the best book I could get. Often, often on such occasions have I been in spirit living over the Sundays when we went to the church in the morning, then the Sunday-school, then closed the day with the prayer-meeting and family prayer.

Alas! I did not value those days and means of grace as I ought, but their tender memories often opened the fountains within my heart. I got hold of an old copy of Richard Baxter's "Saints' Everlasting Rest," and often read it of a Sunday in the bush. Next to the Bible there was no book so showed the hollowness of the world, and the reality and joy of Heaven. I often thought that worldly hopes were like those creeks that at certain seasons were overflowing, but when you most needed water and came to them they were arid sand.

I did not often pray in the bush, and could not bear to be wholly the child of this world; but my glimpses of Heaven were short, and the clouds soon closed overhead again. What a different man must Richard Baxter have been! His sky appeared bright as this Australian summer. But even this climate in brightest moods is subject to hot winds and threatening clouds. I wonder had he any such in the world within. Certain it is, if he had to wield the stock-whip and the axe, instead of the pen and Bible, and if, instead of mingling with the praises of saints, he had had to mingle in a circle of yarning bush sinners, I do not know how he could be so heavenly-minded as he was.

I often find the sentiments of my solitude rudely brushed off by such contact, like dew off flowers by a rush of cattle over them; but still the flowers are better for the dew, and it is sweet while it last. If I am acting the Pharisee by thus "praying in the corners of the streets," it is you who are to blame. One thing I know, when I review the whole of life, I have not much to make me say, "God, I thank Thee that I am not like other men;" but much to make me exclaim, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

As to earthly aspirations in those days, one of my warmest was to make as much money as would enable me to return to Ireland and purchase the fee simple of my father's farm, that he might sit rent free, and that I might have the joy of enabling him to do so. Money for its own sake I did not love (as who but a mad miser does); but I began to see its usefulness for many valuable ends.

After our return from the Murray I continued some time in the employment of my worthy old friend Meals. He was a true friend; for, although he leant on me very much, he wished me to do well for myself. He knew I had some money and some cattle, so one day he said to me, "Now, James, you are a married man, and have some substance, and I know you will naturally wish to have a station of your own; there is Mow Poke, which you found and formed, I'll sell it and all on it to you at a valuation." I took it at a valuation of 590*l.* This sum, and about 10*l.* more, was all the money we could muster.

I purchased the station, however, and after I had bought a dray-load of stores (tea, sugar, tobacco, flour, etc.), I had just one pound over, and that I paid a man to drive the dray to the station, while I drove the cattle. When my own cattle were joined to those I purchased with the station, we commenced stock-keeping with five hundred head of cattle (including one hundred and fifty head of prime heifers) and fifty horses.

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT IN RELATION TO PROPHECY.

By Rev. William Maude.

The Sensation of the Revised Version—A Reassuring Testimony—How it is Regarded by the Jew—By the Roman Catholic—By the Man of Letters—By the Student of Prophecy—Important Passages Compared—The Parousia—Alterations of Value—The Supreme Object of Biblical Science.

IT may safely be asserted that no event in connection with English literature has, for many years past, excited so deep and widespread an interest as the publication, on the 17th of May, 1881, of the Revised Version of the New Testament, upon which a number of the most eminent scholars, not only in Great Britain, but also in America, have spent no less than ten years' patient labor. The publication of Lord Beaconsfield's "Endymion," of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," of the novels of Charles Dickens, of John Henry Newman's "Tract XC.," of Lord Macaulay's "History of England;" or, to go a little further back, the appearance in brilliant succession of the works of Sir Walter Scott and the poems of Lord Byron—all these were the occasions of no small sensation in the literary world; but the curiosity which they excited in the general public, the universality of the interest which they awakened, and the extent of the circulation to which they at once attained, were insignificant indeed as compared with that which has resulted from the appearance of this, the most momentous issue during the present century of that most powerful of modern instrumentalities—the Press.

The year 1881 may present, hereafter, many claims to be considered memorable, but none, we think, will stand out more distinctly, none will assert that claim with less challenge than this—that in that year the Revised Edition of the Authorized Version of the New Testament was given to all English-speaking peoples.

And this fact—for that it is a fact will hardly be called in question—is surely a grand and reassuring testimony to the unique position which the inspired Word, as translated for our use into our English tongue, still occupies, and the Divine authority which the Christian revelation still commands, in this our highly favored land. For, let us remember, it is not any fresh revelation, a fifth Gospel, or a new Apocalypse, or even an additional Epistle of Paul, or Peter, or John, the appearance of which has been so impatiently anticipated, and is now so eagerly received and so anxiously perused and scrutinized

It is, after all, the old book essentially which has been in our hands and the hands of our fathers for more than two centuries and a half; and all this eagerness and anxiety arises from a desire to ascertain how certain paragraphs and sentences have been modified, how some small inaccuracies have been removed; how, in a word, while still listening with reverent ear to the Divine Voice with which we have been familiar from our very childhood, we may perchance no longer miss here and there a word of the sacred utterance, or fail to catch its very tone and emphasis. In other words, all that the revisers have, in the good providence of God, been called upon to do for us is, not to set forth as newly-furnished the table at which millions of God's children have so long eaten and been satisfied, but simply to gather up the crumbs of heavenly truth and consolation which may have fallen from it, that nothing be lost.

And the universality of the interest which has been called forth by this revision is strikingly brought home to our minds, when we observe from how many special standpoints the book is criticized, and with what diverse objects the work accomplished is tested, and either approved or condemned. By the Jew, from an antagonistic position, it is regarded with interest, because it is assumed "the new revision will bring home to Christians the many imperfections of the book they have almost worshipped. Christians will find that sayings hallowed by the dearest associations of youth and age, joy and suffering; phrases which have imbedded themselves in their literature; supposed utterances of Jesus Himself, are not even found in authoritative copies of the original. In brief, that the book, hitherto surrounded as by a halo of divinity, is reduced, by the mere fact that it admits of criticism, to the level of an ordinary work that can be compared and revised and emended" (Jewish World).

By the Romanist the Revised Version is regarded with interest and approval, because it exhibits a "decided approximation, in a multitude of instances, to the rendering of the Catholic Vulgate. Which tends to show—as the revisers have not taken the Vulgate as a guide, but have nevertheless in so many instances reverted to its renderings and forms of expression—how great is the value of St. Jerome's version, and of the translations based upon it" (Tablet).

By the man of letters, again, the chief interest felt in many instances is, it is to be feared, to judge of the literary skill with which the work has been accomplished, and how far the pleasant music of the old version has been retained or sacrificed to the demands of faithfulness. And so we might go on to specify the special interests excited in the Biblical critic, the systematic theologian, and the maintainers of various peculiar doctrines and theories, to discover how far it may serve to support their adopted opinions.

That this should be the case is no just cause for either surprise or animadversion; nor will it, we trust, be deemed out of place if, in these pages, we briefly direct attention to the new Revised Version in relation to the great subject of unfulfilled prophecy, and endeavor to show how, in many instances, it places the unlearned English student in a better position to apprehend the mind of the Spirit, in His gracious office of showing to God's people "things to come."

One of the first passages to which I instinctively turned, when the idea of making this investigation dawned upon my mind, was Matt. 13, the well-known cycle of parables in which the history of the "kingdom of heaven" in mystery is so comprehensively set forth. Here in verse 40, and again in verse 49, we have in the Authorized Version the misleading phrase, "the end of this world," instead of "the end of the age," which is unquestionably the more correct translation of the Greek, besides being supported by the internal evidence. This error, we regret to find, is retained in the text of the Revised Version; sill it is something gained that the correct rendering, "the consummation of the age," is, in both places, given in the margin. Why it was not adopted in the text it is difficult to understand, except on the ground that the revisers, though accomplished scholars, were not students of prophecy; here, therefore, we seem to have an instructive instance of the unconscious bias from which even the most competent and conscientious translators are never wholly free.

In another of our Lord's prophetic parables, that of the ten virgins (Matt. 25: 1–13), several not unimportant alterations have been made, and we will therefore place the Authorized and Vevised Versions in juxtaposition in order that they may be more readily compared:

AUTHORIZED	REVISED.
"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you; but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut. Afterwards came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh."	"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps (marg. 'torches'), and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were foolish, and five were wise. For the foolish, when they took their lamps (marg. 'torches'), took no oil with them: but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps (marg. 'torches') Now while the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. But at midnight there is a cry, Behold, the bridegroom! Come ye forth to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps (marg. 'torches'). And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps (marg. 'torches') are going out. But the wise answered, saying, Peradventure there will not be enough for us and you: go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went away to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage feast: and the door was shut. Afterwards came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour."

(1.) Here we observe, in the first place, an alteration in the terms of the midnight cry, which, instead of "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him," now reads: "Behold, the bridegroom! Come ye forth to meet him." A change which in its sharp sententious brevity not only conforms to the reading of the most ancient MSS., but emphasizes the imminence of the bridegroom's appearance.

(2.) Again—an apparently small but really very important change is the introduction, from the margin, into the text, of the rendering, "our lamps are going out," in place of "our lamps are gone out;" indicating as it clearly does the fact, essential to the correct interpretation of the parable, that the lamps of all the virgins were originally alight, and that even at the midnight hour those of the foolish were only "going out"—not actually extinguished.

(3.) Lastly, the omission, on the authority of the three most ancient MSS., the Sinaitic, the Alexandrian, and the Vatican, of the concluding words, "Wherein the Son of man cometh," is not without significance and advantage, inasmuch as the parable refers chronologically, not to Christ's glorious epiphany, but to His previous coming into the air to receive His waiting saints. It is of this event that we know not the day nor the hour.

In Matt. 24: 3 we find the first instance of the use of that important Greek word parousia, which occurs no less than twenty times in the New Testament, and is, in the Authorized Version, in every case translated "coming." This defective rendering is, unfortunately, as it seems to us, retained in the text of the Revised Version, with one exception, Phil. 1: 26, where it is translated "presence." But the alternative and very preferable rendering, "presence," is uniformly given in the margin.

The peculiarity of the Greek word is that it almost invariably expresses not only the arrival of a person, but his subsequent presence after having arrived. Hence we have no English word which fully expresses its meaning. "Coming" or "arrival" expresses the first half, so to speak, but omits the second half, while "presence," though it brings out the second, passes somewhat too lightly over the first; yet, inasmuch as "presence" assumes the antecedent "coming," it is by far the preferable word.

(To be concluded.)

The Exultant Leper.—A King was once hunting alone in a wood, when he heard a very beautiful voice singing very sweetly. He went on and saw it was a poor leper. "How can you sing?" he said, "when you seem in so wretched a condition?" The leper replied, "It is because I am in this state that I sing, for as my body decays I know that the hour of my deliverance draws nigh, when I shall go to my Lord and my God."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Steady and Continuous Improvement in the President's condition has been one of the most gratifying features of the week's intelligence. Day by day the bulletins issued, have expressed increased hopefulness on the part of the physicians in attendance, and the reports of the opinions of members of the Cabinet and other non-professional visitors at the White House, are still more sanguine. The President is now able to take and assimilate solid food, and his appetite is good. The fever has abated, and his pulse and temperature are nearly normal. The bullet has not yet been extracted, and its position is a matter of dispute among the physicians. The symptoms indicate that the first opinion held, that the missile was imbedded in the liver, cannot be correct, and it is now thought by some of the doctors that it was deflected by the ribs and has lodged in the wall of the abdomen. Dr. Hamilton said on Saturday, "There is scarcely a doubt that the President will get well; in fact I will say that his ultimate recovery is beyond all reasonable doubt. You can't say that he is out of danger, of course. That you cannot say of any sick man, no matter what his trouble is." The fund started by Mr. Cyrus Field as an expression of national feeling about the outrage, and which is to be invested for the benefit of Mrs. Garfield and her children, amounted at the close of business on Saturday to $147,575.30.

The Assassin's own Account of the Attack on the President, which has been given to the public by United States District Attorney Corkhill, shows that the crime had long been premeditated. As early as May 18th he had formed the determination to kill the President. He borrowed money and purchased the pistol near the end of May, and at once commenced practising shooting at a board as a mark, and looking for an opportunity to commit his crime.

On Sunday morning, June 12th, he put the pistol in his pocket and followed the President to church. He entered the church, but found he could not kill him there without danger of killing some one else. He noticed that the President sat near a window. After church he made an examination of the window and found that from this point he could shoot the President through the head; and having examined the position again on the following Wednesday he determined to make the attempt at the church the following Sunday. But it was announced that the President would not attend the church on that day, as he would leave Washington with Mrs. Garfield on Saturday, June 18th, for Long Branch. Guiteau determined to meet him at the depot, and went down to the river at the foot of Seventeenth Street and fired five shots to practise his aim and be certain his pistol was in good order. He then went to the depot and was in the ladies' waiting room with the pistol ready when the President's party entered. He says Mrs. Garfield looked so weak and f ail that he had not the heart to shoot the President in her presence, and, as he knew he would have another opportunity, he left the depot. Between that date and that of the shooting, Guiteau dogged the President's steps about the city, but could get no opportunity to use his weapon. On the morning of Saturday, July 2d, he went into the depot and loitered around there, had his shoes blacked, and engaged a hackman for $2 to take him to the jail, took his pistol out of his pocket, and unwrapped the paper from around it, which he had put there for the purpose of preventing the perspiration from the body dampening the powder, examined the pistol carefully, tried the trigger and then returned and took a seat in the ladies' waiting room, and as soon as the President entered, advanced behind him and fired two shots.

All this planning and careful pre-arrangement of details on the part of the would-be-assassin shows that if, as is argued, he is insane, there is a method in his madness which brings his case into that category for the treatment of which the criminal laws are enacted.

A Day of Prayer for the Recovery of the President was appointed by the Governors of Kentucky and Arkansas, and July 14th was named and generally observed. Governor Foster of Ohio has issued a circular telegram suggesting the propriety of setting apart, by the concurrent action of the Governors of the States, a day of thanksgiving for the recovery of the President. He suggests that the Governors of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Kentucky, and Ohio constitute a committee to appoint a day for this purpose. The suggestion has been received with general approval. Prayers have been continually offered for the wounded President all over the land, and in all places of worship special petitions have ascended on his behalf, but it is becoming that a day of prayer should be set apart for the purpose, as a sign of the nation's dependence on God in the time of anxiety. It should also be an acknowledgment that the President's recovery, which now seems probable, is an issue for which our thanks are due to the Giver of all good.

A Break in the Deadlock at Albany has at last been made. On Saturday, July 16th, Speaker Sharpe announced that he should bow to the decision of the majority of his party, and should vote for the candidates the caucus selected for the senatorial vacancies. Seven other Senators and Assemblymen followed General Sharpe's example in the ballot for the long term, and the Hon. Warner Miller, of Herkimer, was declared elected United States Senator for the term ending in 1887. He received seventy-six votes, three more than were necessary for a choice. In the speech in which the Speaker announced his intended desertion of the Conkling ranks, he did not conceal the regret he felt that the ex-senators could not be re-elected; but it is expected that the administration will recognize in a substantial manner the valuable aid he has rendered them.

In the ballot for the short term only two votes besides the Speaker's were changed from the Stalwart to the administration candidate, and Mr. Lapham's vote was only 68, five votes below the number necessary for a choice. The convention then adjourned until Monday, when a ballot for the short term was taken, in which Mr. Lapham was again five votes short of the required number.

The Death of Gen. J. C. Pemberton Occurred at Penn Lyn, Pa., on Wednesday, July 13th. He had been seriously ill for more than two months and very recently a painful operation had been performed in hopes of affording him relief from suffering. He was born in 1817 at Philadelphia. He became a cadet at West Point in 1833, and after his graduation in 1837 was appointed second Lieutenant of the Fourth Artillery. In 1838 he was engaged with his regiment in the war with the Seminoles in Florida. When the Mexican war broke out he fought with conspicuous gallantry and rose to the rank of full captain. At the taking of the City of Mexico he was wounded. In 1861 he resigned his commission and cast in his lot with the Confederacy, where he attained the rank of Lieutenant-General. His resolute defence of Vicksburg in 1863 against General Grant, and his surrender after sustaining a siege of forty-seven days with little ammunition and, during the latter part of the time, almost without food, will be the struggle by which he will be chiefly remembered. At the close of the war General Pemberton became a farmer near Warrenton, Tanquier County, Va. He subsequently settled in his native city, where he remained until seized with his fatal illness.

The Annual National Camp Meeting at Round Lake for the promotion of holiness, which began on July 12th, was rendered specially interesting by the presence of the Rev. J. S. and Mrs. Inskip, who had returned from their "Round the World Tour," a few days previously in health and safety. After leaving Europe and Asia, Mr. and Mrs. Inskip went to Australia and spent eight weeks in Melbourne, Ballarat, Geelong, and Sydney. During that time, Mr. Inskip writes, he "preached eighty sermons, and saw about twenty-five hundred people saved, about two thirds of whom were converted and the balance wholly sanctified." "Among the last-mentioned class were a large number of ministers of the Gospel, travelling and local. On the whole we deem it the most faithful two months toil we have ever been enabled to perform. To God be all the praise." It is worthy of remark that during the past twelve months of incessant travelling and preaching, Mr. Inskip has contributed about one hundred and sixty columns of correspondence to his journal in Philadelphia.

The Anxiety Felt about the Arctic Exploration steamer, the Jeanette, is deepened by intelligence brought to San Francisco by Captain Mallard of the Thomas Pope, who reports that Indians had found the missing whalers Vigilant and Mount Wollaston, both of which had drifted ashore near East Cape. Three bodies were found on board the Vigilant, the crew having evidently perished the first year of their confinement in the ice. The Jeanette was last seen in company with those two ships, and serious apprehensions are consequently entertained about her. The reports of the three expeditions now searching for her, the Rogers, the Alliance, and the Proteus, are eagerly looked for.

A Novel Experiment in Social Economy is under consideration at Winchester, Mass. It is proposed to buy there a considerable tract of land, and erect a number of handsome houses. These, however, are to be without kitchens. In the centre of the grounds is to be a spacious dining-hall, and the kitchen of the community will be there. The tables will be arranged for family groups, or for miscellaneous company, as may be desired.

Mr. John A. Appleton, a Member of the eminent publishing firm of D. Appleton & Company, died on July 13th, at his home at Clifton, Staten Island. He had not been in robust health since he was thrown from a carriage while driving on Staten Island seven years ago, when he sustained severe injuries. For many years he suffered from a disease of the liver, and it was an aggravation of this complaint that caused his death. His last illness began about three weeks ago. He was a son of Daniel Appleton, the founder of the firm, and was born in 1817. He was a member of the Episcopal Church, and was largely instrumental in building St. John's Church, at Clifton.

The Fifty-three Delegates from America to the International Conference of the Young Men's Christian Associations, which will be held in Exeter Hall, London, England, from July 30th to August 6th left New York on Saturday. This is the ninth triennial meeting, the first having been held in Paris in 1855, and the last in Geneva in 1878. The delegates from the different associations started on the steamer Devonia of the Anchor Line. Though the steamer is bound for Glasgow, the party will land at Londonderry and go through Ireland, cross from Dublin to Liverpool, and thus reach London by Saturday, July 30th, in time for the opening of the conference.

A Lawsuit over a Child's Toys is Pending at Boston, Mass. The facts as related by the Boston Advertiser of July 16th are very curious, and show how superstitious people may become even in this age of educational enlightenment. Some time ago a girl living in Boston, the child of respectable parents, became subject to occasional fits or trances, in which she asserted she had communication with spirits. Her parents belong to the Roman Catholic community, and they sent for a priest to visit her. He complied, and his visits soothed the child. On one occasion he found in her hands some toys—mere dolls made of pasteboard—which the child treasured, stating that in one of her trances they had been given her by the Virgin Mary. The priest obtained possession of them—he says they were given him—and thinking they served to perpetuate the child's delusion, he took them away and carried them in his pocket until they were worn out or lost. Now a suit has been brought to compel the priest to return the dolls or pay heavy damages on the ground of the distress occasioned the child by their loss. Able counsel have been retained by both plaintiff and defendant.

A Young Lady's Remarkable Escape from drowning at an island near Accomac Court House, Va., on July 5th, is an instance of the value of coolness and presence of mind in the midst of danger. She with a few other ladies left their friends, who were enjoying a pic-nic, to bathe. None of the party could swim, and when the current carried her out to sea her friends were unable to rescue her. A young man, however, who was at work in a factory near, saw her peril, and launching a boat rowed toward her. The young lady did not attempt to swim or struggle or she would have been drowned, but she quietly lay still and floated on the water until the boat reached her and she was carried safely to shore. Sometimes young inquirers, anxious about their souls, do not find peace easily because they suppose they must do some great work to merit salvation. To such persons, not to those who are careless and indifferent, the example may be commended of this young lady, who, though conscious of her peril, and anxious to be rescued, lay still, putting her trust in one that was able to save.

The Mate of a Ship was Eaten by a Shark near Land Island light on June 15th. The captain of the schooner Laura Lewis, just returned to Mobile, Ala., from a month's voyage, reports that when outward bound the mate, William Smith, slipped and fell overboard. Those near ran to his assistance, and a rope was immediately thrown overboard, followed by a plank, but before a boat could be lowered, which was not two minutes, the crew were horrified to see an immense shark rise to the surface of the water, seize poor Smith, and bear him bodily out of sight. Captain Randlett lay by the place for nearly twelve hours, but never saw a trace of the unfortunate man so suddenly killed. Several sharks were caught and opened, but nothing was found to indicate that either one was the man eater. The deceased was a native of New York, about 23 years of age, and a resident of Brownsville, Texas, for the past four years. The horror that seized the crew at the sight, and which affects those who merely read of the affair, is only natural. We should doubtless feel much deeper horror did we realize how those who slip and fall in the voyage of life and are eternally lost become the prey of a monster more relentless than the fiercest of the human foes we know in this world (1 Peter 5 : 8).

A Romantic Story About the Dead Millionaire of New Orleans, John Burnside, has been narrated in explanation of his will, by which the bulk of his property is left to Mr. Oliver Beirne. It is said that Andrew Beirne, an Irishman, who many years ago was the capitalist of the region about Greenbrier and the mountains of Virginia, was one afternoon out riding, and stopped to water his horse at a little rivulet or brook. By the side of the stream he found an infant boy carefully wrapped up asleep on a bed of rushes. Startled at the sight, after riding around and hallooing half an hour for the owners of the child, night approaching and wolves being numerous in the forest, he took the child and carried it to his house, where he placed it under the care of his favorite attendants, John and his wife. The parents never turned up, and in due time the boy was named John Burnside, a name suggested by the locality where he was found—by the side of a burn or brook, a word common in Scotland and in the North of Ireland. The first that was generally known of the boy appears to have been as a clerk in Andrew Beirne's mercantile establishment, in which he rose rapidly, and he was ultimately established in New Orleans with Mr. Beirne's son Oliver as his partner, and who is now his heir. This story may be true or it may be a pure invention, but that a poor deserted child should be adopted by a wealthy man, and become a member of his family is not incredible. The change of condition is not so vast as when the sinner ceases to be a stranger, and enters the household of God (Eph. 2 : 19).

A Fireman's Drunken Sleep Involved the loss of a river steamboat, and came near causing the death of the sleeper in New York last week. The fireman had been ashore the previous day and had indulged in a drinking bout, and had drank too much. At daybreak, being alone on board, he connected the tanks in the tug with a hydrant on the wharf, and turned the water on, to make ready for the day's work. While the tanks were filling up he fell asleep and the boat was filled with water. The man awoke when she was sinking and got ashore just in time to save his life, but the boat sank in twenty-five feet of water. The condition of that man asleep while the water poured into the boat was a type of the spiritual state of many men whose awakening will be terrible. We have all need to offer the prayer of the Psalmist (Psa. 13 : 3).

A Rare Jewel is Reported to Have Been found by a citizen of Atlanta, Ga. A local paper of recent date says : "A citizen of Atlanta has in his possession an amethyst he recently found in Rabun County which contains a drop of water in the centre of the stone. There is a specimen of white crystal on exhibition in Philadelphia containing a drop of water, but this is the only instance on record of any amethyst so peculiarly formed. Probably the worth of this peculiar gem would not be recognized by any but a connoisseur who was aware of the rarity of its formation, while to ordinary eyes it appears much like other amethysts. In the day when God makes up His jewels doubtless there will be many surprises, for the world does not always recognize from the outward man the purity of the soul God has cleansed by the blood of Jesus.

An Escaped Criminal Struck Dead by Lightning is the remarkable burden of a despatch sent by the authorities at Knoxville, Tenn., on July 15th to Chief Brooks of the Secret Service Division at Washington. It states that Mabe M. Morrill, the counterfeiter, who escaped from the officers on July 11th, at Morristown, Tenn., was struck dead by lightning on Wednesday last, while lying out in the woods to escape being rearrested, and was buried the next day. It is the rule in society to scoff at the idea that such events are judgments of God ; but it is certain that while the divine long-suffering permits some men to live long who are very wicked, yet others fall suddenly as by a stroke, and that without remedy (Prov. 29 : 1).

An Application for a Sunday Excursion Train has been refused by Mr. Hobart, the general superintendent of the Central Vermont Railroad, who in reply wrote as follows : "It is entirely useless to apply for Sunday trains, because our rules regarding such trains are positive, and we cannot under any circumstances vary them, unless in case of distress, like death, or destruction of property. I know you will, upon reflection, see the propriety of our taking this stand, as we should otherwise run into an encouragement of all sorts of public Sunday gatherings, which inevitably cover a great amount of drunkenness, swearing, and carousing. The public, so far, fully sustains us in our position, and even those interested in camp meetings, and other religious gatherings, especially desire that we should not vary the rule." The Passumpsic Railroad goes still further, and refuses to run any trains of any kind on Sunday, excepting in exceptional cases like those named by Superintendent Hobart.

ZIKLAG ; OR DAVID ENCOURAGING HIMSELF IN GOD.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

' And David was greatly distressed ; for the people spake of stoning him, because the soul of all the people was grieved, every man for his sons and for his daughters : but David encouraged himself in the Lord his God." " And David inquired at the Lord, saying, Shall I pursue after this troop? shall I overtake them? And He answered him, Pursue : for thou shalt surely overtake them, and without fail recover all."—1 SAMUEL 30 : 6, 8.

WE ought to be deeply grateful to God for the inspired history of the life of His servant David. It was a great life, a vigorous life, a life spent in many positions and conditions. I almost rejoice that it was not a faultless life, for its failings and errors are instructive. It is the life of a man after God's own heart ; but still, the life of one who went astray, like a lost sheep, and was recovered by the great Shepherd's grace. By this fact he comes all the nearer to us poor, faulty men and women. I would venture to apply to David the description which has been applied to the world's own poet :

> " A man so various, that he seemed to be > Not one, but all mankind's epitome."

Each one may find something like himself in the long, eventful, and chequered life of the son of Jesse. Among other things we learn this, that where there is faith there is sure to be trial ; for David, though he trusted God so heartily, had good need of all the faith he possessed. In his early days he was hunted like a partridge upon the mountains by Saul, and was constantly in jeopardy of his life. He had so choice a treasure of faith about him, that Satan was for ever trying to plunder him of it. Still, the worst trials that David suffered arose not out of his faith, but out of his want of it. That which he did to avoid trouble brought him into deeper distress than ordinary providences ever caused him. He left the country where he was so ill at ease, which was, nevertheless, thy land, O Emmanuel, and he went away into the land of the Philistines, expecting there to escape from further turmoil. In so doing he transgressed, and fresh trials came upon him, trials of a worse kind than those which had happened to him from the hand of Saul. Brethren, the poet said,

> " The path of sorrow, and that path alone, > Leads to the land where sorrow is unknown," and he spake truly ; for " in the world ye shall have tribulation."

Another lesson is this : Though we shall be tried, yet faith in God is an available resource at all times. Faith is a shield which you may use for warding off every kind of arrow, yea, even the fiery darts of the great enemy ; for this shield cannot be penetrated even by javelins of fire. You cannot be cast into a condition in which faith shall not help you. There is a promise of God suitable for every state, and God has wisdom and skill and love and faithfulness to deliver you out of every possible jeopardy ; and therefore you have only to confide in God, and deliverance is sure to come.

Mainly note this, that even when your trouble has been brought upon you by your own fault faith is still available. When your affliction is evidently a chastisement for grievous transgressions, still trust in the Lord. The Lord Jesus prayed for erring Peter that his faith might not fail him : his hope of recovery lay there. Faith under a sense of guilt is one of those noble kinds of faith at which some are staggered. To my mind the faith of a saint is comparatively easy ; it is the faith of a sinner that is hard. When you know that you have walked uprightly before God, and have not stained your garments, then you can trust Him without difficulty: but, oh, when you have stepped aside, and when at last the heavenly Father makes you smart under His rod—to cast yourself upon Him then is faith indeed. Do not fail to exercise it, for this is the faith which saves.

Let this stand as our preface, and the whole of the sermon will tend to illustrate it.

We notice: First, David's distress—"David was greatly distressed"; secondly, David's encouragement—"David encouraged himself in the Lord his God"; thirdly, David's inquiry—"And David inquired at the Lord"; and then, fourthly, David's answer of peace; the Lord said, "Pursue: for thou shalt surely overtake them, and without fail recover all."

I. First, then, let us look at DAVID'S DISTRESS.

"David was greatly distressed." His city was burnt, his wives were gone, the sons and daughters of his comrades were all captive, and little Ziklag, where they had made a home, smoked before them in blackened ruins. The men of war, wounded in heart, mutinied against their leader, and were ready to stone him. David's fortunes were at their lowest ebb. To understand his position we must go a little further back in his history.

David was greatly distressed, for he had been acting without consulting his God. It was his general habit to wait upon the Lord for direction, for even as a shepherd lad it was his joy to sing, "He leadeth me"; but for once David had gone without leading, and had chosen a bad road. Worn out by the persecution of Saul, in an evil moment his heart failed him, and he said, "I shall surely fall one day by the hand of Saul." This was a dangerous mood. Always be afraid of being afraid. Failing faith means failing strength. Do not regard despondency as merely a loss of joy, view it as draining away your spiritual life. Struggle against it, for it often happens that when faith ebbs sin comes to the flood.

He who does not comfortably trust God will soon seek after comfort somewhere else, and David did so: without asking divine direction he fled to the court of the Philistine chieftain Achish, hoping to be quiet there. See what came of it! When he stood among the ashes of Ziklag he began to understand what an evil and bitter thing it is to lean to our own understanding, to forget God who guides us, and to become a law unto ourselves. Perhaps some of you are in distress in the same way: you have chosen your own path, and now you are caught in the tangled bushes which tear your flesh. You have carved for yourselves, and you have cut your own fingers; you have obtained your heart's desire, and while the meat is yet in your mouth a curse has come with it. You say you "did it for the best;" ay, but it has turned out to be for the worst. David never made a heavier rod for himself than when he thought to avoid all further discomfort by leaving his true place.

Worse than this, if worse can be, David had also followed policy instead of truth. The Oriental mind was, and probably still is, given to lying. Easterns do not think it wrong to tell an untruth; many do it habitually. Just as an upright merchant in this country would not be suspected of a falsehood, so you would not in the olden time have suspected the average Oriental of ever speaking the truth if he could help it, because he felt that everybody else would deceive him and so he must practise great cunning. The golden rule in David's day was, "Do others, for others will certainly do you."

David in his early days was not without the taint of his times. He became the commander of the bodyguard of Achish, king of Gath, and he lived in the royal city. As he found himself rather awkwardly situated in that idolatrous town he said to the king, "If I have now found grace in thine eyes, let them give me a place in some town in the country, that I may dwell there: for why should thy servant dwell in the royal city with thee?" Achish appears to have been almost a convert to the worship of Jehovah, and certainly shines brilliantly in the narrative before us. At David's request he gave him the town of Ziklag. David and his men warred with the various tribes of Canaanites who dwelt in the south of Palestine, and took from them great spoil; but he greatly erred in making Achish believe that he was fighting against Judah.

See the fruit of his falsehood! Ziklag is burned with fire: his wives are captive; and his men speak of stoning him. If you and I ever get away from living by straightforward truth we shall wander into a maze from which it will be hard to extricate ourselves. We should each feel that we can die but we cannot lie, we can starve but we cannot cheat, we can be ground into the dust but we cannot do an unrighteous thing. If it be so, we may count upon the help of God, and may go bravely on under every difficulty. David had left the highway of righteousness, and was stumbling among the dark mountains of craft and deceit. What wonder that David was greatly distressed? Yet was his distress the more severe on another account, for David had sided with the enemies of the Lord's people. He had gone to the Philistines, and their prince had said to him, "I will make thee keeper of mine head for ever." Think of David keeping the head of a Philistine! When Achish gathered the Philistine army to battle with Israel, we read with shame, "And the lords of the Philistines passed on by hundreds, and by thousands: but David and his men passed on in the rereward with Achish."

How dreadfully troubled David must have felt in this false position. Think of David, who was ordained to be king of Israel, marching his armed band to fight his own countrymen! How gracious was the Lord in bringing him out of that perilous position. The Philistine princes suspected him, as well they might, and said to Achish, "What do these Hebrews here?" They were jealous of the high office to which David had been promoted, and fearful of his turning against them during the fight.

Though the Philistine king, like the true man that he was, smoothed it down, he was forced to send David away. What a relief David must have felt! Well might he pen the words of the hundred and twenty-fourth Psalm, "Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped." What a horror would have been upon him if he had actually gone with the Philistines to the battle in which Saul and Jonathan were slain. It would have been a stain upon David all his life.

THE LORD DELIVERED HIM, but He made him to feel His rod at the same time, for no sooner had David reached Ziklag, than he saw that the hand of the Lord was gone out against him, desolation smoked around him, and we do not marvel that David was greatly distressed.

Picture the position of David, in the centre of his band. He has been driven away by the Philistine lords with words of contempt; his men have been sneered at—"What do these Hebrews here? Is not this David?" When he walked with God he was like a prince, and no man dared to sneer at him, but now he has been flouted by the uncircumcised Philistine, and has been glad to sneak back to his little city, ashamed of himself. It is terrible when a man of God falls into such a position that he gives the enemy opportunity to blaspheme God, and to despise His servant.

It is terrible when even worldlings scout the inconsistency of the professed follower of Jesus. "What do these Hebrews here?" is the sarcastic question of the world. "How comes a professing Christian to be acting as we do? Look, he is trying to cultivate our acquaintance, and pass for one of ourselves, and yet he calls himself a servant of God!" They begin to point, as they did at Peter—"Thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth, for thy speech betrayeth thee." "What doest thou here, Elijah?" is the voice which comes from God's mouth, and the lips of His adversaries repeat it. When the child of God feels that he is in that predicament, and in great trouble too, it is not strange that he is greatly distressed.

At the back of this came bereavement. His wives were gone. He was a man of a large, affectionate, tender heart, and what grief it must have been to him! Nor was he a solitary mourner; but all those brave fellows who were joined with him were bereaved too. Worst of all, he was now forsaken by his followers. Those who had been with him in his worst fortunes now upbraided him with their calamity. Why did he leave the city to go off to help these enemies of the Lord, the uncircumcised Philistines? He might have known better; and they grew indignant, and one said, "Let us stone him;" to which others answered, "Let us do it at once." They were evidently in a great rage. He stands there faint with weeping, a friendless, forsaken man, with his very life in danger from furious mutineers. Do you wonder that it is written, "And David was greatly distressed"?

There is the picture before you: now let us see a fairer scene as we observe what David did under the circumstances. When he was at his worst he was seen at his best.

II. Secondly, let us consider

DAVID'S ENCOURAGMENT.

"And David encouraged himself." That is well, David! He did not at first attempt to encourage anybody else; but he encouraged himself. Some of the best talks in the world are those which a man has with himself. He who speaks to everybody except himself is a great fool. I think I hear David say, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God; for I will yet praise him." David encouraged himself.

But he encouraged himself "in the Lord his God," namely, in Jehovah. That is the surest way of encouraging yourself. Do you not feel a wind from the hills? The air blows strong and fresh from the everlasting mountains, now that the man of God is looking to God alone. He is no longer in bondage to craft, but he is a man again, strong in the strength of God; for he casts himself away from all earthly trusts, and encourages himself in the Lord.

He did not sit down in sullen despair, nor did he think, as Saul did, of resorting to wrong means for help; but he went, sinner as he was, confessing all his wrong-doing, straight away to his God, and asked for the priest to come that he might speak with him in the name of the Most High. Brothers and sisters, if you are in trouble, and your trouble is mixed with sin, if you have afflicted yourselves by your backslidings and perversities, nevertheless I pray you look nowhere else for help but to the God whom you have offended. Cling to Him by faith; hold fast by Him in hope. Say, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." Resolve, "I will not let Thee go." Guilty as you are, it is good for you to draw nigh unto God.

Let us try to conceive of the way in which David would encourage himself in the Lord his God. Standing amid those ruins he would say, "Yet the Lord does love me, and I love Him. My experience of divine love is not a dream, I know it is not a myth or a delusion. I have known the Lord, and I have had near and dear intercourse with Him, and I know that He changes not, and therefore He will help me. His mercy endureth for ever. He will put away my transgression." Thus he encouraged himself in the Lord his God.

Brethren, do you need an interpretation of this parable? Can you not see its application to yourselves? Are you not saying, "The Lord called me by His grace, brought me out from my love of the world, and made me a priest and a king unto Himself, and can He leave me? Is not the oil of His Spirit still upon me? Can He cast me off? He separated me to Himself, and gave me to know that my destiny was not like that of the ungodly world, but that He had ordained me and chosen me to be His servant for ever—will He leave me to perish? Shall His enemy rejoice over me?" Thus may you encourage yourself in God.

Then he would go over all the past deliverances which he had experienced. I see the picture which passed like a panorama before David's eye. He saw himself when he slew the lion and the bear. Did God deliver him then, and will He not deliver him now? He pictured himself going out to meet the giant Goliath, with nothing but a sling and a stone, and coing back with the monster's head in his hand; and he argued, "Will He not rescue me now?" He cheers himself, as one had done before him, with the inference, "If the Lord had meant to destroy me, He would not have showed me such things as these."

Come, now, dear children of God, take down your diaries and refer to the days when the Lord helped you again and again. How many times has He blessed you? You could not count them, for God has been so gracious and tender that He has aided you ten thousand times already. Has He changed in love, in faithfulness, in power? God forbid that we should indulge such a wicked thought. He is still the same, and so let us encourage ourselves in Him.

"Alas," say you, "I have done wrong." I know you have; but He has not. If your confidence were in yourself, that wrong of yours might crush your hope; but since your confidence is in God, and He has not changed, why should you fear? "Oh, but I am so sinful." Yes; I know you are, and so you were when He first looked upon you in love. If His love had sought to come to you by the way of merit it never would have reached you; but it comes to you by way of free, rich, sovereign grace, and therefore it will come to you evermore. Do you not feel refreshed this morning as you think of what the Lord has done? and do you not feel that after doing so much it would be wrong now to distrust Him? Will you not even now encourage yourself in your God?

Perhaps David at that moment perceived that this crushing blow was sent in infinite tenderness to clean him right out of the condition into which he had fallen. The hardest blow that our God ever strikes, if it puts us right and separates us from self and sin, and carnal policy, is a coup de grace, a blow of love. If it ends our life of selfishness and brings us back into the life of trust, it is a blessed blow. When God blesses His people most it is by terrible things in righteousness. He smote David to heal him. He fetched him out from the snare of the Philistine fowler, and delivered him from the noisome pestilence of heathen association, by a way that brought the tears into his eyes till he had no more power to weep. Now the servant of the Lord begins to see the wonderful hand of God, and he shall yet say, "Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept Thy word."

I, the preacher of this hour, beg to bear my little witness that the worst days I have ever had have turned out to be my best days, and when God has seemed most cruel to me He has then been most kind. If there is anything in this world for which I would bless Him more than for anything else it is for pain and affliction. I am sure that in these things the richest, tenderest love has been manifested toward me. Love-letters from heaven are often sent in black-edged envelopes. The cloud that is black with horror is big with mercy. We may not ask for trouble, but if we were wise we should look upon it as the shadow of an unusually great blessing. Blessed be the Lord, whose way is in the whirlwind, and who makes the clouds to be the dust of His feet. May some such thoughts as these help you to encourage yourself in God as David did.

III. And now, thirdly, we have

DAVID INQUIRING OF GOD.

"And David inquired of the Lord, saying, shall I pursue after this troop? Shall I overtake them?"

Note well that as soon as David had come to be right with God he longed to know the Lord's mind as to his next action. You and I would have said, "Let us hasten after these marauders; let us not stop an instant, we can pray as we march, or at some other time. Haste! haste! for the lives of our wives and children are at stake." It was a time for hurry if ever there was; but, as the good proverb says, "Prayer and provender hinder no man's journey." David wisely stops. "Bring hither the ephod," cries he, and he waits till the oracle answers his inquiries. He will not march till the Lord shall give the word of command. This is well. Oh that we could always keep up this submission of heart! Oh that we never leaned to our own understanding, but trusted solely in God!

Observe, that David takes it for granted that his God is going to help him. He only wants to know how it is to be done. "Shall I pursue? shall I overtake?" When you, my brother, are inquiring of the Lord, do not approach Him as if He would not help you, or could hardly be expected to aid you. You would not like your children to ask a favor of you as if they were afraid of their lives to speak to you. I am sure you would not like a dear child, whatever wrong he had been doing, to feel a suspicion of your love, and doubt your willingness to help; for whatever he has done he is your child still. David has encouraged himself in his God, and he is sure that God is ready to save him; all that he wants to know is how he is himself to act in the business.

It is to be remarked, however, that David does not expect that God is going to help him without his doing his best. He inquires, "Shall I pursue? shall I overtake?" He means to be

UP AND DOING.

Sad as he is, and faint as he is, he is ready for action. Many who get into trouble seem to expect an angel to come and lift them up by the hair of their heads; but angels have other matters in hand. Brother, you will have to work and labor to extricate yourself from debt and difficulty, and so the Lord will hear your prayer. The rule is to trust in God to smite the Amalekites, and then to march after them as if it all depended upon yourself. There is a God-reliance which arouses all our self-reliance and yokes it to the chariot of providence, making the man ready for action because God is with him.

It is instructive to notice that, although David was thus ready for action, trusting in God, he greatly distrusted his own wisdom; for he asked, "Shall I pursue them?" That man is wise who counts his own wisdom to be folly; and he who lays his judgment down at Jesus' feet, is a man of soundest judgment. He who tarries till the divine wisdom shall guide him, he shall be expert and prudent in all things.

David also distrusted his own strength, though quite ready to use what he had; for he said, "Shall I overtake?" Can my men march fast enough to overtake these robbers? And what a blessed state of heart that is when we have no strength of our own, but seek unto God! It is good to be insufficient, and to find God all-sufficient.

I pause here a minute and pray God ever to keep you and me in just the condition into which He brought His servant David. I do not care so much about his overtaking the robbers, and all that: the glory was to have overtaken his God, and to be waiting at His feet. He could not be brought to this without his city being burnt, without his being bereaved, robbed, and ready to die by the hands of his own warriors; but it was worth all the cost to be brought to rest on the bare arm of God, and to wait in childlike dependence at the great Father's door.

IV. We close our sermon with the fourth note, which is a note of jubilate, and praise unto God, who helped His servant.

DAVID'S ANSWER

of peace. The Lord heard his supplication. He says, "In my distress I cried unto the Lord and He heard me." But mark this, he was not delivered without further trial. David marched with his six hundred men on foot after the foe, with all speed, and the band became so worn and weary that one third of them could not ford the brook Besor, which though usually dry, was probably at that time flowing with a strong stream. Many a leader would have given up the chase with one out of three of his troop in hospital, but David pursued with his reduced force.

When God means to bless us, He often takes away a part of the little strength we thought we had. We did not think our strength equal to the task, and the Lord takes away a portion even of the little power we had. Our God does not fill till He has emptied. Two hundred men must be rent away from David's side before God could give him victory, for He meant to have David's whole force to be exactly equal to the four hundred Amalekites who fled, that He might make the victory the more memorable and renowned. Expect then, O troubled one, that you will be delivered, but know that your sorrow may yet deepen, that you may have all the greater joy by and bye.

David's victory was perfect. We are told over and over again that "David recovered all." Nothing was lost: not a piece of money nor a garment, not an ox nor a sheep, much less a child, or one of woman kind—"David recovered all." How well the Lord works when He once lays His hand to it. "He will perfect that which concerneth me." Salvation is of the Lord, and it is an everlastingly complete salvation. Trust ye in the Lord for ever, for in the Lord Jehovah there is everlasting strength." He will work, and work perfectly, till He shall say, "It is finished." The battle is the Lord's, and His saints shall be more than conquerors.

Oh, brothers and sisters, the deeper your trouble the louder will be your song, if you can but trust in God and walk in fellowship with Jesus. Little skiffs that keep near the land carry but small cargoes, and their masters see little save the shore; but they that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters, these see the works of the Lord and His wonders in the deep. It is something to be out on the wide main in a terrific storm, when the ship is tossed to and fro like a ball, when the heavens are mixed up with the ocean, and all is uproar. Then great thunder contends with the roaring of the sea, and the lightning flames are quenched by the boiling of the mighty waves. When you reach the shore again, you know a gladness which the landsman cannot feel, and you have a tale to tell to your children, and your children's children, of what you have seen in the deep, such as lubberly landsmen scarce can understand. As for those who dwell at ease, what do they see? You who have been in the battle can sing of victory, and, pointing to your experience, can exclaim, "This is David's spoil."

TRUST IN THE LORD

your God. Believe also in His Son Jesus. Get rid of sham faith, and really believe. Get rid of a professional faith, and trust in the Lord at all times, about everything. "What, trust Him about pounds, shillings, and pence?" Assuredly. I dread the faith that cannot trust God about bread and garments—it is a lying faith. Depend upon it, that is not the solid, practical faith of Abraham, who trusted God about his tent and his cattle, and about a wife for his son. That faith which made David trust God about the sons and daughters and the spoil, that is the sort of faith for you and for me. If God cannot be trusted about loaves and fishes how shall He be trusted about the things of eternity and the glories which are yet to be revealed? Stay yourself on God with an everyday faith.

Faith in God is the exercise of

SANCTIFIED COMMON-SENSE.

Somebody called me "superstitious" for trusting God as to His answering prayer, but I reply that he is superstitious who does not trust the living God. He who believes in the power of the greatest of all forces, and trusts in the surest of all truths, is but acting rationally. The purest reason approves reliance upon God. The end shall declare the wisdom of believing God.

God bless you, brethren, and if any of you have never trusted God at all, nor rested in His dear Son, may you be brought to do so at once. May you see your self-righteousness burned like Ziklag, and all your carnal hopes carried away captive, and may you then encourage yourselves in Christ, for He will recover all for you, and give you spoil besides, and there shall be joy and rejoicing. The Lord be with you. Amen.

Life among Gipsies in England.

LIFE AMONG THE GIPSIES.

The Origin of Gipsies—Their Treatment in Various Countries—Number and Condition—Mr. G. Smith Visits a Fortune-Teller—Begins a Crusade Against Gipsy Misery and Ignorance—Visit to a Kraal—Alice and the Fair Gipsy "Model."

THE accompanying illustrations depict two scenes associated with the evangelistic and philanthropic efforts among gipsies of Mr. George Smith, of Coalville, England, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 17, 1880.

The origin of the gipsies is involved in some obscurity. The treatment they have received has not been of the gentlest. In Spain they were banished under the severest penalties. In Italy they were not allowed to encamp more than two nights in the same place. In Germany they were shot down like wild beasts. In England, during the reign of Elizabeth, it was felony, without the "benefit of clergy," to be seen in their company. But in 1768 and 1783 measures were taken by several of the European Governments for the education of these poor outcasts in the habits of a civilized life, with very encouraging results.

Mr. Smith estimates that there are from 15,000 to 20,000 gipsies in the United Kingdom, who live in tents and vans in the by-lanes and attend fairs, shows, etc. Of this 20,000, 19,500 cannot read a sentence or write a single letter. The highest state of their education is to make crosses, signs, and symbols, and to ask people to tell them the names of the streets and read the mile-posts for them. The full value of money they know perfectly well.

There are 8,000 children of school age loitering about the tents and camps and not learning even so much as the alphabet. Caravans move about the country with "fat babies," "wax-work models," "wonders of the age," "the greatest giant in the world," "a living skeleton," "menageries," "rifle galleries," and similar enterprises; and there are families of children very few of whom are receiving any education, and who live together, regardless of either sex or age, in one small van.

To find out what gipsy fortune-telling was, Mr. Smith says, "I used to walk after working hours from Tunstall to Fenton, a distance of six miles, to see 'old Elijah Cotton,' a well-known character in the Potteries, who got his living by it, to ask him all sorts of questions. Sometimes he would look at my hands, at other times he would put my hand into his and hold it while he was reading out of the Bible, and burning something like brimstone-looking powder—the forefinger of the other hand had to rest upon a particular passage or verse; at other times he would give me some of this yellow-looking stuff in a small paper to wear against my left breast, and some I had to burn exactly as the clock struck twelve at night, under the strictest secrecy. The stories this fortune-teller used to relate to me as to his wonderful power over the spirits of the other world were very amusing, and this kind of rubbish he used to relate to those who paid him their shillings and half-crowns to have their fortunes told."

About a year ago Mr. Smith's attention was directed by Providence to the wretched condition of the gipsy children in a way he thought it perilous to disregard. With characteristic heartiness he at once threw himself into the work, and among other appeals for co-operation through the medium of the press, a letter was set to the London Standard, which, on the 15th of August, 1879, brought forth a leading article on the subject.

Mr. Smith then entered upon the crusade against gipsy misery and ignorance. Having learned experience with the canal boatmen, he now finds ample employment in the tent of the gipsy, and finds it to be as filthy and as repulsive as the cabin of the canal boat. Human beings of both sexes and of all ages are huddled together without regard to comfort. Children are born, suffer from disease, and die in the canvas hovels, and are committed to the dust by the roadside. One old woman told Mr. Smith "that she had had sixteen children, fifteen of whom are alive, several of them being born in a roadside tent. She was married out of one of these tents; and her brother died and was buried out of a tent near Ashby-de-la-Zouch." The experience of this old crone is akin to that of most of her class.

In prosecution of his self-imposed labor Mr. Smith went to London, in the suburbs of which city he estimates there cannot be less than 2,000 gipsy families. They are settled upon waste places, of every kind. Let us accompany our philanthropist and visit one of these gipsy kraals. A short ride by rail, and a tramp through a densely populated district, and we are upon the camping-ground. It is a spacious yard, entered through a gate, and surrounded with houses, whose back-yards form the inclosure. There are three caravans and three kraals erected there, and as it is Sunday afternoon, nearly all the inhabitants are at home. The kraals are not all constructed on the same pattern—two are circular in form, and the third is square. The floor is common earth, and very uneven in places.

Alice, the gipsy mistress of this abode, is a woman over fifty, with a face the color of leather, and vigor enough to do any amount of work. Her husband, a white-haired old man, with look of innocent wonder in his face, sits on a lump of wood, warming his hands over the fire. There is also a handsome young woman sitting in the only chair in the place, daughter of the old couple; and her brother lies extended on a bed made of indescribable things in one portion of the cabin where the tiles in the roof show no openings to the sky. His wife, a thoroughbred gipsy—sits nursing a baby, their first-born, on the edge of the bed. The wood walls are covered with old clothes, sacking, and a variety of odd things, fastened in their places by wooden skewers, and adorned with a few pots and pans used in cooking. Here for seven winters this gipsy family has resided, defying the severest frosts and snows. Alice tells us that the whole yard costs only two shillings a week. This woman is the mother of eighteen children, of whom eleven are living.

Drawn up close by is a caravan occupied by two young women, thorough gipsies in face and tongue, who chaff us as to the object of our visit, and beg hard for some kind remembrance to be left with them. We do not accept their invitation to walk up, but pass down the yard, by heaps of manure and refuse of all kinds, by another kraal, where a bucket containing coal is burning, and a young man lies recumbent on a dirty mattress, and a little bantam keeps watch beside him, to the steps of another caravan, where from the sounds we hear, high jinks are going on with some children. At the sound of a tap on the door there is an instant hush, and a girl of nineteen, with a baby in her arms, asks us to enter. We look up in amazement; the girl's face appears like an apparition—so fair, so beautiful, so like some face we have seen elsewhere, that we are confused and puzzled. In a moment the mystery is solved. We had seen that face before in several of the choicest canvases that have hung in recent years upon the walls of the Academy; we have met the fairest gipsy model that ever stood before the students of the Academy; the favorite alike of the young artist and the veteran head of his profession. Annie has a face of exquisite Grecian form, and a hand so delicate that it has been painted more than once in "the portrait of a titled lady."

When she was a very little girl, she told us, hawking laces in a basket one day, a gentleman met her at the West-End who was a painter, and from that day to the present Annie has earned a living—and at times of great distress maintained all the family—by the fees she receives as a model. Her mother had had nine children, of whom eight are living; and three of the family are constantly employed as models. Annie is as modest and gentle voiced as she is beautiful. Her grandfather, she said, was a "fine man," and lived to the age of 104. He went about crying "chairs to mend" in that very locality up to within a short time of his death, and all the old ladies employed him because he was so handsome.

Mr. William Noble's Visit to Cetewayo, the Captive King of the Zulus.

MR. WILLIAM NOBLE'S VISIT TO CETEWAYO.

DURING the recent visit of Mr. William Noble, the founder of the Blue Ribbon Army, to South Africa, he had an interview with the late King of the Zulus. As the British Government never allows any one to see his majesty without his special permission, Mr. Noble was fortunate in obtaining the royal consent to a visit on March 23d. Accompanied by Rev. Dr. Hole, Mr. Lister, of Rondebush, his son (who has the custody of Cetewayo), and an interpreter, Mr. Noble on that day was ushered into the presence of the captive sovereign.

Describing the interview in an interesting speech delivered at Hoxton Hall, London, on his return, Mr. Noble said "From what I had heard I thought I was going to see a man specially made to terrify people, but I had occasion to modify that opinion. On entering the apartment where he was I found him with his attendants. He never allows his wives to sit with him. He received me in the most kindly manner, but did not make free at first. The interpreter introduced me, and the king rose and shook my hand. He did not at all look as if he were going to murder me.

"Having my concertina with me, I played a bugle call. He had heard that before, on the battlefield. He clapped his hands and exclaimed, 'Ha, ha!' I played 'My Grandfather's Clock,' when he again clapped his hands. Having asked whether my friends and I might sing a hymn to him, he assented, took off his hat and told his attendants to uncover. We sung 'Jesus, lover of my soul,' which seemed to make a great impression upon him. He knows, however, but little of Jesus. When a lady showed him a picture of the Saviour, he simply inquired 'Why that man's hands were upraised?' The same lady asked him whether he was not much better off where he was than at the Castle? His reply was: 'What is this apartment to me? One place is as good as another to a captive.'

"I told him we had an enemy in England, which killed 60,000 of us every year, and added, 'We have an army fighting against it, but we have not won the victory yet.' He said: 'Who is the enemy?' I replied 'Square-face, the square-face you drink.' Gin is called square-face out there. Cetewayo receives an allowance of gin with his rations every day.

"Cetewayo wanted my concertina, but having engaged to play it at several other places I was unable to oblige him. I promised that on my return, my friends at Hoxton Hall would subscribe and send him a new concertina."

It is very gratifying to hear from the Cape that Mr. Noble's visit was attended with important results to the cause he has at heart. The difficulties in the way of temperance reform are in some respects much greater there than at home. He succeeded, however, in giving a timely and valuable impulse to the local organizations. All his meetings, whether for soldiers or civilians, were remarkably successful. Some hundreds having signed the pledge, and donned the blue ribbon, a council was appointed for the purpose of continuing the work. These services were fittingly and handsomely acknowledged by the colonists in an address of great warmth and kindliness presented to him at his last meeting.

Perhaps, however, the most important result to the cause of Gospel temperance connected with Mr. Noble's visit to South Africa, is the restoraetion to health on which he has been so heartily congratulated. As the originator of the Blue Ribbon movement in England, and as one who has brought to the prosecution of his work, talents, and energies which mere money could not have secured, he certainly deserves the cordial sympathy and respect of every well-wisher to the cause he has so heartily espoused, and so successfully advocated.

THE BOYS OF CITY STREETS.

I HAVE referred to some of the difficulties of conducting classes or meetings for youths such as I have written of, and particularly to that arising from the extreme difficulty of predicting from the behavior of any particular lad one evening what it may be the next. Let me give an illustration:

One of the lads, already mentioned, came into the room one evening, and, before the whole class, went straight up to another, caught him by the throat, and was going to strike him there and then, had he not been promptly stopped, though not in time to prevent his receiving in return from his opponent a blow across his face from a strap, after which he went back to his seat, and gave vent to his angry feelings in a burst of crying.

On inquiring the cause of it all, I was told that the lad attacked had stolen twopence from the pocket of the other. He had, however, a defence, I found—that the twopence had been lent by himself some time before, but not returned, so that he simply took it instead of waiting longer for it. The assailant, meantime, poor lad, still wept, as if broken-hearted, and as he looked ill and half-starved, I went to him, asked him to follow me, and I ordered him a cup of coffee, which he took thankfully. While he was drinking the coffee, I ventured to refer to Matt. 5: 39, and to showing kindness to an offender, whereby "coals of fire" would be "heaped upon his head," etc. He was still weeping; but when I mentioned heaping coals of fire, he said, with a quick toss of the head, "Shall I, mum? Then I'll try," and presently went back to the meeting with seemingly a load off his mind. There was perhaps some room for fear lest he should act on a too literal rendering of the words. However, the meeting ended peacefully, and as he passed out of the room I reminded him again of his promise to forgive and forget his friend's insult. "All right, mum," said he, and I flattered myself that my peace-making had been successful; but alas! I have to admit that, as soon as the two met again, they "had it out" all the same, as I heard from the others. I may say, too, that on hearing this I felt alarmed, lest from the "having it out" some serious harm might result, and one or both be prevented from coming to the class again.

It was only two evenings later, however, that on going down to the schoolroom I heard singing, and, opening the door, there were the two enemies, seated one each side of the fire, singing one of Sankey's tunes, and looking as happy and innocent as if they could not know what a quarrel meant. I said nothing about the fight.

Equally mysterious seemed to me the action of a lad of sixteen who announced his arrival at a Bible-class, while I was reading, by a sharp slap on the face of another lad, who was sitting perfectly still and harmless. Finding me becoming rather disturbed about it, however, one of the class got up, and with a polite bow assured me in the coolest manner that there was "no harm meant—it is only his way of saying Good afternoon, mum!"

But I should be very sorry to give the impression that difficulty and discouragement are all that is to be met with in this work. It is quite otherwise. I am very glad to say, on the contrary, that in the case of almost every lad who has come to these classes I can see reason to believe that they have had an influence for good, and this is the greatest possible encouragement.

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Mrs. Clemence and her Visitors—A Cool Announcement of Suicide—The Rescued Boy's Gratitude—Distillery Employees like Seasoned Casks—Supply and Demand—Market Day.

"ANYTHING to pay?" asked the rough boys, in reply to Mrs. Clemence's invitation.

A negative being given, they were soon out of sight. On the following evening they did really appear again, after several bashful attempts to ring the bell.

For several weeks they had come, on one or two nights, according to convenience, and had become marvellously humanized in the interval. But on this particular night one of the lads was missing.

Mrs. Clemence, standing before the other two, asked:

"Where is Ben?"

"Please, missus, he's been and drowned hisself!"

"What!" asked Mrs. Clemence aghast. "Drowned himself?"

"Yes!" chimed in the two boys alternately. "His father came home drunk and gave him a thrashing, and told him that if he came nigh the house again he'd kill him. So he said good-bye to his mother and his little sisters, and he's gone to drown hisself."

The relators of the tragedy were wonderfully calm about it. But still Mrs. Clemence's nerves had hardly recovered the dreadful information when she went to bed that night.

The next morning, during breakfast time, a back appeared every now and then at the other side of the window, and a figure seemed to be crouching—dodging—among the shrubs that surrounded it. On going out at the glass door to inspect this mystery, Mrs. Clemence discovered that the unknown was no other than the drowned Ben!

On expressing her astonishment at the story of the previous night, the lad explained that through some accident, or a piece of carelessness, he had let his master's prize fowls escape from their yard. He had consequently got into a scrape and been dismissed. This news had enraged the drunken father, and had brought upon his son a heavy castigation, with threats that if ever entered the house again he would kill him. It was after this scene poor Ben confessed that he had threatened to drown himself.

He was given some food, and consoled by a present of a shilling wherewith to get himself a night's lodging. All that day he hung about the house, seeming to consider it a refuge. And through all his future experiences he manifested a grateful devotion to the friends that had sympathized in his trouble.

When his father and mother both died, a short time after, he evinced the deepest interest in his younger sisters, who by his earnest efforts were admitted to a well-known orphan home, and frequently visited by him. He became himself a steady workman on the line.

But we are striding on too far in the family details of poor Ben's history. In the meantime Mrs. Clemence's small class prospered, and was much appreciated. She had different boys on different nights, for her room was too small to hold many. Each one loved her as a friend; and that one evening-hour gradually gained her an influence over them, which many people recognized, and yet called "incredible!"

Love, that all-powerful force, was her secret. Nothing else. She loved her Lord; and she loved the lads. And the expenditure was not thrown away, for her efforts were more than rewarded. Even their homes became altered by the second-hand force of this mysterious talisman.

For these young fellows had so lived in the atmosphere of spirits, that they themselves, as well as their fathers, some of whom happened to be employed in the same line, had absorbed into their very natures a passion that was now almost hereditary. The constant smell and taste of spirituous liquor so completely pervaded their very existence, that, like poor Banting and his beer, they lived upon it certainly more than they did upon other food.

What was the consequence? A youth called Hutchinson explained it. He had happily arrested himself just in time, and had gone from a most remunerative post within these deadly walls to a safer one outside them, where he received lower pay, but found a more useful and respectable employment.

"They become," he said, speaking of the employees, "like seasoned casks! they can hold any quantity."

Fearful thought! a life of inebriation! But no more fearful than it is true.

"But what can we do?" said the distiller's brother one day to Mrs. Clemence. "There must be distilleries! Some one must keep them up."

Mr. Clemence could not be within ear-shot and withhold a reply to this very decided assertion. So he said abruptly:

"Prove your position! This is but fair before you maintain it."

"Prove it!" was Mr. Anthony Coffin's exclamation. "I do not understand you!"

"Why should this, that has proved the impoverishing evil of our country, be daily manufactured by us?" said Mr. Clemence. "Have we any right to make it and to put it before the people who depend on us for their supplies?"

"There is a demand for it!" answered Mr. Coffin hotly.

"A demand," said Mr. Clemence. "We have taught the people to like it by putting it so plentifully before them. Supply always creates demand."

"Ha! ha! ha! I like that!" laughed his visitor. "I always heard it the other way. You have reversed the fact."

"Not at all!" was the answer. "I acknowledge that demand enforces supply. But, on the other hand, does not my assertion precede yours? How can the people demand what they have never seen or heard of? Otherwise, whence the world-wide custom of shop-window display? The passer by beholds, admires, covets, and purchases.

"The only difference between this manufacture and others is, that this is a traffic that does not on exhibition show its true colors. The draper exhibits his goods in their gay hues or useful substance; the baker shows his loaves of bread; and the butcher his joints of meat; but the spirit-vault exhibits flaring gas-lights, gay bottles, and fancy names for every description of liquor, while the real nature of the liquor itself, with that of its effects, is as far as possible concealed from view.

Had not Mr. Anthony Coffin been less a bigot than his brother, and therefore more likely to be open to reason on these points, Mr. Clemence would have thought it useless to throw away his words, however true they might be; but he knew well, that in spite of a little bravado, which Mr. Anthony generally used, like the Newfoundland dog's shake, to throw off the ungenial drops, he was not without his own serious thoughts on the subject.

He now answered, "Of course it would." And then added, "You must in reason expect every trade to show its best side outermost. No doubt your excellent drapers and butchers and bakers are not altogether perfect. Their goods are not always as pure as they look. Depend upon it, sir, you will find counterfeits and dissembling everywhere in this world, even among your best people."

"Then my point is gained," said Mr. Clemence. "If you acknowledge that counterfeit and dissembling are counterfeit and dissembling, you acknowledge that cheating is cheating; and dishonesty, I presume, you consider criminal."

"Of course!" said Mr. Anthony. "Of course I do; but what then?"

"Then what leg has your manufacture of spirits to stand upon? If it be a traffic whose sole support is a falsity, and whose very existence depends upon concealment, is it not criminal?

"But take it in another light. Is not the inhalement of intoxicating liquor at the root of almost all our crime?" Mr. Clemence asked.

"Yes! that is the truth; and a very great misfortune, and traceable entirely to the folly and wickedness of the people themselves," said Mr. Coffin.

And here Mrs. Clemence's feelings forbade her to keep silence any longer.

"O Mr. Coffin!" she interposed; "that is not fair! indeed it is not! It is unjust. I really think so. I have heard a man say, 'I could pass one public-house; but when it comes to thirteen of them, I can't get home sober.

"In a sea-port town, lately, I was told of a short street in which nine public-houses are standing side by side, ranged like a line of concealed hells, to entrap the sailors immediately on their arrival and strip them of their wages, yes! and their character too."

"Well, that is by no means a common occurrence. It can only be by chance there," was the reply.

"But we have left the point of our discussion," was the smiling rejoinder of the antagonist. "The discussion began with the question, 'Ought there to be distilleries, or not?' I say, the people will have the spirits."

"And we maintain," said Mr. Clemence, "that the supply of spirits is forced upon them everywhere. The very drunkards, your best customers, are begging to have the traffic done away with."

"I am not so sure of that," was the answer. "I think you are mistaken there."

"If you would visit much among the lower classes in any town, English or Scotch or even Irish, you would find this to be a fact," said Mrs. Clemence. "It has been too often tested to prove a mistake. They hate the drink, because it has ruined them. Multitudes of them wish—no, long!—to give it up."

"But like all people of your way of thinking, you leave out from your argument the respectable men and women who have not become addicted to intoxication."

"There will soon be very few of these left at the rate we are now going," Mr. Clemence said.

"Excuse me! I beg your pardon! I was going to say, It is not fair to judge all by a few wretched specimens, who cannot control themselves," was the rejoinder.

"A few wretched specimens!" said husband and wife in one breath.

"I mean, you must not class the sober and intemperate all together," said Mr. Anthony, getting up to conclude the conversation.

"Those who are sober do not need it, and those who are intemperate ought not to have it," said Mrs. Clemence. "Won't you consider the subject earnestly? and if you do so, do it with prayer," she whispered.

Market-day in Shenstone! Cattle are huddled together in close pens; sheep chorus forth their piteous bleats; horses stand in lines, head to head and tail to tail. Presently the loud crack of a whip is heard, and the anxious dealer is seen flourishing a curling lash above his head, while a man from the crowd trots a heavy farm horse, with its lumbering tread, backward and forward across the square. Head in air, and tail tied into a tight round ball with plaited straw, the exhibited horse accomplishes its given number of paces, and is discussed, bargained over, and bought; while a smaller animal, with its ponyish shamble, all rough and shaggy, clatters along in its predecessor's footsteps. The crowds gather more and more densely. The excitement heightens.

"A glass of spirits!" "A drop!" "Something cooling!" "Something warm!" becomes the general demand in all directions as business slackens, and the crowds melt into the saloons and spirit-booths that line the way.

As night draws on the sights and sounds will be bacchanalian; but all the ladies and gentlemen will be in the seclusion of their homes and safe from the evening's horrors. So it has been hitherto at least.

To-night there is a change. Conspicuously standing in close juxtaposition to the Market Square, you may see a pinnacled and gabled building. From its various summits flags are streaming in all directions. One large pendant, crimson in color, bears the honorable title, "Refreshment Rooms" on its one surface; while on the other it suggests to the salesman and the purchaser alike the words "Reading and Refreshment."

A huge black-and-white standard invites the passer-by to enter the precincts in terms like these, "Strike your bargains here! Capital accommodation!" while a painted swinging-board and colored lamp both testify to the fact that "Hot tea and coffee" abide there. Other and smaller bills make mention of "lemonade, ginger-beer, and fruit syrups," anything and everything to tempt the eye and mind and taste.

The placards are discussed, and the general appearance of the new building scanned. Presently one, and another, and another goes in. Each stays longer than he had intended. When they all come out again they point with their thumbs over their shoulders to their friends to "try that place!"

Satisfactory, isn't it? This is the best advertisement! There is nothing like personal recommendation, and the new coffee-house is getting it plentifully.

MOSES AND THE MAGICIANS.

S.S. Lesson for July 31. Ex. 7 : 1-17. Golden Text, Acts 7 : 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

MOSES and Aaron had been prepared by the reverses which they had met with, to recognize their own nothingness, and therefore to become instruments small enough in the hand of God to work for Him without subtracting from His glory. The Lord said unto Moses, "See, I have made thee a god unto Pharaoh; and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet." Moses knew now that God's presence with him made him to be a God unto Pharaoh, and not his own learning in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and his might in word and in deed. The magicians also were learned, and they were mighty after man's wisdom, but God was about to put their boasted science to the test, and He said, "The Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I stretch forth mine hand upon Egypt, and bring out the children of Israel from among them."

Thus far everything had appeared to be unsuccessful, but true faith is not hindered by appearances. Moses and Aaron were ready to go and stand a second time before Pharaoh, although the issue of their first interview was not only a decided refusal, but also the means of bringing upon the children of Israel an aggravation of their suffering, and of extinguishing the little ray of faith and hope which had dawned upon them. When they came in and stood before Pharaoh, Aaron cast down his rod and it became a serpent as God had said; but the king was fully persuaded that Egypt was able to produce the same miracle, and he called for his wise men and sorcerers (who were, no doubt, the spiritualists of those days and mediums of demons), and they, in imitation of Aaron, cast down their rods and they became serpents. What, then, was God no mightier than they? Yes, for "Aaron's rod swallowed up their rods."

This proof of God's superior power, however, had no influence with the King of Egypt; his heart was hardened. Then the Lord commanded Moses to go out in the morning and meet Pharaoh by the river, "And thou shalt say unto him, The Lord God of the Hebrews hath sent me unto thee, saying, Let My people go, that they may serve Me in the wilderness: and, behold, hitherto thou wouldest not hear. Thus saith the Lord, In this thou shalt know that I am the Lord: behold, I will smite with the rod that is in mine hand upon the waters which are in the river, and they shall be turned to blood." And Moses did so; and the awful plague came to pass, so that the river, the streams, and ponds of water, even the water in vessels, became blood; "there was blood throughout all the land of Egypt." To add to the horrors of this time the fish in the river died, and under the hot sun of Egypt putrefaction soon took place, so that besides having no water to drink, it was almost death to inhale the very air. Yet "neither did Pharaoh set his heart to this also," for the magicians too had done this miracle. The poor people dug all round about the river to procure water, and a whole week passed by before the usual order of things was restored. But then it was with heavy loss—all the fish were dead, all washing, bleaching, and all manufactures in which water was a necessity were stopped, probably no food had been cooked during all these seven days.

Again God sent Moses to announce to Pharaoh that if he refused to let the people go, He would send a plague of frogs throughout the land, "which shall go up and come into thine house, and into thy bedchamber, and upon thy bed, and into the house of thy servants, and upon thy people, and into thine ovens, and into thy kneading troughs" (or dough; see margin, 8 : 3). There was no getting rid of these obnoxious creatures; there they were on all the furniture, in all the food, in every corner and cranny, and so numerous that as soon as hundreds were shovelled out into the street, hundreds replaced them. Again the magicians worked in imitation, and brought up frogs, but Pharaoh soon began to want to get rid of them. He was the king, and of course his water supply from those who dug for water was so ample that he had not the same personal inconvenience from the plague of blood. But now the frogs had no respect for king or nobleman; now he could neither sleep nor eat, nor hardly speak or walk for frogs. The magicians were there who had been able to bring them up upon the land, but Pharaoh wanted the plague to come to an end, and Satan's ministers, who know how to bring plagues enough, can never take them away. Atheists and free-thinkers know how to make a man miserable, but they have never in a single instance known how to turn sorrow into joy. They know how to excite the passions of men, envy, pride, revenge, sometimes also fleshly lusts, but they do not know how to make men unselfish, humble, long-suffering, or pure.

The magicians had begun to fall, and Pharaoh was forced to acknowledge the power of God. Constrained to accept relief by any means, he said, "Entreat the Lord, that He may take away the frogs from me, and from my people; and I will let the people go." "When," said Moses; and the king answered, "To-morrow" (8 : 8–10). What is this? Did he think that God could not do it to-day, or was his hatred of God so great that he would put off accepting favor at His hands to the last possible moment? Moses said, "Be it according to thy word; that thou mayest know that there is none like unto the Lord our God" (8 : 10). How our God longs to manifest himself to His creatures! how all His dealings with us are directed to this end! There was respite; God lifted off His hand of judgment. Pharaoh accepted the relief, and hardened his heart against Him who blessed him.

And God sent another terrible plague, turning all the dust of the land into lice, so that no one could set his foot down without treading upon lice, wherever dust had settled for a moment it was alive with these filthy vermin, and man and beast suffered alike. The magicians, who strove always to keep up with Moses and Aaron, sought to bring forth lice, but they had come to the utmost bound of their tether—"they could not," and they had the honesty to say to Pharaoh, "This is the finger of God" (vers. 18, 19). Men who were in league with the devil were now testifying to the wicked king, and seeking to convince him of the power of the living God; but his heart was hardened still. And now a stronger proof of the power of God was about to take place: the Lord sent Moses and Aaron to tell him that if he would not let the people go there should be swarms of flies upon him and his servants and his people, and He said, "I will sever in that day the land of Goshen, in which My people dwell, that no swarms of flies shall be there; to the end thou mayest know that I am the Lord in the midst of the earth. And I will put a division [a redemption] between My people and thy people" (vers. 22, 23).

The wicked king felt that he was losing ground; his magicians had failed him, and acknowledged the God against whom he was striving; the people whom he had persecuted were exempt from the loathsome plague under which he was suffering: he would attempt a compromise. He said, "Sacrifice to the Lord your God in the land." No, God's children worship on holy ground; and Moses said, "Shall we sacrifice the abominations of the Egyptians before their eyes, and will they not stone us?" we can have no partnership, our worship condemns yours. Then he said, "I will let you go, . . . only ye shall not go very far away" (ver. 25–28). This is the way of the world. "Only don't do anything peculiar, only do everything on the same ground as we do." Never; for the friendship of the world is enmity with God (James 4 : 4.)

God removed the flies in answer to Moses' prayer, but Pharaoh remained hardened, and then God's hand was stretched forth against him anew; a grievous murrain wrought fearful havoc upon the horses, asses, camels, sheep, and oxen, only those belonging to the children of Israel were exempt; a plague of boils broke forth upon man and upon beast, and the poor magicians could not stand before Moses, and they could not heal themselves or others. Then the Lord gave warning that a grievous hail should come upon the land, with unprecedented fury, and He counselled Pharaoh to bring in all which he had in the field. Those among Pharaoh's servants who feared God obeyed, but others left their cattle and servants in the field to certain destruction. Then came the mighty thunder, the lightning running along the ground, whole rows of trees torn up by the roots or split with the lightning, mighty hailstones smiting man and beast with a deadly power, so that wherever the tempest swept death and desolation remained behind. And now for the first time Pharaoh confessed, "I have sinned this time: the Lord is righteous, and I and my people are wicked;" but he made his confession only to man, and he seemed to ground thereupon a plea for mercy under promise that he would let the people go. But now, after his partial confession of his sin, after his clear conviction of the power of the living God, he broke his word again; he had filled up the measure of his iniquity, and from this time God hardened his heart (chap. 9).

Once again God sent Moses to Pharaoh, and said, "How long wilt thou refuse to humble thyself before Me? Let My people go, that they may serve Me," and then he threatened to send locusts upon the land. At this time Pharaoh's servants interposed and said unto him, "How long shall this man be a snare unto us? Let the men go, that they may serve the Lord their God: knowest thou not yet that Egypt is destroyed?" For a moment he relented, sent for Moses and Aaron, and said, "Go serve the Lord your God; but who are they that shall go? And Moses said, We will go with our young and with our old, with our sons and with our daughters, with our flocks and with our herds will we go." This is the true spirit of those who will go out of sin, worldliness, and self to live for God. But Pharaoh would not hear of it. Yet when the plague of locusts came, he sent in haste for Moses and Aaron, and confessed his sin, but only entreated their forgiveness, not God's, for he wanted only relief, and when it came God hardened his heart yet again. And then God brought darkness which could be felt over all the land of Egypt, only "the children of Israel had light in their dwellings." The silence of death reigned everywhere; no work was done, no journey undertaken. At the end of three days, Pharaoh called unto Moses and made one more proposition, "Go ye, serve the Lord; only let your flocks and your herds be stayed; let your little ones also go with you." But Moses entertained no such proposal, but said, "Thou must give us also sacrifices and burnt offerings, that we may sacrifice unto the Lord our God. Our cattle also shall go with us; there shall not an hoof be left behind: for thereof must we take to serve the Lord our God. . . . But the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he would not let them go:" he threatened Moses with death if he should see his face again, but he little knew how a few hours later the death wail should sound from one end of Egypt to the other, and that all the firstborn of the land should be destroyed. There is a point beyond which God's forbearance cannot go—"My spirit shall not always strive with man" (Gen. 6 : 3)— and when a sinner becomes a vessel of wrath fitted to destruction, he has first been guilty of repeatedly resisting the Holy Ghost.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The British Parliament was Last Week again the scene of Irish disturbance. The clause in the Land Bill providing for assistance being rendered to such Irish farmers as desired to emigrate was violently opposed by the Land Leaguers, who declaimed against "the proposal to depopulate the already underpopulated country and pledged the Irish members not only to obstruct the emigration clause, but to make it ridiculous and inoperative, if passed." Mr. Parnell and other members appealed to the government to withdraw the clause. Sir Stafford Northcote, the leader of the Conservatives, said he hoped the government would not give up the clause, which he regarded as a valuable portion of the bill.

It is difficult to understand why the Land Leaguers oppose the clause, which was introduced as one of the alternative methods of relief for the chronic poverty in the sterile, overcrowded districts of Ireland. The explanation of the London Daily News is, that they wish to prevent the passage of the bill, and believe the rejection of that clause would increase the animosity to the bill in the House of Lords. Mr. Gladstone, in the course of an indignant speech on the obstruction offered him in his efforts to render aid to Ireland, said that "the Land Leaguers having miserably failed to denounce the bill in Ireland sought by obstruction of the emigration clause to re-establish their damaged reputations as true friends of Ireland."

The clause was finally passed by a vote of 126 to 23. It is arranged that not more than a million dollars shall be advanced to intending emigrants, and not more than a third of that sum in any one year.

Midhat Pasha and his Fellow Prisoners condemned to death for conniving at if not instigating the murder of the late Sultan of Turkey, have been reprieved. Lord Dufferin, British ambassador at Constantinople, verbally intimated that the exercise of clemency would produce a very favorable impression. The Turkish ambassador in London wrote to his sovereign describing the unfavorable impression produced in England by the trial of the alleged murderers, and imploring the Sultan to prevent the carrying out of the sentences of capital punishment. The Sultan entertained the idea of having the judgment in the case of the alleged murderers of Abdul Aziz annulled by the Court of Cassation, but it was represented to him that this would involve the necessity of a new trial and danger of further scandal. The Sultan then decided to commute the death sentence. Lord Dufferin has assured the sister of Midhat Pasha that the latter will not be executed.

The Celebration of the National Fete in France was made the occasion of great rejoicing on July 14th. It is the anniversary of the taking of the Bastile in 1789, and is now observed as a national holiday. This is its second celebration since it was decreed by the legislature. There was a grand review of seventeen thousand soldiers, and Paris was illuminated in the evening.

A Deputation from the Boers has been Sent to England to protest against the withdrawal of British troops from the country. They had an interview with the Marquis of Salisbury, the leader of the Conservative Party, who expressed "the deepest sympathy with those men who, trusting in British promises after the annexation of the Transvaal, had invested their money there and taken up arms in defence of British authority, and who now found themselves abandoned by England and exposed to the hatred of their fellow citizens and the loss of their property." The delegates urged that there would be no peace in South Africa unless British supremacy was upheld.

The Rapid Spread of Nihilism in Russia and the hostility of the intelligent class of the population toward the government are not astonishing phenomena if a report is correct which has been rendered by M. Pavel Birwanski, ex-Imperial State Attorney of Russia. He was sent to investigate the condition of the imperial tribunals in the Orenburg province, and reported an appalling state of tyranny and corruption. He states that during his four months' sojourn in the province he "lived in an atmosphere of groans and heart-breaking sighs." "Hundreds of suppliants appealed to me daily in person," the attorney adds. "What did I not learn from their disclosures, supported by indefeasible proofs! It was revealed to me how our judges trample the laws under foot; how cynical and wanton is the behavior of our police; how savagely brute force is brought to bear upon the weak and friendless. I liberated innocent persons who had been kept in prison by the executive for several years after they had been publicly acquitted in open court, and who had been secretly tortured. I took down the depositions of peasant women who had been subjected to torment—their flesh pinched with red hot tongs—by order and in the presence of the Chief Commissary of Police, merely because they had presumed to plead on behalf of their unfortunate husbands." Under a despotic government abuses always flourish, but a state of affairs so bad as this must soon end either in representative government or revolution.

Counterfeit Coins in Large Numbers Have been circulated in Egypt by a band of alleged swindlers operating from Geneva. Ten years ago the precious metals were at so high a premium in Egypt that it was possible to make a profit by importing Egyptian coins from foreign countries. Several people embarked in the trade, and when the premium declined and a profit could no longer be made honestly these dealers put less and less of gold and silver into the coins until those recently sent are worth little more than half their face value. Money of the denomination of a piastre, worth about five cents, has been sent in quantities so large that there is supposed to be a million and a half dollars worth in circulation, all of which is counterfeit. It is expected that in order to save the Egyptian merchants and the public from ruin the government will have to buy up all these spurious coins. Several of the chief operators have been arrested.

The Irish Farm Laborers Have Appealed to Cardinal Mahning, who is intimate with Mr. Gladstone, to use his influence in their behalf. They complain that the Land Bill ignores their grievances, which are more intolerable than those of the farmers who employ them, and who, they allege, treat them with gross cruelty. The Cardinal counselled patience, and explained that the land bill was already a most complicated and unwieldy measure and the introduction of the condition of the laborer would render its enactment impossible. He also took occasion to express his approval of the Land League when operating within the limits of the law, human and divine. The Cardinal omitted to state when it was that the Land League had so operated.

A Physical Struggle in the British House of Commons is threatened by Mr. Bradlaugh, the atheist member. A cablegram says, "Mr. Bradlaugh has served a formal notice upon the Speaker and the other officers of the House of Commons protesting against his previous exclusions from the House as illegal, and giving notice that on or before the 3d of August he will present himself at the table of the House; that any one endeavoring to prevent him will be acting illegally and that he will resist physical force and endeavor to overcome it if offered." If Mr. Bradlaugh carries out his threat it may serve the good purpose of insuring his permanent exclusion from Parliament by offending those members who are agitating for his admission.

The Body of the Late Pope Pius IX. was Removed from St. Peter's to the Church of San Lorenzo, at midnight on July 12. The procession traversed the city of Rome, to the Baslica. An immense number of members of Catholic associations followed the procession with torches. Some young men disturbed the procession with cries of "Long live Italy!" and some rioting ensued, but the military dispersed all who did not belong to the cortége, which then proceeded to its destination. Six men were arrested and have been fined and imprisoned for disturbing the funeral procession. There was great disorder at the trial of the prisoners and the court was cleared twice. The sentences were received with a storm of shouts and hisses. A crowd of people numbering between two and three thousand cheered the prisoners on coming out of the court and followed them shouting, "Down with the clericals."

The architect of the Vatican, who made the funeral arrangements, promised the authorities of the city, in writing, that the cortége accompanying the body should consist solely of a funeral car and two or three carriages, without any outward show. This promise was not observed; hence the disturbances which attended the removal. The Pope has expressed formally his indignation at the disturbances, and notified the foreign courts that henceforth he must consider himself more than ever a prisoner in the Vatican and as prevented from attending any religious service in the basilicas of Rome.

A Great Land Slide is Reported from Switzerland. It began in one of the severest thunderstorms that have ever visited the country. The ground had been loosened by recent earthquakes, and a piece of it began to move toward the lake, carrying with it houses and part of a beech forest. It is near Sigriswyl, in the Canton of Bern, and is steadily moving toward the Lake of Thun at the rate of three metres a day. It is three miles long, one mile broad and of unknown depth. The houses in its path have been deserted

Rev. John Cumming D.D., the Eminent Expositor of prophecy, died in London on July 6th. He had been laid aside from active work through mental and physical infirmity for more than two years. He was born in Aberdeenshire November 10th, 1810, and went to London in 1833. He was the author of many works on prophecy, among which the best known are "Apocalyptic Sketches," "The Voices of the Night," "The Seventh Vial," and "Redemption Draweth Nigh." Dr. Cumming belonged to the established church of Scotland, and on several occasions preached before Queen Victoria.

The Death of Baron Hatherley, an Ex-Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, was announced on July 10th. He was better known as Sir William Page Wood. He was born in 1801, and was made a vice-chancellor, which is a permanent office, in 1852. In 1868, when Mr. Gladstone became prime minister he appointed him Lord High Chancellor, and he was raised to the peerage with the title of Baron Hatherley. He was an eminent Christian, and even when holding the highest judicial office in England might have been seen every Sunday teaching a class of boys in a Sunday school. He was the author of "Continuity of Scripture" and other religious works.

A Specimen of the Absurd Statements with which agitators from America delude the ignorant and credulous Irish people was cabled here last week. Mr. Redpath, a notorious agitator, told the people at a public meeting recently held in an Irish country town, that if the British Government arrested him, no English nobleman could cross the Mississippi without risk of being shot or of being held as a hostage for his release. The menace was apparently taken seriously by the multitude present.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London) for July may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Price six cents.

"Coming Wars," by the Rev. M. Baxter: Two Pamphlets; price five cents each by mail. First Pamphlet contains "Ten signs of the End, and Description of Approaching Events;" with two maps of the territory to be under Antichrist's rule, and four large diagrams. Second Pamphlet contains valuable quotations from twenty-six Expositors on the same subject. Address, with price enclosed—THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Following Works by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon are for sale at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Office at prices much below what they can be obtained for else where. Remittances must accompany orders: John Ploughman's Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 cents. The Treasury of David, a homiletica exposition of the book of Psalms, four vols., as far as Psa. 103, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Day Book. This popular gift-book contains a suitable passage selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for every day in the year, with a blank space opposite for autographs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spurgeon appear at their respective birthdays. The book is gorgeously bound, and the price is 75 cents.

PROF. NORDENSKJOLD.

PROFESSOR NORDENSKJOLD, The Sweedish Arctic Explorer—Incidents in Arctic Exploration.

PROFESSOR NORDENSKJÖLD.

Birth in 1832—Family Celebrities—His Childhood's Home—University Studies—Exiled in 1855 -Emigrates to Sweden in 1858—Marriage to a Finland Lady—His First Expedition to Spitzbergen in 1858—Mr. Oscar Dickson's Noble Contributions—Subsequent Expeditions—Discovery of a Samoiede Altar—A Sleeping Bear Surprised—Sailing of the "Vega" in 1878—Ice-bound till Summer—Accomplishment of the North-east Passage in 1879.

ONE of the greatest events of exploration of the present century was the discovery, just two years ago this week, of the long-sought northeast passage-way from Europe to Japan, and Professor Nordenskjöld, whose portrait we publish in this number, was the intrepid voyager who achieved the success. The Professor's return to the scenes of human life and activity, after being ice-locked for nine months within one day's sail of the Pacific Ocean, was announced at the time in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. To-day we give a sketch of the navigator's early years and his subsequent life of adventure.

Nils Adolph Erik Nordenskjöld, though only forty-eight years old, is a veteran of a score of years' experience in Arctic navigation. He was born at Helsingfors, the capital of Finland, November 18, 1832. His father was Nils Gustav Nordenskjöld, a well-known naturalist and chief of the Mining Department of Finland. He was an extensive traveller in the prosecution of scientific research, his travels extending as far as the Ural. One of his relatives, Augustus Nordenskjöld, was a fervent abolitionist. Together with a friend he emigrated to Sierra Leone, in order to found there a colony of free negroes, but the scheme did not succeed as well as the later attempted colony of Liberia, and he returned, sadly disappointed, to the land of his birth.

The family residence was at Frugärd, in the province of Nyland, and with its treasures of old books and natural history collections, was a fitting home to develop

THE FUTURE EXPLORER.

The father spending so much time in travel, the conduct and arrangement of the early education of the boy and his brothers devolved upon their mother.

The old gentleman began life as a lawyer; but, full of interest in natural philosophy, he gave up that profession and an appointment he had obtained, went to Stockholm to study chemistry and mineralogy under the famous Berzelius, and after having passed his mining examinations at Upsala returned to Finland, where he entered the Mining Board, of which he afterward became the chief. Extensive travels over the mining districts of Europe enabled him to introduce valuable improvements in the mining operations of his native country, and at the same time he connected his name with important discoveries in mineralogy and with sagacious theories of geology. He died in 1866, nearly seventy-four years old.

We regret to know that he and many of the Nordenskjöld family adopted the mystic and heretical doctrines of Swedenborg. Common to them all was the passion of collection, and at the ancient family seat in Frugärd (Our Lady's Manor), large museums of minerals, plants, ethnological objects, and the like had been brought together, connected with a library of uncommon extent and value.

Nils Adolph Erik Nordenskjöld passed his childhood surrounded by all these treasures, and under the strong influence of family traditions irresistibly drawing him toward philosophical studies. At the age of thirteen he was sent to college at Borgå, where one of his masters was the famous poet Runeberg. Even more than to this gifted genius he owed to Lector Bornelius, who taught him mathematics and physics, and to Lector Öhmann, teacher of geography, who first inculcated in him that fervent interest in unknown lands and nationalities which became the guiding impulse of his life.

After having passed, in 1851, to the University at Helsingfors, he devoted himself principally to the studies of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology. During the vacations he accompanied his father on his travels through the mining districts, and even went as far as to the Ural, in order to examine the iron and copper mines at Tagilsk belonging to the Demidoff family. In 1855 he took his licentiate's degree, and wrote for his examination an essay upon the crystallizing forms of graphite and chandrodite. At that period an eventful change passed over his life.

The highest power in the Grand Duchy of Finland was wielded in those years in the Czar's name by Governor-General Berg, a severe official of the old type, eager for upholding the Russian sway, and always upon the hunt for everything tainted with Swedish sympathies. The young licentiate had on different occasions given free voice to his feelings for liberty, and to his strong sympathies for the old country, and was warned that a voluntary exile for a time would be convenient for him.

He accordingly went to Berlin, and studied there under the auspices of Professor Rose, but on his return he found himself still in disgrace, and was studiously passed by in the distribution of fellowships; and when he had at last obtained a stipend he was again deprived of it, because, on his promotion to a doctor's degree, he had, at a public dinner, made a speech to delegates from the Swedish Universities, and proposed a toast to "the future hopes" of Finland. He was informed that he could not expect any place at the University, and so, in 1858, he where he has since taken up his abode and become naturalized. He has, however, often visited the land of his birth, and since the Liberal changes introduced in the administration of Finland, several offers have been made to him of employment, but he has preferred the land of his adoption. During one of these visits home, in 1863, he married Anna Mannerstein, the daughter of President Count Mannerstein.

In the year of his emigration to Sweden, he being then 26 years of age, Nordenskjöld accompanied Professor Torell on his first expedition to Spitzbergen, where in a bay on the west coast, he discovered plants belonging to what geologists know as the tertiary period. He was then appointed Professor and Intendent at the Imperial Museum of Stockholm, and he made further visits in 1861 and 1864 to Spitzbergen, besides making numerous scientific excursions in Sweden and Finland. In 1868 a new expedition to Spitzbergen was organized under his command. Two merchant princes at Gothenburg, Mr. Oscar Dickson and Mr. Carnegie, both of Scotch descent, and both of a truly Anglo-Saxon munificence, offered the money for the expedition, and the State lent the post steamer Sophia, commanded by Captain Von Otter, late Swedish Minister of Marine.

The Sophia explored Beeren Island and different points on the west and north coasts of Spitzbergen, but was compelled to return. In order to prepare for another trial, Nordenskjöld in 1870 visited Greenland, where he made himself thoroughly acquainted with the conditions of Arctic explorations, and in 1872 he undertook again, with the steamer Polheim and a sailing-brig, the Gladan, the first of them commanded by Captain Palander, a Spitzbergen expedition, the expenses of which were defrayed by Mr. Oscar Dickson. It was his intention to start from some point there over the Arctic ice in order to reach the pole; but a succession of accidents and mishaps prevented that.

From April 24th to June 15th he undertook with Palander and some picked men a sixty days' journey along the whole northern coast of Spitzbergen to the easternmost cape, and then back over the inland ice. The years 1875 and 1876 were marked by two expeditions to the Kara Sea and to Yenisei, both defrayed by the Siberian magnate Alexander Sibiriakoff and Mr. Oscar Dickson.

During the expedition of 1875, while exploring a peninsula separating the Kara Sea from the Gulf of the Ob, the travellers found a Samoïede sacrificial altar. It was composed of a heap of bears' skulls and reindeer horns, and was surmounted by some Samoïede idols made from driftwood. The features of the idols were roughly cut, and the eyes and mouths had recently been smeared with blood. Two sticks with hooks also held bears' skulls, while the remains of a fireplace and some reindeer bones showed signs of a banquet.

Having skirted the ice as far as the northern mouth of the Yenisei, the professor hoisted the Swedish flag on August 15th. "Here," he says, "we had reached a goal which for years had vainly been striven for by other nations. England, Holland, and Russia have failed because they did not make the attempt at the right season." The professor named the anchorage "Dickson Bay," after the promoter of the expedition Herr Oscar Dickson. From the vessel the travellers caught sight of an old bear moving peaceably on the beach with some reindeer. The bear shortly lay down to sleep, and Dr. Theel landed to surprise the sleeper, but it awoke at once, and rushed toward the party (see frontispiece).

Two shots, however, speedily ended its career.

It may here be stated that the expedition, designed to discover a passage from Europe to Asia by the Arctic Ocean, was fitted out more than three centuries ago, under the direction of Sebastian Cabot, the celebrated Venetian. Sir Hugh Willoughby was its commander, and he and all his crew were frozen to death on the coast of Russian Lapland. In 1556 and 1580 two other English expeditions failed in like attempts. The Dutch, the English, and the Danes fitted out no fewer than eight expeditions between 1593 and 1676, and on the failure of all these the North-East Passage was given up as hopeless by the great maritime nations, and for the next two centuries the attention of Arctic explorers was absorbed in attempts to solve the problem of the North-west Passage, or a way to Asia along the northern coast of America.

But it was natural that when the possibility of reaching the mouths of the great Siberian rivers had been placed beyond a doubt by the voyages of 1875 and 1876, Nordenksjöld should turn a longing eye to the unexplored sea on the northern coast of Asia, and revive the idea of the practicability of effecting the North-east Passage. Accordingly he planned a new expedition on a larger scale than any of the preceding ones. Toward equipping it Mr. Dickson contributed $60,000, while other individuals and also the Swedish Government gave substantial aid. The vessel chosen was the steam whaler Vega, of 500 tons burden, and with engines of sixty-horse power. The Vega was full bark-rigged, and was a good sailer. The ship's company consisted of nine officers and scientific gentlemen (including the commander), eighteen volunteer seamen of the Swedish navy, and three Norwegian walrus-hunters. They were provisioned for two years, and furnished with a plentiful supply of remedies against scurvy.

The Vega, accompanied by several other vessels to go part of the way carrying extra stores, sailed from Gothenburg, July 4, 1878. On the 19th of August the Vega and its remaining consort, the Lena—the other vessels having returned—near Cape Chelyuskin. The first object of the voyage had been attained—the northernmost point of the Old World. Flags were hoisted and a salute was fired in honor of the event. The air had cleared, and the cape, called sometimes Cape Severo and North-east Cape, lay before them, lighted up by the sun and free from snow. A large polar bear was seen parading the beach with eyes and nose turned toward the bay to inspect the new arrivals.

Leaving their anchorage at the cape on the 20th, the vessels worked their way along, sometimes encountering drift ice or large floes, finding navigation difficult owing to fog, and sometimes forced to get out of ice entanglements by retracing their course. As they worked eastward, picturesque mountains two thousand to three thousand feet high, were seen at a short distance inland. These were free of snow to their highest summits. Animal life was found to be abundant, while all the animals found were of pure Arctic type. Often by that time, as they sailed along, no trace of ice could be seen from the vessels, and as they had before encountered land where sea was shown on the maps, they now sailed over regions marked as land. They found at surface currents running from the Siberian ivers, and more or less warmed during the brief ut hot Siberian summer, made the Polar Sea, uring a short season of the year, nearly ice-free long the coast. The two vessels parted on the 3th of August, the Vega to continue her eastward oyage, and the Lena to ascend the river of the me name. The latter reached Yakutsk, North- n Siberia, safely, September 21, 1878, and gave e world the first news of the expedition.

Our map of the Arctic regions will give the ader some idea of the immense distance that will ve to be traversed from the most northern points Europe, Asia, or America, if the North Pole be er reached. For Franz Joseph Land, about the ghest latitude any Arctic navigator has yet at- ined, is more than a thousand miles south of the le; and yet the coast of the mainland, which is nother thousand miles south of that, has a frozen a for ten months of the year. Spitzbergen is the oup of islands on the west of Barents Sea, and e long narrow island on the east of that sea is ova Zembla. The bay to the right of Nova Zem- a is the Kara Sea, and Cape Chelyuskin is about ° east of the most easterly point shown on the ap. Behring's Strait is about midway between e Kara Sea and Greenland, but on the opposite misphere.

Nordenskjöld's hope was that he would meet no traordinary delays from ice, and be able to reach hring's Straits by the end of September. But shing along as best he could, he found the ice adually gaining on him. By the 25th of Novem- r, 1878, the newly-formed ice was nearly two feet ick, and there was no longer any hope of get- g free before the next summer.

So there the members of the expedition were liged to stay, pursuing their meteorological; agnetical, geological, botanical, and zoological searches for 235 days. During their imprison- nt the men enjoyed good health and preserved od spirits. The time was spent in busy sci- tific work, and in intercourse with the friendly huktches, who supplied the party with bears d reindeer. Game was abundant, and spring ought numbers of wild fowl. There was no rk period, the upper limb of the sun being visi- for a brief time on the shortest day.

18TH OF JULY, 1879,

Vega was released from being ice-bound, and the 20th passed through Behring's Straits into Pacific, the first vessel that had accomplished voyage from the Atlantic by the North-east ssage. Already that adventurous voyage has gun to develop practical results. The country ich Nordenskjöld has shown to be accessible by instead of by the former overland routes, is an mense territory. It is said by Nordenskjöld to capable of producing corn and wheat in almost xhaustible quantities. It is rich in mineral de- sits, and abounds with fur-bearing animals.

The old Vikings made their bold expeditions ot on conquest and plunder. Our modern king has been as bold as his hardy ancestors, t his conquests have been in the realms of peace d his plunder has been the secrets of unknown ts. All honor to him! Let us hope and pray t these enterprising expeditions may open up way of Gospel missionaries to make known the ng love of Jesus Christ to the inhabitants of all se regions in singular fulfilment of the prophecy t before the coming of Christ the Gospel will preached to all nations for a witness (Matt. : 14).

R J. RICHARDSON AND THE WOLVES.

ON the right-hand corner of the lower portion of frontispiece picture is a representation of an sode which occurred in one of Sir John Rich- dson's expeditions to the Arctic regions nearly ty years ago.

Sir John Richardson's useful and honored life of enty-eight years, which closed on the 5th of ne, 1865, began at Dumfries, Scotland, on No- nber 5, 1787. The poet Burns was a frequent itor at his father's and gave him poetry to m. He studied for the medical profession, which he practised for about nine years in the Royal Navy, and was then appointed surgeon and naturalist to Sir John Franklin's Polar Expedition in 1816. That was followed by three other expeditions, in 1819, 1821, and 1827, under Sir E. Parry's command, in which Franklin also took part.

On the second of these excursions in the Arctic regions, it was necessary at one time, near the Coppermine River, to camp out during the night in small tents, and Sir John Richardson undertook the duty of sentinel during the first watch, seating himself on an elevated plateau between the tents and the river. His thoughts were possibly engaged with far distant scenes, when he was roused by an indistinct noise behind him, and on looking round, he saw that ranged in a straight line, were advancing, apparently uncertain whether to attack him or not. On his standing up they stopped, and as he moved forward they made way for his passage down to the tents. He had his gun in his hand but forbore to fire, as it might have brought upon them hostile Esquimaux who were in the neighborhood.

Sir John regularly kept up the practice of reading some chapters of the Bible and prayers every morning and evening to his fellow-voyagers. His feelings at the close of his hazardous explorations were thus summed up in a letter to his wife: "Let them give thanks whom the Lord hath redeemed." His neighbors in Westmoreland used to say of him in his old age, "When there is a kindness to be done to any one, old Sir John does not wait to tie his shoe-string;" for to the last he remained full of Christian love and benevolence.

FAREWELL MEETING OF MISSIONARIES.

The Steam Launch on the Congo River—A Polish Jew's Narrative—An Engine Maker's Testimony.

ON Tuesday, June 28th, two very interesting meetings were held in connection with the close of the Eighth Session of Mr. Guinness's East London Institute, and the departure of several missionaries for various spheres of labor. On the platform were the young missionaries, and the stories they subsequently told of their early lives, and of the motives which had led them to devote themselves to mission work, excited deep interest.

THE STEAM LAUNCH ON THE CONGO RIVER.

The Rev. H. Grattan Guinness stated that on the last occasion when they had met to commend to the care of their Heavenly Father those who were going out to foreign service, their thoughts had been specially turned to Congoland, whither several of the brethren were about to journey. Letters had been received from Mr. M'Call announcing their safe arrival, together with that of the "Livingstone" steam launch for the navigation of the Lower Congo. A friend at Liverpool generously gave £200 for this object.

It was intended at first to send out merely a sailing boat, but the more the subject was considered the more the importance was perceived of giving the missionaries, if possible, the command of steam power. The current of the Lower Congo, even in its comparatively calm lower waters, is so rapid that rowing against it must always be tedious and laborious work.

The navigable distance on the Congo River, between Banana and the station at Matadi Minkanda, the point where the lower river ceases to be navigable, is over a hundred miles, and the missionaries have often had to spend five or six days, or more, in getting from one point to another. They have frequently been detained at Bona on the way, and sometimes laid up there with fever. By the aid of the "Livingstone" they will now be able to accomplish this voyage with ease in one or two days and be quite independent of wind and tide. It is very satisfactory to know that though some fears were entertained of the engines of the launch not being of sufficient power to work against the stream, the boat has well answered its purpose.

In giving an account of the work of the session, Mr. Guinness stated that there had been in the Institute forty students preparing for missionary services, either in far-off fields or nearer home. Twenty-four had gone out to various parts of the world, and eight or nine more were ready to leave.

A POLISH JEW'S NARRATIVE.

The three brethren who are about to go out to Congoland were then introduced to the meeting, and also Mr. Barran, who intends devoting himself to laboring among the Jews. The latter, in telling the little story of his life, said: "I was born in Poland, and brought up among those who believed in Judaism, in which there is not much spiritual life. I remember that when I was eight years old I was very ill, and it was feared I would die. I asked my mother if I were to die, where should I go to? 'To Heaven,' she said, 'if you are a good boy.' But I was not a good boy, and I was in a most miserable condition. A few years afterward I wrote my mother a letter, and told her the only way to go to Heaven was through Jesus of Nazareth. It was not until I came to this country that I heard of Him from Mr. Wilkinson. I am now going to make known the same Gospel to the Jews, who greatly need it, and I shall work in the Mildmay Mission with the same man who has been the means, in God's hands, of bringing me to Christ." In conclusion, he repeated in the Hebrew language, "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but have everlasting life."

AN ENGINE MAKER'S TESTIMONY.

Mr. Biltington (bound for Congoland) said: "I grant you that there are many things to be endured if I go to Africa. I yesterday had to say farewell to my dear old mother, and probably I shall never see her again. I have had to say good-bye to others whom I loved; but I have learned to place all these sacrifices by the side of Him who has shown us what real self-denial is, and then they sink into insignificance.' It appeared from the address of the speaker that he had been three years in Mr. Spurgeon's College. In early life his occupation was that of looking after cows. His business afterward was that of a mowing-machine maker, and subsequently that of an engine maker, and he has also worked at a large fire-engine factory, so that if such work will be needed out in Congoland by-and-by, his practical training will prove of value.

OTHER TESTIMONIES.

Mr. Engall was the next speaker, and it was evident from the loud shouts with which he was greeted that "Charlie Engall" (as the writer heard him called) was very popular among his fellow-students. He said he had come from a missionary institution in Sweden, where he had been two years, and had been at Harley House about nine months. He does not speak English fluently. "I can scarcely speak," he said, "but will try to say a few words. I have no reason for sorrow but for joy, because we are going to do the will of our Master who, before He left the world, said, 'go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature!'"

An interesting feature in the proceedings was the repetition of John 3: 16, in various languages, by some of the students present. The grand words, "For God so loved the world," etc., were repeated in Swiss, German, Arabic, Spanish, Kaffir, Hindustani, Tamil, and Chinese.

The meeting was subsequently addressed by M. Gerber, a Swiss, who was about to return to Berne to preach the Gospel. M. Serusclat also spoke, and he is going to France in a few days. Mr. Wynn, an Englishman, the last speaker, who had received a good business training in the City in some of the large business houses, and who being short of stature compared himself to Zaccheus, expressed the joy it afforded him to go out to South Africa. He had feared that he was not "big enough" to go, but "in the very nick of time" he had received a letter telling him that there was an opening in South Africa for him, and very gladly would he obey the call. A closing hymn was then sung, and once more the brethren who were going out were affectionately commended in prayer to Him to whom they would be as near in Equatorial Africa as they were during their happy student days in the East London Institute.

THE RAIN.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Hath the rain a father."—JOB 38 : 28.

A Theological Wrangle—God's Challenge to Job—The Gospel of the Weather—I. Murmurers at the Weather—The Young Minister's Vexation—Eleven Wet Sundays—The Merchant's Anxiety—Agriculturists and the Rain—Project for a Weather Company—II. God's Minute Supervisal—God Visible in Magnitudes—And in Minutiæ—The Accidents of History—Their Proper Designation—III. God's Dealings Inexplicable—Mysterious Deaths—The Everlasting "Why"—IV. The Rain of Tears—God its Origin—Its Uses—The Tearless Maniac—The Broken-Hearted Husband—The Tears God Counts—A Pious Mother's Recognition of her Prodigal Son—Magnanimity of the King of Carthage.

THIS book of Job has been the subject of unbounded theological wrangle. Men have made it the ring in which to display their ecclesiastical pugilism. Some say that this book of Job is a true history ; others, that it is an allegory ; others, that it is an epic poem ; others, that it is a drama. Some say that Job lived 1800 years before Christ ; others say that he never lived at all. Some say that the author of this book was Job ; others, David ; others, Solomon. The discussion has landed some in blank infidelity.

Now I have no trouble with the books of Job or Revelation—the two most mysterious books in the Bible—because of a rule I adopted some years ago. I wade down into a Scripture passage as long as I can touch bottom, and when I cannot then I wade out. I used to wade in until it was over my head, and then I got drowned. I study a passage of Scripture so long as it is a comfort and help to my soul ; but when it becomes a perplexity and a spiritual upturning I quit. In other words, we ought to wade in up to our heart, but never wade in until it is over our head. No man should ever expect to wade across this great ocean of divine truth. I go down into that ocean as I go down into the Atlantic Ocean at East Hampton, Long Island, just far enough to bathe ; then I come out. I never had any idea that with my weak hand and foot I could strike my way clear over to Liverpool.

I suppose you understand your family genealogy. You know something about your parents, your grandparents, your great-grandparents. Perhaps you know where they were born, or where they died. Have you ever studied

THE PARENTAGE OF THE SHOWER.

"Hath the rain a father?" This question is not asked by a poetaster or a scientist, but by the Head of the universe. To humble and to save Job, God asks him fourteen questions: about the world's architecture, about the refraction of the sun's rays, about the tides, about the snow crystal, about the lightnings, and then He arraigns him with the interrogation of the text : "Hath the rain a father?" With the scientific wonders of the rain I have nothing to do. A minister gets through with that kind of sermons within the first three years, and if he has piety enough he gets through with it in the first three months. A sermon has come to me to mean one word of four letters : "Help!"

You all know that the rain is not an orphan. You know it is not cast out of the gates of heaven a foundling. You would answer the question of my text in the affirmative. Safely housed during the storm, you hear the rain beating against the window pane, and you find it searching all the crevices of the window sill. It first comes down in solitary drops, spattering the dust, and then it deluges the fields and angers the mountain torrents and makes the traveller implore shelter. You know that the rain is not an accident of the world's economy. You know it was born of the cloud. You know it was rocked in the cradle of the wind. You know it was sung to sleep by the storm. You know that it is a flying evangel from heaven to earth. You know it is the Gospel of the weather. You know that God is its father.

I. If this be true, then, how wicked is our about climatic changes. The first eleven Sabbaths after I entered the ministry it stormed. Through the week it was clear weather, but on the Sabbaths the old country meeting house looked liked Noah's ark before it landed. A few drenched people sat before a drenched pastor ; but most of the farmers stayed at home and thanked God that what was bad for the church was good for the crops. I committed a good deal of sin in those days in denouncing the weather. Ministers of the Gospel sometimes fret about stormy Sabbaths, or hot Sabbaths or inclement Sabbaths. They forget the fact that the same God who ordained the Sabbath and sent forth His ministers to announce salvation, also ordained the weather. "Hath the rain a father?"

Merchants also, with their stores filled with new goods and their clerks hanging idly around the counters, commit the same transgression. There have been seasons when the whole spring and fall trade has been ruined by protracted wet weather. The merchants then examined the "weather probabilities" with more interest than they read their Bibles. They watched for a patch of blue sky. They went complaining to the store, and came complaining home again. In all that season of wet feet, and dripping garments, and impassable streets, they never once asked the question : "Hath the rain a father?"

So agriculturists commit this sin. There is nothing more annoying than to have planted corn rot in the ground because of too much moisture, or hay all ready for the mow dashed of a shower, or wheat almost ready for the sickle spoiled with the rust. How hard it is to bear the agricultural disappointments ! God has infinite resources, but I do not think He has capacity to make weather to please all the farmers. Sometimes it is too hot, or it is too cold ; it is too wet, or it is too dry ; it is too early, or it is too late. They forget that the God who promised seed time and harvest, summer and winter, cold and heat, also ordained all the climatic changes. There is one question that ought to be written on every barn, on every fence, on every farm-house : "Hath the rain a father?"

If we only knew what

it is to provide appropriate weather for this world, we would not be so critical of the Lord. Isaac Watts, at ten years of age, complained that he did not like the hymns that were sung in the English chapel. "Well," said his father, "Isaac, instead of your complaining about the hymns, go and make hymns that are better." And he did go and make hymns that were better. Now I say to you, if you do not like the weather, get up a weather company, and have a president, and a secretary, and a treasurer, and a board of directors, and ten million dollars of stock, and then provide weather that will suit all of us.

There is a man who has a weak head, and he cannot stand the glare of the sun. You must have a cloud always hovering over him. I like the sunshine ; I cannot live without plenty of sunlight ; so you must always have enough light for me. Two ships meet mid-Atlantic. The one is going to Southampton, the other is going to New York. Provide weather that, while it is abaft for one ship it is not a head wind for the other. There is a farm that is dried up for lack of rain, and here is a pleasure party going out for a field excursion. Provide weather that will suit the dry farm and the pleasure excursion. No, sirs, I will not take one dollar of stock in your weather company. There is only one Being in the universe who knows enough to provide the right kind of weather for this world. "Hath the rain a father?"

II. My text also suggests

GOD'S MINUTE SUPERVISAL.

You see the Divine Sonship in every drop of rain. The jewels of the shower are not flung away by a spendthrift who knows not how many he throws or where they fall. They are all shining princes of heaven. They all have an eternal lineage. They are all the children of a king. "Hath the rain a father?" Well, then, I say if God takes notice of every minute raindrop, He will take notice of the most insignificant affair of my life.

It is the astronomical view of things that bothers me. We look up into the night heavens and we say : "Worlds ! worlds !" and how insignificant we feel ! We stand at the foot of Mount Washington or Mont Blanc, and we feel that we are only insects, and then we say to ourselves : "Though the world is so large, the sun is 1,400,000 times larger." "Oh," we say, "it is no use ; if God wheels that great machinery through immensity, He will not take the trouble to look down at me." Infidel conclusion ! Saturn, Mercury, and Jupiter are no more rounded and weighed and swung by the hand of God than are the globules on a lilac bush the morning after a shower. God is no more in magnitudes than He is in minutiæ. If He has scales to weigh the mountains, He has balances delicate enough to weigh the infinitesimal. You can no more see Him through the telescope than you can see Him through the microscope—no more when you look up than when you look down. Are not the hairs of your head all numbered? And if Himalaya has a God, "Hath not the rain a father?"

I take this doctrine of

and I thrust it into the midst of your every-day life. If God fathers a rain-drop, is there anything so insignificant in your affairs that God will not father that? When Druyse, the gunsmith, invented the needle-gun, which decided the battle of Sadowa, was it a mere accident? When a farmer's boy showed Blucher a short cut by which he could bring his army up soon enough to decide Waterloo for England, was it a mere accident? When Lord Byron took a piece of money and tossed it up to decide whether or not he should be affianced to Miss Millbank, was it a mere accident which side of the money was up and which was down? When the Protestants were besieged at Bezors, and a drunken drummer came in at midnight and rang the alarm bell, not knowing what he was doing, but waking up the host in time to fight their enemies that moment arriving, was it an accident?

When, in the Irish rebellion, a starving mother flying with her starving child, sank down and fainted on the rock in the night, and her hand fell on a warm bottle of milk, did that just happen so? God is either in the affairs of men or our religion is worth nothing at all, and you had better take it away from us, and instead of this Bible, which teaches the doctrine, give us a secular book, and give us, as the famous Mr. Fox, the member of Parliament, in his last hour, cry out : "Read me the eighth book of Virgil." O my friends, let us rouse up to an appreciation of the fact that all the affairs of our life are under a King's command, and under a Father's watch.

Alexander's war-horse Bucephalus would allow anybody to mount him when he was unharnessed, but as soon as they put on that war-horse Bucephalus the saddle and the trappings of the conqueror he would allow no one but Alexander to touch him. And if a soulless horse could have so much pride in his owner, shall not we immortals exult in the fact that we are owned by a King?

III. Again, my subject teaches me that

GOD'S DEALINGS WITH US ARE INEXPLICABLE.

That was the original force of my text. The rain was a great mystery to the ancients. They could not understand how the water should get into the cloud, and getting there, how it should be suspended, or falling, why it should come down in drops. Modern science comes along and says there are two portions of air of different temperature, and they are charged with moisture, and one portion of air decreases in temperature so the water may no longer be held in vapor, and it falls. And they tell us that some of the clouds that look to be no larger than a man's hand, and to us almost quiet in the heavens, are great mountains of mist 4000 feet from base to top, and that they rush miles a minute. But after all the brilliant experiments of Dr. James Hutton, and Sausure, and other scientists, there is an infinite mystery about the rain. There is an ocean of the unfathomable in every rain-drop, and God says to-day as He said in the time of Job : "If you can not understand one drop of rain, do not be surprised if My dealings with you are inexplicable."

Why does that aged man, decrepit, beggared, vicious, sick of the world, and the world sick of him, live on, while here is a man in mid-life, of secrated to God, hard-working, useful in every respect, who dies? Why does that old gossip, gadding along the street about everybody's business but her own, have such good health, while the Christian mother, with a flock of little ones about her, whom she is preparing for usefulness and for heaven—the mother who you think could not be spared an hour from that household—why does she lie down and die with a cancer? Why does that man, selfish to the core, go on adding fortune to fortune, consuming everything on himself, continue to prosper, while that man who has been giving ten per cent of all his income to God and the church, goes into bankruptcy?

Before we make stark fools of ourselves, let us stop pressing this everlasting "Why." Let us worship where we cannot understand. Let a man take that one question "Why," and pursue it far enough, and push it, and he will land in wretchedness and perdition. We want in our theology fewer interrogation marks and more exclamation points. Heaven is the place for explanation. Earth is the place for trust. If you cannot understand so minute a thing as a rain-drop, how can you expect to understand God's dealings? "Hath he rain a father?"

IV. Again, my text makes me think that is of divine origin. Great clouds of trouble sometimes hover over us. They are black, and they are forged, and they are thunderous. They are more portentous than Salvator or Claude ever painted—clouds of poverty, or persecution, or bereavement. They hover over us, and they get darker and blacker, and after a while a tear starts, and we think by a heavy pressure of the eyelid to stop that tear, but we cannot stop it. Others follow, and after a while there is a shower of tearful emotion. Yes, there is a rain of tears. "Hath that rain a father?"

"Oh," you say, "a tear is nothing but a drop of limpid fluid secreted by the lachrymal gland—it is only a sign of weak eyes." Great mistake! It is one of the Lord's richest benedictions to the world. There are people in Blackwell's Island insane Asylum, and at Utica, and at all the asylums of this land, who are demented by the fact that they could not cry at the right time. Said a maniac in one of our public institutions, under a Gospel sermon that started the tears: "Do you see that star? That is the first tear that I have wept for twelve years. I think it will help my brain." There are a great many in the grave who could not and any longer under the glacier of trouble. If that glacier had only melted into weeping, they could have endured it.

There have been times in your life when you would have given the world, if you had possessed it, for one tear. You could shriek, you could blaspheme, but you could not cry. Have you never seen a man holding the hand of a dead wife who would been all the world to him? The temples livid with excitement, the eye dry and frantic, no moisture on the upper or lower lid. You saw there were bolts of anger in the cloud, but no rain. To your Christian comfort, he said: "Don't talk to me about God; there is no God; or if there is, I hate Him. Don't talk to me about God; would he have left me and these motherless children?"

But a few days or hours after, coming across the pencil that she owned in life, or some letters which she wrote when he was away from home, with an outcry that appalls there bursts the fountain of tears, and as the sunlight of God's consolation strikes that fountain of tears, you find out that it is a tender-hearted, merciful, pitiful, and all-compassionate God who is the father of that rain.

"Oh," you say, "it is absurd to think that God is going to watch over tears." No, my friends; there are three or four kinds of them that God counts, bottles, and eternizes. First, there are all and there are more of these than of any other kind, because the most of the race die in infancy, and it keeps parents mourning all around the world. They never get over it. They may live to shout and sing afterward, but there is always a corridor in the soul that is silent, though it once resounded. parents never mentioned the death of a child who died fifty years before without a tremor in the voice and a sigh. Oh! how deep-fetched. It was better she should die. It was a mercy she should die. She would have been a life-long invalid. But you cannot argue away a parent's grief. How often you hear the moan, "Oh, my child! my child!"

Then there are the

FILIAL TEARS.

Little children soon get over the loss of parents. They are easily diverted with a new toy. But where is the man that has come to thirty or forty or fifty years of age who can think of the old people without having all the fountains of his soul stirred up. You may have had to take care of her a good many years, but you can never forget how she used to take care of you. Have you never heard an old man in the delirium of some sickness call for his mother? The fact is we get so used to calling for her the first ten years of our life, we never get over it, and when she goes away from us it makes deep sorrow. You sometimes, perhaps, in days of trouble and darkness, when the world would say, "You ought to be able to take care of yourself"—you wake up from your dreams finding yourself saying, "Oh, mother! mother!"

"Have these tears no divine origin? Why, take all the warm hearts that ever beat in all lands, and in all ages, and put them together, and their united throb would be weak compared with the throb of God's eternal sympathy. Yes, God also is the father of all those

TEARS OF REPENTANCE.

Did you ever see a man repent? I see people going around trying to repent. They cannot repent. Do you know, no man can repent until God helps him to repent? How do I know? By this passage: "Him hath God exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour to give repentance." Oh! it is a tremendous hour when one wakes up and says: "I am a bad man, I have not sinned against the laws of the land, but I have wasted my life; God asked me for my services, but I haven't given those services. Oh! my sins, God forgive me!" When that tear starts it thrills all heaven. An angel cannot keep his eye off it, and the Church of God assembles around, and there is a commingling of tears—there is a rain of tears, and God is the father of that rain. The Lord, long-suffering, merciful, and gracious.

AN INCIDENT AT A REVIVAL.

In a religious assemblage a man arose and said: "I have been a very wicked man; I broke my mother's heart; I became an infidel; but I have seen my evil ways, and I have surrendered my heart to God; but it is a grief I can never get over that my parents should never have heard of my salvation; I don't know whether they are living or dead."

While yet he was standing in the audience, a voice from the gallery said: "Oh! my son, my son!" He looked up, and recognized her. It was his old mother. She had been praying for him for a great many years, and when at the foot of the cross the prodigal son and the praying mother embraced each other, there was a rain, a tremendous rain of tears, and God was the father of those tears.

Oh! if God would break us down with the sense of our sin, and then lift us with the appreciation of His mercy. Tears over our wasted life. Tears over a grieved Spirit. Tears over an injured Father. Repent! Repent!

The King of Carthage was dethroned. His people rebelled against him. He was driven into banishment. His wife and children were outrageously abused. Years went by, and the King of Carthage made many friends. He gathered up a great army. He marched again toward Carthage. Reaching the gates of Carthage, the best men of the place came out bare-footed and bare-headed, and with ropes around their necks crying for mercy. They said: "We abused you, and we abused your family, but we cry for mercy." The King of Carthage looked down upon the people from his chariot and said: "I came here to bless, I didn't come to destroy. You drove me out, but this day I pronounce pardon for all the people. Open the gate and let the army come in." The king marched in and took the throne, and the people all shouted: "Long live the king!"

My friends, you have driven the Lord Jesus Christ, the King of the Church, away from your heart; you have been maltreating Him all these years; but He comes back to-day. He stands in front of the gates of your soul. If you will only pray for His pardon He will meet you with His gracious spirit and He will say: "Thy sins and thine iniquities I will remember no more. Open wide the gate; I will take the throne. My peace I give unto you." And then from the young and from the old there will be a rain of tears, and God will be the father of that rain.

INCIDENTS RELATED AT A LONDON TEMPERANCE MEETING.

UNDER the presidency of Mr. Hind Smith, a meeting in the interest of Christian Temperance was held on the afternoon of June 23d, under the mulberry tree at Mildmay Conference Hall, London.

The Rev. Mr. Richardson, in the course of a vigorous speech, said that after becoming a temperance advocate, many years ago, he was reported to the Bishop of Winchester for so doing as a dangerous man and worse than a Chartist. But he had lived to see the day when the son of a renowned Bishop of Winchester was himself one of the leaders of the Temperance movement, and many of the clergy were now found in its ranks.

Mr. W. Noble, chief of the Blue Ribbon army, gave statistics of the work and other interesting information. He told of a woman having been attracted to Hoxton Hall, who was so utterly degraded, and who had broken the pledge so often, that her case was regarded as absolutely hopeless. But the Gospel Temperance Movement held out hope for the despairing. It encouraged even the most degraded and forsaken to believe that there were pardon, and strength, and cleansing for them in Jesus Christ. That poor woman had been encouraged to make a new start, and to look to Jesus as a present help in time of need. The result had been marvellous. A blessed change was apparent to all, and at the recent meeting in Exeter Hall she had stood up to testify to the saving power of Christ.

The Rev. Dr. Hole, of Cape Town, South Africa, described the principal features of temperance effort in that part of South Africa, and bore pleasing testimony to the good results of Mr. Noble's recent visit. He also related the following THRILLING STORY.

Some two or three years ago, at a Diocesan Conference in connection with the Church of England, a meeting was held under the presidency of a bishop, at which the subject of temperance was discussed. One clergyman spoke with much animation and ability against the principle of total abstinence, and presented his points so skilfully that he completely carried the meeting with him. "The Scripture says," he exclaimed, "'use hospitality,' and how in the world can you use hospitality if you disuse that which, in this country, is one of the most common forms of hospitality?" After that address a venerable minister arose and said: "My Lord Bishop, I desire to say a few words. I knew a young man who at the University contracted habits of intemperance, in consequence of which he was expelled from that seat of learning, and obliged to return home. His father, with great difficulty and with many prayers, sought to win him back to the ways of virtue. For some two years the young man was an abstainer, and at the end of that time it was proposed that he should leave home and enter business. The day before his intended departure he was invited to dine with a neighboring vicar. The young man declined to take wine or other intoxicants, and the company proceeded to remonstrate with him about the needless asceticism he was displaying, and urging him to do as others did. Unhappily he listened to their advice. That night he was carried home drunk, and in six months he died a hopeless drunkard. The host who led the young man wrong was the clergyman who has just addressed you, and I am the young man's father."

JAMES GRAHAM'S BUSH LIFE IN AUSTRALIA.

Setting Out for the Bush—Capital to Begin with—Value of a Good Wife—A Good Run—A Brass Plate for a Black King—A Bee Hunt—Successful Squatting—Furnishing a Hut—Perilous Adventures.

OFF we started on a bright spring day in September, 1843, about eleven years from the time I left home. Now I was about to form a home for many years on the farthest outpost of colonial civilization. Though I had as little money as when I returned from my first cruise in the bush to Hobart Town, yet I had more of what was not less valuable capital than money. As Green told me, I was a soft brick getting baked; I certainly had got burnt in the furnace of colonial experience, and was better fit to bear the weight of an establishment.

I had got experience of bush-life, which would enable me to manage cattle of all sorts under any circumstances; and if needs be, I could, like a black, take a tomahawk and support myself and my gin (I beg Selina's pardon). I had a sound constitution, as good, thank Heaven, as ever carried a man into the bush; and it was unbroken by dissipation, and grew stronger by hard work. I had, however, subsequently to learn that it required management. How long it is before a man learns to break in his own temper, and manage either his muscles, his mind, or his money!

I had got another good thing, better than all; I had got a wife who had tongue enough to tell me my faults (as far as I could bear the discovery), and hands enough to help at any work. I had a Bible, too, the whole of which, so far as I knew it, I believed, and found that part as true as others, "Two are better than one, because they have a good reward for their labor. For if they fall the one will lift up his fellow; but woe unto him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up."

What a fool Solomon was that he did not keep to this doctrine himself, instead of getting a wife for every day in the year, and thereby leaving him peace on neither Saturday nor Sunday, from the first of January till the last of December, till he died as a fool dieth! The black fellows make their wives work for them, and can sell them at will, and thus many wives are wealth to them; but as they see the white fellow work for his gin, no wonder the black thinks this the reason he only wishes one wife, as two would work him to death.

On going to my own station I felt that my work would be for myself and my better half, and so the inspiration of hope possessed me. Selina shared my feelings, and we resolved that having got a hold of the world, we should, by God's help, keep it.

Our run was a good one, having seven miles of water frontage on the Mow Poke Creek, with as wide a margin as we liked. In all, it included about seventy-five square miles. I was well acquainted with it every mile, as I had explored it myself for Meals, and I had seen good substantial huts put up, as well as a split-rail fenced stock-yard for cattle and a paddock for horses. I had the station honestly formed and I now enjoyed the benefit. Mow Poke is not the native name of it, but as a nocturnal bird abounds there, whose low, plaintive cry sounds very like more pork, the bird is called More Pork; and the English, leaving out the r, call it Mow Poke. This name I gave to the station and the creek on which it stands. The creek runs into the Yeo Yeo Creek, which is a river in winter, flowing for miles and miles till it is lost in the desert sands like many other greater waters of this region. In summer it is a chain of pools and water holes.

The Yeo Yeo, sometimes called "Old Man water-hole," was so called by the blacks, because they said a yeo yeo—a monster whose height was gigantic, and whose feet were turned the wrong way—used to frequent it. This was probably a monster kangaroo. My station was the farthest out toward the desert. The first day we camped for dinner near Weedin mountain, that rises like a sugar-loaf out of the plain. A wild dog saw us and ran into a hollow log. We resolved to have him out. So I kindled a fire at the entrance of the log, and cut a hole just large enough for him to squeeze out of at the other end. When he had wriggled out I let go the dogs at him, and Bighead soon stopped his wind. We slept under the dray with the tarpaulin let down as a curtain (beautiful apartment and tapestry, say I) and had plenty of fresh air and golden dreams. Next evening we reached the station.

The blacks were there encamped within two hundred yards of the hut. I brought a brass plate, and put it on Jemmy Curraburma as the acknowledged king of the place and people. This is the only safe way with the blacks, for so you acknowledge and establish authority. They had that day hunted for "suga bag," and brought us a large calabash of beautiful honey. This was a really acceptable luxury, and with butter, cream, tea, and damper made an auspicious tea. It was almost as pleasant as the honey itself to see the natives hunt for it. I know nothing, except the making and throwing of the boomerang, in which they display more delicate skill. Just see a bee-hunt, and it will make you laugh though you were as tired as I was, after getting all the new stock into the yard on that evening of our arrival at Mow Poke.

Here is a black fellow waiting at the water hole, at which the bee comes to get water to moisten its wax. He has a pair of twig forceps with a tuft of hawk down, which has been touched with gum to make it stick. Moreover, he has his mouth full of water. The moment that the little house-fly-like bee alights at the water's edge, he spurts the mouthful of water on it, and it cannot rise. Then he sticks the down on it, and when it dries the bee sails slowly away, but yet flies as fast as the black can run for his life. Several blacks take part in the chase, all eagerly eyeing the bee. If one falls over a log or fallen tree, or into a hole, the others still pursue. Perhaps before they reach the bee's nest, two or three will have tumbled down most laughably. It is really exciting sport even to look on. But they track the bee to the tree where its nest is.

When it alights, they watch it till it makes its way into the hole that leads to its honeyed store in the hollow branch or log. Then the black will tap the honey by cutting a hole under the nest, and it will fall into bark dishes abundantly. The bee-bread (with which the young bees are fed) is nutritious and sweet eating. The bees have no sting to defend their treasures, so that it is all fun and no risk, except an innocent tumble in the bee-hunt. The honey abounded around us, and the blacks were liberal of it. It and native manna we often used as a substitute for sugar, when that commodity grew scarce.

Next day I dismissed the bullock-driver, and took upon myself the work of three men; that of hut-keeper, stock-keeper, and dairyman. Selina helped to the utmost of her power, and she and hope, with occasional help from the blacks, carried me through the first three months, till I sold a load of cheese and some fat bullocks in Goulbourne, and had money to employ a stock-keeper.

I often had occasion to visit Goulbourne market, and as my expenses were small, and sales of hides, tallow, beef, and cheese considerable, I began to get my head above water, was able to employ a stockman, buy Selina a bright dress—she loved bright colors in a dress, and the bright side of things in general—and at length I felt I could take a lounge at noon on the sofa, and enjoy the sweets of partial rest.

Cattle at that time were miserably cheap. I took sixty to Goulbourne, and by boiling them down made thirty shillings a head. Hide, head, and tongue just paid for boiling down. I then lodged forty pounds in the bank, and never since wanted money in that public safe. I then, for the first time in my life, had the honor and glory of paying accounts by checks on "my banker."

I had been a laborer, a stockman, a superintendent, and now, through God's blessing, I was a squatter with no man on earth to say I owed him a penny. I had crept up the colonial ladder step by step, and resolved I should not tumble down, or rather, I had made the ladder and put in the steps, and knew they were not rotten, and could feel my foothold with a sense of security. I never went into anything I could not see my way out of without making any one loser by my speculation. I knew I could work hard and persevere, and I was resolved, by God's help, to make as much as would take me home in competence, fine down my father's farm, and make his old days easy. I told all my plans to Selina, and she sympathized with me. I used to talk so much of the old scenes and early friends that she said she knew them better than I did.

Once when I had cattle for Goulbourne, I bought twelve mahogany chairs at an auction by a Jew. They were hair-bottomed and excellent, twenty-four shillings a-piece; the first ever brought into the Blan Bush. They were the surprise of Selina and the admiration of neighbors. They were the subject of wonder, laughter, and jabbering to the blacks for weeks afterward. They would peep in and look at us sitting on them, and then disappear shaking with laughter, and imitate us in fantastic style to the tribe. They thought chairs a very ridiculous institution. When I brought home a large looking-glass and they saw themselves there in, half the tribe gathered and got a sight of it. The chief came forward and stood, and leaped and turned before it, wondering first in gravity, then bursting into laughter at his other "min own self Jemmy, Cobon stupid doing like it min own self." He turned his nose from side to side with his fingers, and seeing the same in the glass shouted, "Make a light moro. Do look at m nose!"

Some of my journeys were not without a spice of adventure. One night, when returning with dray of stores from Yass, all alone, and without arms, I camped out on a creek and hobbled my horse. I had cut down wood for a blazing fire and as I stood with the hatchet in my hand, there were, not far away, the flash and the report of gun, and I thought I heard the ball whizzing past me. I saw the man that fired, and taking a "ci cumbendibus" was in front of him in a minute but I kept in the shade. I asked him what he wanted. He said he had lost his way. I believe he had followed me for miles, and either intended to shoot or frighten me, so that he might rob my dray. I kept a steady voice, as if I had a loaded revolver in my hand, and he by and by rode off, to my great satisfaction.

Not long after the affair just mentioned, I was driving some cattle over the creek, when one of them ran into the garden among rank weeds. followed; and a great black snake, on which she had trod, rose on end hissing, and darted at my breast. It caught me by the shirt, but did not pierce the skin. I had neither shoes nor stockings on at the time, and had it caught me by the leg, I was done for; but the stiff shirt breast proved a shield. It was the work of a moment but that moment might have been death.

How often it is, that when outer life runs smoothest, the heart is passing through its sharpest struggles, and its noiseless currents are eddying, whirling, and broken in unseen cataracts, and hidden rocks! The man, at whose hair-breadth escapes we shudder, will tell you that you feel probably more at their narration than he did at their occurrence; and that the contemptuous look of a friend caused him more real trouble than the presented pistol of a foe. The one was but the peril of the moment, and awoke passions and resources adequate to the occasion, the other pierced to keener susceptibilities, and left its barb undrawn for years.

To a nature so home-loving as James Graham's it was a painful trial not to hear from home; and he had received only three letters from his parents since he left Bathurst; that is for some nine years. This, it is true, was principally his own fault. He had, in a season of dejection, resolved not to write till he could write something that would cheer his friends; but, in adhering to that unwise resolve he did not sufficiently reflect on what doubt and anguish this would cause to his friends, especially to his mother, whose heart cherished the thought of him in its inmost life, and was sensitive beyond expression to his interests. The letters addressed to him at Bathurst never reached him, as no one there knew his whereabouts.

When at length he wrote home, two years after he came to the Blan country, his letter reached home, but it was the only one they received from him for seven years. Others he wrote, but they failed of their destination; and the few he received complained bitterly of his silence. He thought of home, felt about home, prayed about home, talked day and night to his wife about home; and yet strange to say, he was thus dilatory in writing home. He can tell you many causes of his delay and infrequency in writing.

Ah, but, young man, none of these are apologies for, though they may be mitigations of, your culpable neglect. You think of the old homestead and the bees humming on the honied leaves of the sycamore tree; but see your mother as she sits sewing there, and the big tears trickle down over her thin pale face; why do they pass so hot and rapid over those moveless features? It is for you they are falling, while her heart alternately fears, prays, and blames? See your father there, on the winter night by the crackling fire, how thoughtful his face becomes in the pauses of story, song, and laugh—he is thinking of you. See your sister, with whom you used to romp and run over the green park and the shamrock field; she often weeps while she rocks her baby's cradle, and she begins to think you are dead. Shame, shame, young man, to think one sheet of paper and one hour could send a message that would swell those hearts with proud joy, and yet you do not write that letter. It is very thoughtless and wrong on your part. But you have wept more tears than they did over this neglect, and we shall blame you no more; you have bitterly proved that every sin draws after it sorrow—that "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT IN RELATION TO PROPHECY.

By Rev. William Maude.

Important Passages Compared—The Parousia—Alterations of Value—The Supreme Object of Biblical Science.

ONE great prophetic passage in which the English reader will derive much advantage from the uniform rendering of the Greek word ktisis, is Rom. 8: 18-23, which reads as follows:

AUTHORIZED.	REVISED.
"For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us. For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body."	"For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us-ward. For the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God. For the creation was subjected to vanity, not of its own will, but by reason of him who subjected it in hope that the creation (marg. 'in hope, because the creation') itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together (marg. "with us") until now. And not only so, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body."

What reader of the Authorized Version could have apprehended the fact, that "the creature" which in "earnest expectation is waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God," is the self-same "creation" which has been "subjected to vanity in hope;" and shall yet be "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God?"

Of course the recognition of the fact that it is the same "creation" which is spoken of throughout, does not solve for us the exegetical difficulty as to what is precisely included in the word in this connection; whether it means mankind in general exclusive of the Church, or mankind and the lower animals, or the whole animate and inanimate world in contradistinction to mankind. Be this as it may, however, the new reading gives both clearness and unity of meaning to the passage.

But besides this principal one, the reader will not fail to note several minor but not unimportant corrections in the passage as given in the Revised Version. In the first place, instead of "the glory which shall be revealed in us," we now read, "the glory which shall be revealed to us-ward." This brings the clause into harmony with the whole scope of the passage, which refers not to any subjective or spiritual glory within the Church, but to an objective glory to be manifested in the world in connection with the glorification of the Church in resurrection. All that follows being, in point of fact, only the development of the previous statement.

Again; the translation of the 20th verse: "For the creation was subjected to vanity, not of its own will, but by reason of him who subjected it in hope that the creation (marg., "in hope, because the creation") itself also shall be delivered," etc., not only gives us a clue to the true meaning of the ktisis, but at the same time indicates, if we adopt the marginal rendering, the ground and nature of the hope expressed.

Another important passage of a prophetic character in which the corrections made in the Revised Version should be gratefully accepted, is 2 Thess. 2: 1-10—a passage, by the way, which has recently been the subject of our special consideration in these pages. It reads as follows:

AUTHORIZED.	REVISED.
"Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto Him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition: who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God. Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things? And now ye know what withholdeth that he might be revealed in his time. For the mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he that now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming. Even he whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish."	"Now we beseech you, brethren, touching the coming (marg. 'presence') of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together unto Him; to the end that ye be not quickly shaken from your mind, nor yet be troubled, either by spirit, or by word, or by epistle as from us, as that the day of the Lord is now present: let no man beguile you in any wise; for it will not be, except the falling away come first, and the man of sin (marg. 'lawlessness') be revealed, the son of perdition, he that opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped (marg. 'that is an object of worship'); so that he sitteth in the temple (marg. 'sanctuary') of God, setting himself forth as God. Remember ye not, that when I was yet with you, I told you these things? And now ye know what restraineth to the end that he may be revealed in his own season. For the mystery of lawlessness doth already work; only there is one that restraineth now, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall be revealed the lawless one, whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the breath of His mouth, and bring to naught by the manifestation of His coming (marg. 'presence'); even he whose coming (marg. 'presence') is according to the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders (marg. 'power and signs and wonders of falsehood,') and with all deceit of unrighteousness for them that are perishing."

In this one passage, it will be seen, we have no less than twenty-five alterations, very few of which can fairly be said to be uncalled for, while several are of great importance as elucidating the true meaning of the text. Indeed we think we could point out one or two additional alterations which, though the revisers have not made them, were much to be desired. Be that as it may, however, we would observe, in the first place, that the substitution of the word "touching" for the unmeaning "by" of the Authorized Version, at the very commencement of the passage, clearly indicates the subject on which the Apostle is about to write; that subject being "the coming, or presence, of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together unto Him." Hence he says, "We beseech you, brethren, touching (i.e., in regard to) the coming," etc. The Thessalonian believers had, it appears, been led by some false teachers into a serious error in reference to this blessed hope.

And here, secondly, we find a still more important correction in the Revised Version. What the true nature of their error was, the Authorized Version not only fails to teach us, but actually raises a false issue by the words, "as that the day of Christ is at hand." There would have been nothing wrong in the Thessalonians believing that "the day of the Lord was at hand." What they were wrong in was in supposing that that solemnly-glorious day had actually set in, and this the corrected rendering clearly indicates: "As that the day of the Lord is now present."

Again—the insertion of the definite article twice in the third verse, where, instead of "a falling away," and "that man of sin," we now read, "except the falling away come first, and the man of sin be revealed," does much to clear the Apostle's meaning, intimating, as it does, that he refers to the great final apostacy of this dispensation and the coming of the last personal Antichrist. In reference to this latter event another decided improvement is the substitution of the reading, "that he may be revealed in his own season," for that of the Authorized Version, "that he may be revealed in his time." Nor must we overlook the correct rendering of the Greek word, anomos, of special significance in connection with the character of the last days, in the expressions, "the mystery of iniquity," and "that wicked," which now read, "the mystery of lawlessness," and "that lawless one."

But though our subject is far from being exhausted, we must, for the present, conclude these remarks, reserving the consideration of the alterations and emendations made in the Apocalypse for another paper. Meanwhile we earnestly commend the careful and prayerful study of the Revised Version of the New Testament to our readers, as a noble, conscientious, and on the whole trustworthy work, for which our deepest gratitude is due to its learned undertakers, reminding them, in the words of Dr. Roberts, that it is only to be expected that "at first not a few of the changes or omissions in the Revised Version should be felt to be disagreeable. The old familiar rhythm is disturbed, and the ear longs for the words to which it has been accustomed. But whether the true readings be deemed improvements or not, they should be welcomed simply on the ground of their genuineness. To find out what is true is the supreme object of Biblical science; and while, no doubt, there may often seem an artificial attractiveness about what is erroneous, there should always be felt a sovereign majesty in truth."

A Great War of Race and Faith is Threatened which may, should it break out, agitate Europe, Asia, and Africa. Many expositors of prophecy have held the opinion that the decay of the Turkish empire, symbolized by the drying up of the Euphrates, would be marked by the outbreak of Mohammedan fanaticism as one of the three frog-like spirits (Rev. 16: 12-14). The following remarks from a recent number of the French journal La Liberté show that careful observers already see indications of the gathering storm: "In the Mussulman world at the present moment a vast and profound movement is going on, with Constantinople for its centre. All Islam is aroused, and if appearances are to be trusted, a breath of holy war is exciting the Sectaries of the Koran against the sons of the Gospel. The Turks, feeling themselves lost, are the movers of the plot, and all the powers in direct contact with Mohammedan populations are menaced. On the day in which Panislamism shall attempt a supreme revenge against triumphant Christianity, it will not be in Algeria only, to be avenged on France, but also in India against England, and in Europe against Russia and Austria that it will endeavor to wreak its hate. Turkey indulges in no illusion as to the fate that awaits her. By degrees she sees herself despoiled of all her European provinces. What will soon remain of the great empire she valiantly conquered in Europe and preserved for 500 years? War and diplomacy are combining to lessen and divide her so as to drive the Turks beyond the Bosphorus. They understand that; and feel a rage which their traditional fatalism is now powerless to subdue."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Reports of the Wounded President's progress during the early part of last week continued to be of a hopeful character. Is was predicted that if the improvement in the patient's condition was kept up, he would soon be able to bear a short trip on the river. He was allowed to eat solid food, his appetite was good, and his sleep natural and refreshing. On Friday night, however, symptoms were observed which caused serious alarm. The President passed a restless night. His attendants said that the morphine, which heretofore had worked so well on him, for the time lost its effect, and even had an opposite effect to that for which it was administered. On Saturday morning about seven o'clock, while the physicians were examining and dressing his wound, the President complained of a chill. He clenched his hands and his face became white. Slight contractions of the muscles then appeared, and later on his jaws moved convulsively. Presently the muscles softened and he breathed heavily. The chill seemed to have passed away, but in less than a minute he was again suffering. The same symptoms appeared as during the first attack, but remaining longer. After another interval of relief they appeared for the third time. The three spasms lasted twelve minutes. Morphia was then administered and the President became quiet, but for more than an hour afterward he was restless, in some pain, and in constant apprehension of another chill. By nine o'clock the pulse had increased from 92 to 130, and the temperature and respiration mounted rapidly. The physicians became alarmed and telegrams were dispatched to Dr. Hamilton of New York and Dr. Agnew of Philadelphia, the consulting physicians, urging their immediate attendance. They left by special train, but on arriving at Washington the President was sleeping quietly under the influence of morphia, and the fever had abated.

As a sudden chill and fever in cases of gunshot wounds are regarded as symptoms of pyæmia or blood poisoning, which nearly always ends fatally, the alarm produced by the President's relapse was natural. Other symptoms, however, indicate that there has been no blood poisoning, and the physicians hope that the chill and the other alarming changes were the result of an obstruction they found in the wound, which prevented the outflow of the discharge.

A Surgical Operation was Performed on the President on Sunday which gave him considerable relief. It appears that the long channel made in his body by the assassin's bullet takes a downward direction. The discharge from the wound, which must continue during the process of healing, has therefore to work its way upward. The ball struck and badly shattered one of the President's ribs, and the fragments of bone, it is supposed, fell into the channel made by the bullet, for Dr. Bliss found that a cavity or pocket had been made by some foreign substance, and in which the pus had collected instead of flowing out of the orifice. This collection caused the chill the President experienced on Saturday. When Dr. Agnew arrived at Washington he decided that this pus must be drawn away. He therefore made a wide incision an inch deep and three inches below the spot where the ball struck. A perforated flexible tube was then inserted, passed through the cavity where the pus had collected, and into the channel of the ball, thus forming a kind of siphon, through which the pus flowed freely. The President bore the operation bravely. The bulletins issued on Monday were of a hopeful character.

The Election of the Hon. Elbridge G. Lapham to the United States Senate in the place of Mr. Conkling, on Friday, July 22d, terminates a contest of which every one was thoroughly weary. It had been apparent for several days that all hope of re-electing the ex-Senator had been abandoned by his friends at Albany, and that a mere question of form alone prevented the election of Mr. Lapham. On Friday morning rumors were current that the Democrats were considering the propriety of bringing the contest to a close by absenting themselves from the convention. Had they have done so, the number necessary to a choice would have been reduced to a point covered by Mr. Lapham's supporters. Neither the Stalwarts nor the Administration men would have been satisfied by such a termination to the struggle, as it would have left the Republican party divided for the fall campaign. A Republican conference was therefore held, which called a caucus for the same day. At the caucus each Stalwart recorded his vote for Mr. Conkling, and then, according to custom, when the number of Lapham votes was declared in the majority, Senator Winslow, a Stalwart, moved to make the nomination unanimous. When the convention assembled that evening the Republican vote was cast solidly for Mr. Lapham and he was elected by 93 votes agains 42 Democratic votes cast for Mr. Potter.

The Candidates for the Senatorship Recorded, before the Legislature adjourned, their appreciation of the conduct of their respective supporters. The successful candidates were serenaded at their hotel and made speeches in reply to the congratulations tendered them. It was remarked, with some degree of apprehension, that Mr. Lapham, in the course of his speech, referred to the question of patronage in a way that augured future trouble. He said: "We have not been selected, fellow-citizens, for the poor purpose of dispensing the federal patronage in this great State of New York. That is an inferior portion of the high duty devolving upon a Senator from the Imperial State. It is a duty which my honorable colleague and myself, I trust, will be able to discharge with malice to none, with hatred to none, with charity for all." After the unpleasantness that has arisen out of this subject, it would have been satisfactory to learn that the new Senator did not regard the distribution of Federal patronage as even "an inferior portion" of his duty.

Mr. Conkling telegraphed his thanks to his supporters as follows: "The heroic constancy of the Spartan band which so long has stood for principle and truth has my deepest gratitude and admiration. Borne down by forbidden and abhorrent forces, and agencies which never before had sway in the Republican party, the memory of their courage and manhood will long live in highest honor. The near future will vindicate their wisdom and crown them with approval. Please ask them all for me to receive my most grateful acknowledgments."

The Necessity of Civil Service Reform has become apparent even to the members of the Cabinet. Mr. James was from the first an advocate of a change, his experience in the New York Post Office having satisfied him that the system of appointments by competitive examination and removal only for misconduct is the only system which works satisfactorily in the end. Mr. Windom, the Secretary of the Treasury, after wasting eight-tenths of his time since he accepted office in dealing with the applications of office seekers, has become a convert to civil service reform. Now Secretary Blaine is reported as saying that, while he has never before been a believer in such a system he is now; and that the experience of three months has shown that it is necessary that something be done to take off the pressure of the office-seekers. It is said that before the President was stricken down by Guiteau's bullet he had become so wearied with the pertinacity of applicants for office, and was so disappointed with the results of his distribution of the spoils, that he also was convinced of the necessity of reform, and would have recommended it in his message to Congress. Should his life be spared in the providence of God, we may hope to see this much-needed improvement inaugurated.

A Temperance Ticket is out in Ohio. A State convention, convened by the Temperance Reform Convention, met on July 20th at the grounds of the Cincinnati Camp Meeting Association near Loveland. A resolution was passed unanimously pledging the delegates not to vote for any one who opposes local option, either for legislative or State offices, and that the whole influence of the convention be used in favor of the election of men who will endeavor to suppress the liquor traffic. A letter was read from Governor Foster, the Republican candidate for the governorship, but it failed to satisfy the Prohibitionists. The temperance plank in the Republican platform, on the vagueness of which we commented in a former number of this journal, was also discussed and pronounced unsatisfactory. The Convention then proceeded to nominate a distinct Prohibition Ticket. Abraham R. Ludlow, a manufacturer of Springfield, was nominated for Governor. He has hitherto been an active Republican. The candidate for Lieutenant-Governor is a Democrat, Mr. W. McVeigh, of Columbus. The other candidates are also taken from both parties. The progress of the contest will be watched with keen interest. Governor Foster is an intimate friend of President Garfield, and Senator Sherman advocated his nomination at the Republican convention. The Democratic ticket is likewise a strong one. The regular tickets will command the strong German vote, but the rapid progress of temperance principles in Ohio will render the result very doubtful.

The Fatal Cases of Lockjaw Produced by the use of toy pistols on July 4th are this year more numerous than usual, seventeen occurring in the city of Baltimore alone. The toy pistol in use explodes a blank cartridge with a pasteboard wad. In inserting the cartridge, if the boy is a little careless, the hammer slips, the cartridge is exploded, and the hard wad makes an ugly wound in the palm of his left hand. This wound is jagged and irregular, causing serious injury to the nerves and bloodvessels concentring there, and lockjaw is the result. It is also a source of moral danger for small boys to become familiarized with the use of toy pistols, which, as years go by, they abandon for a more dangerous weapon.

Mr. Moody's Conference, to be Held at North-field, Mass., on August 3d and the following days will, it is expected, be rendered additionally interesting by the presence of several friends who have been for some time engaged in evangelistic work in Europe. Major D. W. Whittle and Mr. and Mrs. McGrannahan hope to be present, and Mr. Sankey will attend and take part in the meetings. Rev. Andrew Bonar, D.D., has also accepted Mr. Moody's invitation.

The New York Medical Mission, the Inaugu-ration of which was described in a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was last week a witness to the efficacy of prayer. The applications for aid have been very numerous, and the funds were temporarily exhausted. The matter was carried to God in prayer, and although at night not a cent remained to meet the needs of the coming day, the managers were full of faith. In the morning a check was received by the first mail for a considerable sum, the gift of a friend which he had written out some days previously, but had omitted to send until the previous night.

A Reminiscence of President Garfield's Colge life is reported by Dr. Irenæus Prime, who rites from Williamstown, Mass., having attended e commencement exercises to which the President as on his way when he was shot. Dr. Prime ys, "The class of 1856, of which President Gar-ld was a member, had a gathering at this com-encement. In a meeting to pray for the Presi-nt's recovery, one of his classmates rose and id:

"'Twenty-six years ago to-night, and at this ry hour, our class were on the top of Graylock to end the night of the Fourth of July. As we ere about to lie down to sleep, Garfield took out s pocket testament, and said, "I am in the habit reading a chapter every night at this time with y mother. Shall I read aloud?" All assented, d when he had read he asked the oldest mem-r of the class to pray. And there in the night, the mountain top, we prayed with him for hom we have now assembled to pray.'"

Precious Dirt is Among the Innumerable ticles of traffic in large cities. It appears that e sweepings of jewellers' shops are kept and are orth about $70 a barrel after the most scrupulous re has been taken to prevent stray pieces of gold tting into them. Whenever a shop floor is to be ken up and renewed, it is always calculated that e dirt accumulated in the crevices will more than y the cost of the new floor. Jewellers say that e value of the shop dirt is owing to the dust of etals that is blown about the place, and not from y carelessness of workmen. The sweepings us readily sold must be submitted to careful eration by the hands of a skilled assayer before e purchase becomes remunerative, but we are minded by the transaction that Jesus in His mes-ge to the wealthy church of Laodicea offers to l refined gold, which He counsels them to buy if y would be really rich (Rev. 3 : 18).

The Kinks in the Arrows was an Illustration ed in a Christian speaker's address last week to scribe the effect of divine discipline on the sons God. He said the Indians in making their ar-ws cut the green boughs, and, tying them with a ing to the growing limb of a tree, the other end held down by a heavy stone. This process es out the kinks and straightens the intended ow. So the Lord seeks to take the kinks out of by laying upon us heavy burdens of care and trial.

A Marriage in a Good Templar Lodge, the st ceremony of the kind, it is believed, that has en place there since the formation of the order, s performed in the Lodge of the Templars of eedom of New York, on July 11th. The bride, degroom, and officiating minister were all Good mplars, and the Lodge also furnished the con-gent of bridesmaids and groomsmen to complete wedding party. After the religious ceremony, eches were made, of which a prominent topic s the duty of the wife to see that her husband intained his connection with Good Templarism d adhered to the principles of the order. In nor of the event a resolution was passed remit-g the bridegroom's fees as long as he lived. ough the wedding belongs to the category that some quarters is contemptuously called "a dry dding," it appears to have been thoroughly en-ed by all present, and the young couple entered their new life under happier auspices than if the emony had been followed by a scene of dissipa-n, and profuse drinking of healths.

A Prize Fight was Stopped by a Woman at ondale, Pa., on Saturday, July 9th. Five hun-d or more spectators were present and evinced ir delight as first one and then the other of the nbatants received "punishment." The strug-had been fierce and cruel, and the friends of e of the men had just announced that he would ntinue fighting till he won "if it took all sum-r," when a pale, haggard little woman dashed ough the crowd, greatly agitated, and on gain-the open space within, rushed up to the brute, o was waiting calmly for his victim and struck n in the breast, exclaiming "Mick, is it you o want to kill my Jimmie? Get away wid ye w." Then turning to the prostrate man, she ed in a voice of tenderness, "Ah, Jimmie, Jim-, what's come over you, fightin' away like this, an' your little Allie dead." The stupid pugilist brightened a minute, and answered, "Did you say Allie was dead, Nancy?" "Yes, yes," and she clasped her hands with a mournful wail. "Dead she is, Jimmie, and you never came near home last night, but were drinking your pay in some shebeen-house. Oh, my curse on the shebeen-houses—my bitter curse on them this day." She wiped the bleeding, bloated face of her young husband as she spoke, and there was no more fighting that day. Satan uses liquor and evil associates to brutalize men, and he is successful in his work, but the effect produced on this man by the announcement that his child was dead shows that even in the most degraded there is often a trace of a better nature remaining, indicating what they have fallen from, and what they might be raised to by the grace of God and the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit.

An ex-Senator's Indictment of Intoxicating liquors was made recently in the course of a speech at a prohibitory meeting in Reidsville, N. C. He said: "I have never meddled with liquor. I have never drank it, have hardly kept it as a medicine in my family, and yet it has meddled with me, has made my boy a wandering vagabond, has broken my wife's heart; yes, when I was asleep, thinking him at home in the house, he was being made a drunkard in the bar-rooms of Raleigh." The ex-Senator has abundant cause for advocating prohibition.

The Heroism of Two Convicts at Philadelphia on July 14th has earned for them a commutation of sentence. The gang of prisoners were loading stone at the House of Correction wharf, Philadelphia, when one of them fell off into the river. Another prisoner jumped in to save him, and both were going down for the last time, when a third also jumped in. Going down below the surface he actually crawled beneath the others and raised them up so that those on the barge could fish them out. The heroic conduct of the rescuers was reported to the managers, and as a recognition of their bravery their time was commuted from two years to three months. This is an instance of pardon earned by courage and self-forgetfulness. It suggests the justified sinner's position, but with this important difference that it was by the sacrifice of his Substitute that he received a pardon he could never earn (Eph. 2 : 9).

A Pathetic Scene was Witnessed in Brooklyn in a tenement house, on July 19th. A policeman entered the rooms of a family and found six ragged children there, while the father and mother lay on the floor in a state of intoxication. The eldest boy was walking about the room with a baby in his arms. He said that it was asleep, but the policeman found, on taking it up, that it was dead. "'Tain't dead," said the boy. "I know it's 'sleep, 'cause I sung it to sleep." When the lad discovered that the child was really dead, he sat down in one corner and wept. The father and mother recovered slowly from their stupor, and seemed unaffected when told that their child was dead. Facts such as these, and they are numerous, should convince all Christians that their place is in the ranks of those who are laboring to resist this soul-destroying traffic.

The Career of Twenty Rum-sellers and their families is sketched by a writer in a Southern journal, who says: "During a period of twenty-five years, from 1830 to 1855, I remember twenty individuals who were at one time or another engaged in the business of selling liquor at or near a little village in South Carolina. Of that number fifteen failed in business, either while selling or afterward. Five have died from the excessive use of ardent spirits. Ten of their sons fell early victims to the appetite, and fill drunkards' graves, while nine others have at different times been addicted to drunken sprees and are in the utmost danger of falling before the same dreadful habit. Ten of their daughters are or have been married to drunkards. Three of their sons are idiots or imbeciles, and there are other indications which to a close observer call to mind the denunciation of Holy Writ, 'Woe to him that giveth his neighbor drink, and maketh him drunken also.'"

THE SWIFTLY RUNNING WORD.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"His word runneth very swiftly."—PSALM 147 : 15.

Words as Indications of Character—God's Word a Manifestation—Takes many Forms—I. The Lessons of the Text—The Word Operates still With the Same Force as of Old—Silently—Effectually—It is Omnipotent—II. Particular Instances of the Word Running Swiftly—Creation—In the Works of Nature—In Providence—Judgments—In Mercy—In Grace—Conviction Instantaneous—Regeneration—Justification—Adoption—With Churches—III. The Teaching of the Subject—The Seeker may be Saved now—The Word Overtakes those who Run Away—The Almighty not to be Limited

A WORD is the expression of the mind. What a man has thought may live and die within himself, but when he wishes his thought to live in the outer world he embodies it in a word, and thus his thought is made known. Thought without expression is as an arm unlifted, working nothing though it be the mainspring of action; but according to the ability of the man his thought is carried out into fact if he be able to speak a powerful word of command. Hence, as the garment of thought and the accomplishment of wish, a word is a very important thing.

A word is the manifestation of a man. Dryden says:

> "Speech is the light, the morning of the mind;
> It spreads the beauteous images abroad,
> Which else lie furled and shrouded in the soul."

"Speak," said the old philosopher, "that I may see thee." More of a man is seen in his words than in anything else belonging to him; you may look into his face and be mistaken, you may visit his house and not discover him, you may scan his business and misunderstand him; but if you hear his daily conversation you shall soon know him. The heart babbles out its secret when the tongue is in motion. As the full bucket betrays the water of the well, so is a man discerned by his speech. Thus a word takes a most prominent place in reference to all intelligent beings, and this is peculiarly the case with the Lord our God.

God's word is the manifestation of His secret thought. By it He reveals His decree; by it He manifests His nature; by it He carries out His purpose. "He spake, and it was done; He commanded, and it stood fast." If you wish to know God you must know His word; if you wish to perceive His power you must see how He worketh by His word; if you wish to know His purpose before it is actually brought to pass you can only discover it by His word. When you watch the events of Providence you are only observing what the word of God is accomplishing as He sends it forth into the world. As He said to His servant Ezekiel, so it is: "I am the Lord: I will speak, and the word that I shall speak shall come to pass." According to our text, "He sendeth forth his commandment upon earth: His word runneth very swiftly."

The word as it comes from God takes several forms. At first it came forth as a fiat: "Let it be," and it was. When there were no angels to hear Him, when matter did not exist to obey Him, when there was nothing but Himself, the self-existent One, Jehovah, spake, and the things which are began to be. Since then He has spoken to His creatures by the word of command, which should ever be obeyed; even as David said, "I will delight myself in Thy statutes; I will not forget Thy word." The word of the Lord comes forth in the form of a precept from His temple, or a statute from His throne, and we ought most reverently to treasure up every syllable that God speaketh to us in that form; for we are His servants.

He also speaks by way of teaching. He instructs us by revealing Himself through His word. All true doctrine is the word of God, and is to be devoutly believed. Our prayer should be, "Give me understanding according to Thy word." His word is also spoken in the form of promise, rich and free and gracious, the word on which His children live. In this form it is sweeter than honey, or the honeycomb. It flashes forth also like lightning flames in threatenings, when God dooms the ungodly or warns them of what shall follow except they repent. Terrible indeed is the word by which justice takes vengeance upon the wicked.

But chief of all, and above all is of whom John speaketh: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: the same was in the beginning with God." This is He of whom we read in the Revelation, "He was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood, and his name is called the Word of God." That Word is the incarnation of God, wherein God has been pleased to manifest Himself more fully than by all other words or works; for in His Son we see the brightness of the Father's glory more than in all besides, according to His own testimony, "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." To all these forms of God's word our text may be appropriately applied.

I shall, first, ask you by the help of God's Holy Spirit to learn the lesson of the text; secondly, let us look to the particular instances which illustrate the truth of the text; and then, thirdly, as the Lord shall help us, let us see what teaching we may individually gather from it for our own cases.

I. First, let us learn the lesson of the text: "His word runneth very swiftly."

We understand from this sentence, first, that the word of God which operated of old is operating still. "By the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water." But God did not create the world and then leave it, else had it crumbled back into the nothingness from which it came: "the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store." Creation is not like a watch which God has made and wound up, to go by itself; but every movement of every wheel of the machinery of nature is dependent upon the constant outgoing of power through the word of God; for of Him and through Him are all things, and "by Him all things consist." Our wise men are continually talking of the laws of nature, and we know that there are such laws, or, in other words, it is a fact that God usually acts in such and such a way; but to suppose that there is any power in the mere laws of nature is absolutely absurd. You may make laws in your household that things are to be done in such and such a way; but unless somebody carries them out laws are nothing.

Locomotives obey certain laws of motion; but without steam to drive them the laws of motion will allow them to rust in the engine-house. There is a law of gravitation; but the force of gravitation comes not from the law, but from God. There is a law of growth; but the power by which plants and animals grow is an energy which flows from God. It may be a fact that the force operates in such and such a manner, as a stream runs in a certain channel, but, as the channel is not the stream, so the rule of nature is not the power of nature. Man lives, and all nature exists, by the word of God, for "none can keep alive his own soul." It is of our Lord that we read in the Epistle to the Hebrews, "upholding all things by the word of His power."

with which God made the world is pulsing still through space.

Let us go a step further: the word of God which operated at the first is operating still with the same degree of force. Creation may, if God so pleases, wax old as doth a garment; but the hand which created it is as full of power as ever. The sun's light, and all else that is needful for man, will continue according to the Divine appointment, and will never be exhausted while the Lord supplies them. If any natural force fails it simply means that the Divine power is being withdrawn from that particular form of working; but the word of power is the same. If science could prove that any force is waning we should only believe that God is permitting certain created energies to slacken because He means to bring them to their end, having answered His design by them. Men are ever ready to object to the doctrine of the divine working: "All things continue as they were," they say one day; and then another day they say "all things are declining." Neither declaration is precisely true. There are great changes in the operations of God, but there is no change in the hand that operates; and still to-day as of old, God speaketh and it is done; He commandeth, and it stands fast.

Yet it is worthy of notice that the word of God spoken of in the text

OPERATES IN A SILENT MANNER.

We are told that He sendeth out His word and melteth the ice, the frost, the snow. Did you hear that word? You have seen stern winter yield to the breath of spring, and you believe that the genial change was effected by God's word; but did you hear a whisper? No, and none heard it; for the word of God in nature is the going forth of His silent will. "No speech, no language; their voice is not heard; yet their line has gone out through all the earth." Still it is called His word, and I want you to notice that fact, because you are apt to think that God in the kingdom of His grace is dependent upon men's lips and tongues and words. I tell you that the word of God which returneth not to Him void is not the word from my tongue, but the word from His own mind.

Have you not marked in this house—I speak without egotism—how for more than twenty years the people have come together at every service, crowding these aisles, and God has saved multitudes of souls? Critics say, "This man is not an orator;" and they say the truth. I have never cultivated the arts of eloquence, or exhibited the elegancies of language. I speak out what I know of God's word, and bear my honest witness to the Gospel, in such words as come to hand. The almighty word of God reaches and renews the heart, and the more it is allowed to work in an unencumbered manner, in its own natural simplicity, the wore victorious it will be. God will bless His own word; for it is His word which runneth very swiftly.

Yet, note again, according to the text God's word is most effectual. This is the meaning of the phrase, it "runneth very swiftly." None can resist it; for God is in it. It is God's will, and when God wills it, what matters it if all creation wills the contrary? "There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand." The will of God would bear all oppressors away as with a flood, and sweep them like sear leaves before the tempest. There is little wonder that His word runs very swiftly, for if God wills it, how can it be hindered?

It is glorious to think that God is still operating in the realm of grace as well as of nature by a power which is omnipotent, and this power runneth very swiftly. There is no such thing as time with God, to whom one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. He may take centuries to accomplish His purposes, but if He wills it, all can be done in an instant. He may lengthen out the drama of Providence, even to thousands of years; but this is not for want of power, for when He pleases "He will finish the work, and cut it short in righteousness: because a short work will the Lord make upon the earth."

II. Thus I have tried to set forth the general truth, now let us notice the particular instances of it.

First, God's "word runneth very swiftly" in the matter of creation. What saith the first chapter of Genesis about the making or fitting-up of this world? It tells us that in its present condition this world was arranged in six days, and on the seventh day the Lord rested from His work. Was ever such a word as this? Was ever so vast a deed accomplished in such a space of time? It is possible that the creation of the world had taken place long before, for "in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," but even for that first creation He needed no space of time, for His word could create the universe with a flash. The Lord may have allowed ages upon ages to roll by before He ultimately came forth to perform the last upholstering of it for mankind; yet all was done when He spake.

We still see in the works of nature the changes which God works. The wind may blow never so fiercely from the north, but when the Lord commands it whirleth about toward the south; the calm may be profound, but almost in an instant the hurricane sweeps and tosses up the mighty waves of the sea. The vast changes which God works in nature are to us gradual in their results, else we should be unprepared for them, and catastrophe would follow catastrophe; but still, as far as God is concerned, He acts instantaneously when He wills and as He wills, and His will in creation is achieved the moment that it comes to be an expressed word.

Look further into the field of providence, and see how the word of God has been operating there and has run very swiftly. Consider His

PROVIDENTIAL JUDGMENTS.

God warned men that He would destroy them for their sin; He gave them space for repentance, and sent His servant Noah to be a preacher of righteousness. He made the ark to be a visible sermon to them; but when at last His patience was ended it did not take Him long to pull up the sluices from below, and to open the bottles of heaven from above. How speedily did He cover the tops of the mountains with the destroying wave! Peter tells us that by the word of God the world which then was, being overflowed with water, perished.

Look further on to the cities of the plain. When they were ripe for destruction, Lot saw the sun rise on Sodom, and all was quiet and still as on this Sabbath morning; but in an instant the Lord rained fire and brimstone upon Sodom and destroyed it. When the Lord came to blows with Pharaoh, king of Egypt, how thick and fast the strokes came till the proud tyrant's will was broken, and he let the people go. Yes, "His word runneth very swiftly." Whether it be to turn the river into blood, or cover the land with darkness or destroy it with hailstones, or to slay all the firstborn of Egypt, "His word runneth very swiftly." With a word He slew the hosts of Sennacherib and stretched rider and horse in the deep sleep of death. His judgments are wonderful. Look at Jerusalem; inquire for the ruins of her temple; see how swiftly God fulfilled His decree of overthrow. Journey to Tyre, or Moab, or Edom; go away to Babylon, and Nineveh; go and search and see where mighty empires once rioted in luxury. He told His prophets that it would be so, and lo! it has come to pass; for "His word runneth very swiftly."

So also has His word run very swiftly when it has been sent in mercy. When God has meant to bless men, how swiftly His angels have taken wing to bring the boon from heaven. Think of Israel shut up by the Red Sea, with mountains on either hand. Oh how speedily the Lord descended from on high when He came to the rescue of His people. He divided the Red Sea, and led Israel through it like a flock of sheep in the wilderness, swiftly coming by His word to make a way for them through the heart of the sea. So all through Scripture you will observe that in the afflictions of God's people, they have cried to Him, and He has sent His word and healed them. Glory be to the name of our covenant God, in all His work whether of judgment or of mercy, He tarrieth not for man, but executeth His purpose even as He pleases.

For a moment let us reverently think of

to whom I referred just now, whose name is to be ever mentioned with deep devotion. How swift He ran upon His Father's business. As our poet puts it:

"Down from the shining seats above,
With joyful haste He fled."

The life of Jesus upon earth reached little beyond thirty years, and yet His work was finished ere He left this earth for glory. The redemption of mankind, the bringing in of everlasting righteousness, the finishing of transgression, the fulfilling of the law, all was done in a short season. Nay, you must shorten that, because the major part of His life was spent in obscurity, doing doubtless much, but not doing that part of His life-work which is perceptible to us. In some three years and so His Father's public business was all accomplished. With what diligence He wrought!

to the actual atonement, although I conceive it embraced the whole of His life, yet the central part of it lay in His passion and death.

In the comet which has lately surprised us, much of the brilliance lies in its streaming tail, but the starry portion, or nucleus, is supposed to be the solid part of it; even so, the reconciling work of Jesus shines from the manger to the garden, and yet the more apparent parts of it are crowded into the few hours between Gethsemane and the cross. In that space was Satan bruised, death slain, hell vanquished, sin wiped out forever, the saints redeemed, God glorified, and the earth purchased out of bondage. In a few hours of agony and shame and death our Lord effected all.

But now, to leave that point, this is true of the word of God in the matters of grace: "His word runneth very swiftly." I shall be sure to have your deep attention if you know the extreme importance of the truth I am about to proclaim, namely, that the word of God when it comes to work effectually upon the hearts of men, is able to accomplish its end very swiftly indeed. I conceive that conviction of sin is in many cases, if not in all, commenced in an instant. The unregenerated mind of man is like a flint, and you do not break a flint by degrees; by one blow it is shivered. Here is the mind of man like a dark dungeon; God throws back the shutters, and in streams the daylight at once. Conviction is like a wound; the mighty Spirit draws the great bow, away flies the arrow, and in an instant it has pierced the heart; through coats of mail of prejudice, that barbed shaft has gone and slain sin in the heart of man, and that in a second of time. "His word runneth very swiftly."

I know that God worketh thus in

REGENERATION.

Regeneration is not a work of years; from the necessity of the case the essential part of it is wrought in an instant. There must be a moment in which a man is dead, and another moment in which he is made alive. There can be no interval in which he is neither dead nor alive. Quickening must be an instantaneous operation. There must either be some life, however feeble, or else the man is dead, and the line between life and death must be narrow as a razor's edge. Though you and I cannot see any sharp line between the two, yet there is such a line. A man is either dead or alive. The quickening of a soul into spiritual life remains a proof that God's word "runneth very swiftly."

So, also, with regard to justification. When a man believeth in Jesus Christ he is justified at once. I can show you that this must be so. A man may be guilty or not guilty, but he cannot be anywhere between the two. He may, according to the legal language of Scotland, be in a condition in which the charge is "not proven;" but before God, who needs no proof, a man must either stand condemned or pardoned, and there cannot be an instant between the two. In one moment God says to the guilty, "I forgive you." Pardon is an instantaneous gift. You can be forgiven all your sin in half the tick of a clock, and pass from death to life more swiftly than I can utter the words.

How wonderful it is to see the change which the grace of God makes in the human heart in conversion. A man is not turned round and converted all at once; but the commencement of that turn comes at some particular moment, and just at that moment it often happens that his most cherished idols come tumbling down; the idolatry of his soul is effectually rebuked. He cannot understand it, but the things he once loved he begins to hate, while the things he hated on a sudden he loves, and there is achieved in him a marvellous change. An objector declared, the other day, that we make out that a character is produced in men in a few hours; that a life-building is run up during a single service. I am not about to deny the charge. The statement is not quite correct, but it will suffice.

We have all heard of the minister who visited and was the means of bringing her to a joyful faith in Christ, but before he had left the house she was dead; he was wont to say that he found her in a state of nature, saw her in a state of grace, and left her in a state of glory, and all within an hour. So that we do make much of the power of God to accomplish wonders in a brief space. The new birth is a miracle wrought by the Holy Ghost through the word. It is impossible under any other view of things. If this miracle could be taken away from Christianity, what would remain? Conversion and regeneration remain as the standing phenomena by which Christianity is continually proved to be divine.

Adoption is also one of these rapid gifts. A man is made a child of God in an instant; for he may not be a child of God, and he may be a child of God, but he cannot be half-way between; there must be an instant in which adoption is bestowed, and that instant I quote to illustrate the text, "His word runneth very swiftly."

Note again, dear brethren, that this is not only true of salvation at first, but it is true of the work of grace in the heart all along. Do you feel dull and heavy this morning? God can revive you in a moment. It need not take a long time for you to be refreshed and restored; Jesus can come with the riches of His grace, and straightway make you to rejoice in Him. Did not Jesus work immediate cures on the palsied and the lame? Is He not equally mighty to bless? Our churches frequently require backsliders to wait a long time before they can be received; if a brother wanders, the churches generally deliver him for years to Satan, and then, perhaps, try to get him back; but it should not be so. John looked after Peter directly after Peter had been cursing and swearing and denying his Lord; and Jesus Himself said, "Go, tell my disciples and Peter," within three days after Peter had fallen. My Lord's forgiving love runs very swiftly; my Lord's restoring grace is swifter than an eagle's wing.

As it is with individuals so it is with churches. A whole church can be revived on a sudden; nay, not alone a whole church, but a group of churches; nay, not only that; but, if God wills it, all the churches in Christendom may be refreshed with showers of blessing within another week. "His word runneth very swiftly." See how it was at the first. Within a short time after Pentecost all nations had heard the word of God, so that Paul could say, "Have they not heard? Yes verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world." Many move along in Christ's work at a snail's pace; but if the Lord were to visit the aforesaid trudging fathers, and make them leap like a hart, with intense desire and bravery of faith, and then send His own word by them, what is there to hinder

A GREAT REVIVAL?

Suppose all the Church should wake up to-morrow with desires for days of prayer? What is there to prevent God's hearing the united cry of His people? What is there to hinder Him from raising up hundreds of ministers to preach with tongues of fire? What is there to prevent missionaries going forth to the utmost ends of the earth? Let us have greater belief in God. We scarcely believe in Him now; we are always measuring the balance to the credit of the missionary societies, and counting up the agents. I believe in our excellent societies, but I believe in God over the head of them all. I believe in agencies, modes, systems, methods, but I believe much more in God, who can do far more abundantly than we either ask or think.

III. We shall close by noting what is the teaching that you and I may get out of this subject? One lesson is this:

THE SEEKING SINNER CAN BE SAVED NOW.

If he seeks salvation at once he can have it at once. Is there a movement in any mind after God? Dost thou say, "I will arise, and go unto my Father"? Have you got as far as that? How long will it take you to get to your Father? Well, I cannot tell you; it is a long way; but let me whisper in your ear that there is another calculation: How long will it take your Father to come to you? The parable proceeds to say, "When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and ran." Sinner, if you are rising to go to Him, He runs to meet you. "His word runneth very swiftly."

Another lesson, and that has reference to our work for the souls of others: If God's word runs very swiftly, then it can even overtake those who run away from it. Not only can the Lord come quickly to those who seek Him, but He can overtake those who hasten away from Him. I can see the sheep running away. At what a rate they rush! Sheep never run so fast after the shepherd as away from him; they are nimble enough when once they get through a gap. Away they go! Will the shepherd catch them? That blessed Word who is their shepherd, can He overtake the wanderers? Yes, "His word runneth very swiftly."

HE CAN OVERTAKE THE RUNAWAYS.

If a sheep has reached the brink of a precipice the Great Shepherd runs so swiftly that He can save it even now.

I say this to you workers that you may be encouraged to go to sick beds, that you may be encouraged to speak to aged men and women, that you may not think anybody is too far gone for Christ. If it were certain that without conversion a person would be in hell in five minutes it would still be both your duty and your privilege to preach the Gospel to him, and to do it believing that in the space of five minutes the grace of God could save him. "Dangerous doctrine," says an objector, "people will be tempted to put off conversion." Alas, if they did not forge an excuse out of this truth they would manufacture it out of another, for when men mean to do wrong any perversion will serve their turn.

I cannot deny a truth because wicked men pervert it; that would be ridiculous. A rope is a good thing; would you have us destroy all the ropes in the world because a few madmen hang themselves with them? We will proclaim it to the ends of the earth that the Lord can save at the eleventh hour. It is not too late for any of you, however aged you may be. What if you are to die to-morrow? I have an impression that some here are not far from their end; yet "His word runneth very swiftly," and even now He can save you. The dying thief forbids the idea that any praying penitent shall apply to Christ and find it too late. Postpone not salvation; but if you have delayed for years, make haste at once, and may God's infinite mercy come to you at the selfsame hour.

I close with this further remark. If you and I, dear friends, are not numbered among the unconverted, but are really saved this morning, and yet we are very heavy of heart, there is comfort here; the Lord can at once give us joy and peace. "I have a great trouble," say you; "and if I do not get help by Monday night, I do not know what will become of me." Well, God can deliver you by Monday night—"His word runneth very swiftly." "Oh, but I have a dread upon my heart; and if I do not soon get rid of it, I shall be driven to despair." He can console you at once, for the Comforter is already given.

"I should like to come to the communion," says one; "I have not been there for a long time, for I do not feel fit, and I do not think I can be prepared for the solemn service in the short space of one afternoon." Oh, yes, you may; for "His word runneth very swiftly." If Jesus wash your feet you shall be clean every whit, and clean at once. He can bear you up to the heights of fellowship, and bring you into very close converse with Himself in a moment of time. Limit not the Almighty as to speed; limit Him not in any way; with God all things are possible. He can cause your dry rod to bud and blossom, and bear fruit in an hour. Commit yourself to Him, and pray Him to make you perfect in every good work to do His will; working in you that which is well-pleasing in His sight, and He can do it, and to Him shall be the praise for ever and ever. Amen.

WALKING WITH GOD.

By the Rev. Dr. Horatius Bonar.

II. How is it Carried on?—III. How is this Walking Consummated?—What are the Hindrances in the Way of this Walk?—Worldliness and the Spirit of Unbelief which will Culminate in the Future Personal Antichrist—Open Ears and Itching Ears—The Effect of the Walk.

SECONDLY—BUT HOW IS THIS WALK CARRIED ON?

I answer, in the same way in which it began, for the whole life of a believing man is just a repetition of his first belief, a daily, hourly repetition of his reception of the blood of sprinkling. As a sinner he begins each day by taking himself to the blood. As a sinner he goes forth each day, it may be to his business, or it may be his family duties, realizing the blood that keeps him in fellowship with God. As a sinner he lies down at night still realizing the blood through which he first was reconciled; and this process is repeated day by day, and it makes up the life of a believing man.

It is departure from this that leads us asunder from God, and it may be for a time breaks up companionship. When nothing comes between us and the Cross—between us and the blood—when reconciliation, I do not say ceases, but ceases to be realized, and the walk with God becomes as it were blindfold, we hardly know what we do. It becomes a formal thing. It becomes a thing of unreality. Let us then each, if we would maintain the walk, go back to the way in which we got the reconciliation first, and the peace. It is going back to the blood of sprinkling, assured that what the blood did for us when we first approached it, it will do for us to the last.

THIRDLY, HOW IS THIS WALKING CONSUMMATED?

It is consummated in a higher walk, "They shall walk with Me in white, for they are worthy." That is the consummation of the walk. It is not simply a consummation of the glory in the New Jerusalem. It is something apart from this—something which corresponds to our earthly life, and yet upon a far higher level, and in far more blessed circumstances. "They shall walk with Me in white."

We take this promise as written for us in these last days, and we look forward to the consummation of our earthly walk as described to us in these simple but blessed words. The eternal walk, the walk in white, the walk with God, the walk in the Paradise of God under the shadow of the tree of life, the walk in the New Jerusalem, the eternal walk in light and in white. Oh, Christian brethren! if such be the blessedness of the glory of the walk, the consummation of our earthly walk, what must be the end of all those of whom it is said, "They walk on in darkness."

When I think of the walk, the eternal walk in the eternal light, I know not anything, more blessed. When I think, on the other hand, of the eternal walk in the eternal darkness, I know nothing more terrible. Give glory to the Lord your God before He causes darkness, and before your feet stumble in the dark, lest while ye look for light He cause darkness, the blackness of darkness forever. What a contrast! the eternal walk in light—the eternal walk in darkness.

Walking then thus begun is thus carried on, and the figure while denoting companionship is meant to refer to every part of our daily life. Companionship, you know, is not discipleship, it is something different. Companionship is not service, it is something else; and the words which we read do not speak of service and do not speak of discipleship—they speak of companionship, and it is this companionship with God that makes up the whole of our daily walk in everything great or small.

But then we come, dear brethren, to another, a very momentous point.

WHAT ARE THE HINDRANCES IN THE WAY of this walk? They are many. We may say there is hindrance in every step we take—a hindrance within and a hindrance without—a hindrance from the evil heart of unbelief within, and a hindrance from the evil world without us which lieth in wickedness—a hindrance from the God of this world, the spirit which now worketh in the children of disobedience—a hindrance in principalities and powers against which we are called upon to contend. There are daily and hourly hindrances, and you ask me which are these?

I answer: They are such as the following. Of course they are more developed in the present age than they have been for many an age: it may be in all the preceding ages; because the God of this world has put upon the worl its best array, and he is distinguishing things in a way which hitherto the Church has hardly recognized or understood.

There is worldliness, not gross worldliness, but refined worldliness, the refined worldliness of those who are "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." The refined worldliness of those who put away all that is coarse in all their vanities, and yet retain the pleasure of refined worldliness; the worldliness embodied in busi- ness—the worldliness that is exhibited in our daily intercourse with our fellow men; the worldliness that flows in upon us daily, each morning, through the daily newspapers. Have you not felt this, brethren? that it is a general thing that as soon as we open our windows in the morning the air of a world that lieth in wickedness flows in upon us with the daily newspaper? I do not mean to refer to ungodly newspapers, I simply refer to the worldliness they contain. They contain everything that is doing, good or bad; all the doings of yesterday; they bring it in before us in the morning, ere we have had time for fellowship with God, and the air of the world breathes in upon us to stifle us. Beware of the morning daily paper.

But apart from this worldliness there is the spirit of unbelief that undermines all truth; that tells us that truth and error are very much alike. Unbelief that undermines the Bible; unbelief that would hew down the cross, that would wash out, as it were, the stains of the blood from Calvary in order that things may be, in its estimation, more beautiful.

Brethren, what a hindrance there is in

THE UNBELIEF OF THE AGE.

Men tell you that it is in the air, and you cannot help it. Well, it is in the air, because the ruler of darkness is the "prince of the power of the air," and he never spake a truer word, and it comes down through the air to us here from "the prince of the power of the air." It is poisoning everything.

All the evil influences of the present day do not come from the world that lieth in wickedness, they come from the professing church itself; and in many quarters, both in England and Scotland, we find that it is not the world that is poisoning the Church, but it is the Church that is poisoning the world. The spirit of unbelief, the spirit of the last days, the spirit that would equalize everything, the spirit of liberalism that tells us that error and truth are very much alike, that puts light for darkness, and darkness for light; good for evil, and evil for good; the spirit that is to culminate in Antichrist—for all this unbelief of which I speak, all this liberalism that I refer to is to have a head, and that head is Antichrist; and these strange opinions now going abroad are all preparing the way for Antichrist and his full development. They undermine our faith and Christian spirit. Let us stand aloof from them. Let us beware of the unbelief of the present day; we shall find it a far more serious evil than perhaps we imagine. Beware of books that inculcate unbelief, or anything like it. Beware of books that will undermine the cross even when pretending to beautify it. Beware of books that would undervalue the atonement. Beware of books that would cast uncertainty upon the Bible. All these things come as hindrances between us and walking with God.

It is not possible having these things continually surrounding us, to maintain without a struggle the walk to which we are called.

And then there is in connection with all this, the strange feeling among Christian men of love of any new doctrine—in the "itching ears," as the Apostle calls them. It is one thing to have open ears, and it is another thing to have itching ears. They are widely different; and the exhibition we see in the present day of "itching ears" in the Church of God, and men ready to receive every new form of doctrine—"carried about by every wind of doctrine"—how is it possible that any man can walk with God who is carried about with every wind of doctrine, and listens to what is said in this magazine or the other magazine, and this paper or the other paper, this book or the other book? How is it possible that a man can thus walk with God who does not test everything by the Word and the Word alone. A man who will not allow himself to be swayed by human opinion and argument, but who betakes himself continually to verify everything, to test everything by the law and the testimony.

These are specimens of what I mean by the hindrances to walking with God—hindrances occurring daily, hindrances which the Church of God will feel yet more terribly ere long.

It is to this, dear Christian brethren, that we are called—to walk with God, not by fits and starts, but evenly. And, oh! when walking with God what calmness becomes ours; as if a heavenly atmosphere had descended upon us. What peace is ours, expelling all the tumults and tempests of the heart. And what protection is ours? We feel ourselves safe beneath the shadow of His wing. No evil can touch the man who is walking with God. We feel secure against the manifold errors of the day, for how can error find its way into the soul that is leaning upon His arm? You see in what manifold ways this companionship operates. How it moulds us in every part, in mind or in body, soul or spirit—moulds us every hour.

The effect produced on us daily as we walk with a heavenly companion is irresistible. It moulds us. A man is known by his friends; the influence of a man's friends tells upon him; and here we have the influence of the heavenly friendship moulding us day by day; and the more you cultivate that friendship and enter into that companionship, the more will you find that the Heavenly Spirit, the Heavenly Friend, descends upon you, that you will grow more and more each day.

"Oh for a closer walk with God,
A calm and heavenly frame.
A light to shine upon the road
That leads me to the Lamb."

I end just where I began, with the companionship. Oh, brethren in Christ! beware of anything that would interrupt this companionship. Depend upon it, any break in the matter does not come from Him; it must come from us. Oh, see that from the first to the last, from day to day, whatever you lose, you lose not this, whatever company you break, break not with this. Preserve this Divine companionship all the days of your pilgrimage here, and it shall be perpetuated in Paradise above; in the walk with Him in white, which we shall enter on when He comes in His glory; and you know that "He that shall come, will come, and will not tarry."

AT one of the after-meetings held on Sunday evenings, several of the lads stayed behind for conversation and prayer. In speaking to one youth I was much pleased to find that he was anxious to follow Jesus. He said, "I want to be good, and I have been a-tryin' all last week to be good." Another lad of sixteen was on his knees weeping. And another, who has for some time shown anxiety about his soul, was also on his knees, praying, and crying almost hysterically. Indeed, we have cause to be very thankful that, dealing with lads of this class, we have found many proofs of good impressions having been made upon them, and of a desire on their part to become more like the pattern we lay before them—the Lord Jesus Christ, who excludes none, however low and sinful, from His loving call to Himself.

It is strange, however, that the good impressions produced are frequently brushed off, as the morning dew from the grass, by rough contact with the recklessly immoral characters, and the unwholesome surroundings, of the common lodging-house.

One of our lads sleeps nightly in a stable, and would not go to a lodging-house if I offered him more than the fourpence he would have to pay. "Them places," he says, "ain't fit for dogs." A lad of sixteen, who was found in front of a shop crying only a few days ago, was brought to me. He had walked to London from Lincoln in search of work. He was soon afterward taken to Field-lane Refuge, but before going there he went for a night to a lodging-house. As he looked tired the following day, I inquired if he felt ill, and he replied, "I do feel queer, mum; I did not sleep all night. I had to get out o' bed long before day light; the bed was all alive, and the smell was awful! I don't think the clothes had been washed for months; it was worse than a pigsty." When boys have been frequenters of these lodging-houses it is astonishing how soon they show that pale, waxy, unhealthy skin, which is characteristic of all who go there regularly.

And the physical unhealthiness is not the worst danger of these places. At one of the soup distributions I have mentioned already, there happened to be present about half-a-dozen doubtful-looking men and grown lads. One of our lads told us he knew them, from having met them at the lodging-house, and added, they were thieves. "How do you know that?" said I. "Know, mum! why, them two wot sat over there," pointing to the seats, "they be the ringleaders on 'em, and they tried to get me to join 'em," and he went on describing the different ways in which they stole, until I said, "But how do you know so much about their tricks?" "Why," said he rather quietly, "I ought to know; I used to do the same afore I came to these meetings, but I don't do it now." And I believe this of him too.

I cannot say the same, unfortunately, of another poor boy (G—). He used to come to the classes when they began, but had got into the habit of thieving, stole money from a woman who employed him in the neighborhood, and kept away in consequence for several months, during which time I lost sight of him. He is now one of a regular gang of thieves. When I last saw him, I was much affected by the change in his appearance: he seemed hopelessly hardened and careless, as if nothing could have any effect upon him. I asked him if he had seen his mother lately. "No, ma'am, I ain't seen her for a long while." This lad was driven from home by a drunken father, and this is the result so far. Evil has brought forth evil in his case; and I know that in many cases the patience of those who may endeavor to help such lads will be severely tried.

One lad will come into the room looking pale and cold, but with eyes showing that he has been crying bitterly, very likely from the effects of a hardened father's thumps and blows—another looking tired out and woe-begone, and with an expression as if all he wanted were to be let alone—another may have a very bad cough, suggestive of consumption, but, notwithstanding, he will probably have only the stable to sleep in or the streets to walk—another with a sore throat—another hurt by a kick from a horse; but all pains and illnesses have to be simply endured and got through as they can, amid the stench of a lodging-house, or huddled shivering in some corner of a stable or van. No kind loving word do they get, even when sick and ill, the "Move on!" of the policeman all the same—no sympathizing look; no comfort. And yet for them, as for us, Christ died! Shall we, who know His love, not strive in every way to bring them to find in Him that rest and peace they so sorely need?

Oberlin and the Wagoner.—Oberlin, the well-known philanthropist of Steinthal, while yet a candidate for the ministry, was travelling on one occasion from Strasbourg. It was in the winter time. The ground was deeply covered with snow, and the roads were almost impassable. He had reached the middle of his journey and was among the mountains, and by that time was so exhausted that he could stand up no longer. He was rapidly freezing to death. Sleep began to overcome him; all power to resist it left him. He commended himself to God, and yielded to what he felt to be the sleep of death. He knew not how long he slept, but suddenly became conscious of some one rousing him and waking him up. Before him stood a wagon driver in his blue blouse, and the wagon not far away. He gave him a cordial and some food, and the spirit of life returned. He then helped him on the wagon, and brought him to the next village. The rescued man was profuse in his thanks, and offered money, which his benefactor refused. "It is only a duty to help one another," said the wagoner. "And it is the next thing to an insult to offer a reward for such a service." "Then," replied Oberlin, "at least tell me your name, that I may have you in thankful remembrance before God." "I see," said the wagoner, "that you are a minister of the Gospel. Please tell me the name of the Good Samaritan." "That," said Oberlin, "I cannot do, for it was not put on record." "Then," replied the wagoner, "permit me to withhold mine."

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

Hutton's Offer—Etta's Prayer Answered—The Offer Accepted—Telling Mrs. Hutton—An Appropriate Chapter—The Coffee House Approved of.

Now, to go back a few weeks in our chronology. The sun had set over the picturesque and undulating grounds of the Hall one evening when, as Etta was watering some of her favorite flowers, she was summoned to the house, with the information that "Hutton, the Rectory gardener, wished to speak to her." When Etta came into the Blue Room, as the general receptacle for hats, sticks, watering-pots, and waiting persons was called, she saw her friend, hat in hand, rubbing the top of his head all over with one of the voluminous handkerchiefs whose acquaintance we have already made.

"Good evening!" said both; while Etta added, "Would you like to come into the garden, or will you stay and talk to me here?"

'Well, it's something very particular!" Hutton solemnly replied, shutting the door; "so I thought I would just come and have it off my mind. Fact is, I've thought a deal about this 'ere place you've put up," and so saying he twirled his hat on his extended hand like a teetotum. Fully absorbed he was in his subject as he continued, "Well, the fact is, to have it out an' over, I should like to be your man! I suppose you will have a man for it, Miss!" and he stopped short, regarding attentively his listener's countenance.

"What, Hutton! You wish to be the coffee-room manager! Never, Hutton! What would the Rector say, and your wife, and Miss Aleth, and everybody? You cannot mean it! You never could leave the Rectory."

"I'm not so sure of that!" said Hutton, addressing himself to the last part of her sentence first. "I've had a goodish time of it, and not altogether so pleasant neither. Not but what the Rector is a good master, pays regularly, and all that; but I was reading about a better garden the other day—the Lord's garden, I mean. Well! and I think I should like to help get ready a bit of it for Him. He's done a good lot for me, and I'd like to serve Him, and Him only, for the rest of my days. There's plenty of weeds and stones to be pulled up, I should think; and I'd like to work at it, I would; and I'd do it with a good will."

"There is nothing I should like better," said Etta. "Nothing! I have been asking the Lord to provide me a man who would undertake the work, not that he may get a living, but for the sake of the great cause in which we are all so much interested. If the idea has been laid upon your heart, the only thing we can do is to commit it once more to Him."

After a moment's hesitation, she proceeded, "What wages would you ask? You know my funds are not very large at present."

"Meat and drink, miss! Meat and drink! that's all. It isn't for the money I am coming, miss!"

"No! I know that quite well!" Etta answered. "I know it is not for the money. But still I should like to have an idea. You have been earning a good deal at the Rectory, I suppose?"

"Oh, well! pretty well for that! But I'll take whatever you'd like to give, miss! There! will that do?"

"Really, Hutton, I must think it over," was Etta's prudent reply. "Come and see me again to-morrow."

Hutton departed to the quiet of his garden, and Etta to her room.

When the stipulated twenty-four hours had elapsed, and Hutton returned, true to his promise, he found Etta's mind made up. She had determined to accept his proffered services, and together they pledged themselves to work heart and soul for the new coffee-house.

Then poor Hutton returned to his pretty home with the first faint sinking of heart he had yet experienced. Hutton was never a coward except when he faced his wife, and that with a proposition she might not approve; and as she always disapproved of all propositions, it was not to be wondered at that he slightly quaked at the momentous fact that must now be stated to that important personage sooner or later.

As he went in his wife was frizzling some cakes on the hob.

"Lawks a-mercy!" she said. "My dear, how you did startle me, to be sure! I all but sent over the whole lot of 'em flop into the red. Can't you come in quieter?"

Not a favorable opening this! What was poor Hutton to do? He thought he'd wait a bit.

At last, when the non-inebriating cup had been well sipped, and their accustomed attitudes for the remainder of the evening had been assumed, he blurted out the terrible fact in something this fashion.

"You know, wife, it's got to be done; so I may as well tell you."

"Oh, dear!" she said, and put her hand on her heart; "what do ye mean?"

"Mean! Why, I mean the flowers has to be transplanted, and so has we!"

"Oh, my dear! can't you talk sensible? You've got all hipped lately! Do you mean you're goin' to die? For if that's what you do mean, I can tell you it's downright a mistake—so there. 'Twas only a week, come Monday, old Mrs. Jenks come in, and she says, says she, 'I've seen your man,' she says; 'he do look bloomin'. Minded me, he did, of my poor Pete. Poor old feller! he looked jest like that seven year afore he were took off!' So, you see, you've got seven year, and I shouldn't wonder if it were ever so much more!"

How much longer his better half would have continued in this strain, Hutton did not know. But one thing he did know, namely, that when once her tongue was set wagging, it would not very easily stop of itself. So he took the initiative.

"You know Miss Fennecker's new Coffee-house?" he remarked. "Well! it's there. I am going to be her manager!"

"Thomas!" screamed Mrs. Hutton, and dropped against the back of her chair as though she had been dealt a sudden blow.

Her "better half" waited patiently for a moment, and then he said:

"Betsey! who earns the bread?"

"We shall soon have none of it," was the reply, from amid the outspread fingers that now enshrined Mrs. Hutton's countenance.

"Betsey, listen to reason!" exhorted Mr. Hutton.

"I never has none to listen to," retorted the wife.

"Betsey, you know I always tries to do for the best!"

"The worst, you mean!"

Then the colloquy ended for a short time, while Hutton gazed into the red embers with a far-away look on his face, and Betsey began to relieve herself by little short sobs without tears.

The gardener was not a man to be argued with, and Betsey knew that right well. As she gradually rallied from the paralyzing effects of the first announcement, she began to rain shot and shell.

"Thomas!" she said, "and are you going to leave a good situation, all for nothing at all? And—"

"It ain't nothing at all," he unwisely interrupted; for she instantly resumed,

"That's what I say; it ain't nothing at all this 'ere dewizes" (she meant "device") "of Miss Fennecker's. And it never can't come to anything," she pursued vehemently. "That's impossible. Coffee-shop, indeed! Mr. Hutton, I'd like to see you make coffee! Why, you can't make your own tea!" And she laughed hysterically. Wiping her eyes, Mrs. Hutton continued, "That is a joke! And then, selling of it too! However can you do that, when you can't make a bargain about your own onions, I'd like to know?"

"You always take a thing up by the wrong end, Betsey!" said Hutton, patiently. "You'll think better of it in the morning. See if you don't!"

Mrs. Hutton muttered something that could not be heard, and fidgetted about the room.

"The Bible! wife!" said Hutton.

And she put it obediently before him. Then, with a deep sigh, she sat down.

He opened it and read the 116th Psalm. When he had finished reading he said:

"The Lord has done much for you and me, Betsey. He has 'redeemed our souls from death.' I would like to live to Him more than I have ever done before. Won't you help me to do it, Betsey?" Thus Hutton commented on the passage he had read, and then, receiving no reply, he read over again:

"I will pay my vows now in the presence of all Thy people! Wife! I would like to show all the people in Shenstone what a Master I serve. I want 'em to come to Him. I want 'em all to know Him too. It seems to me as if I couldn't do enough for Him, dear wife. Betsey, what do ye think?"

There was still no answer.

"To tell the truth, wife," he continued; "I've got rare and tired of they flowers lately."

Here she started from her reverie, and stared at him. Now! she thought, her husband was certainly going demented. "Tired of they flowers!" They had been his idol, his delight, his never-ceasing pleasure. His life had been spent in watching over them. In his different situations, for he had only been ten years out of his life's forty at the rectory, his labor and pleasure had been the garden.

"And I have been asking the Lord to let me have a bit of His garden to work in. For a long time I have asked it. Those dear little flowers, wife, they live and they die; and I have loved to watch over 'em; but think, wife, think! Souls, precious souls, are living, dying, all around us—right down these streets, and in the little cottages by the roadsides—everywhere they are. And they haven't many people to care for 'em wife. That they haven't. But I care; that I do! and I'd like to watch over 'em, that I would."

"But suppose you don't do any good?" was Betsey's sudden remark.

"There's no supposing that. It's the work I want. I want to work for 'em. I want to help in His great work of saving souls. That's what I want. And as to succeedin'; why! the Lord promises to bless me. And what more do I want? Besides, His work can't fail, can it? and that's the work I'm going to do."

"Thomas, have you told the Rector about all this?" inquired Mrs. Hutton.

"I have," was the answer.

"And what did he say?" she asked.

"Say! Well, he said, 'Hutton, I don't wonder. That place will just suit you.' And then he thought a bit, and he said, 'Won't your young lady be pleased? Miss Aleth, I mean. She will be delighted. You had better go and tell her.' He spoke a kind word or two more than that, and said he'd call and see you to-morrow."

Here poor Betsey burst out crying. Her pent-up feelings found their safest vent; and when at last she sobbed out, "And what's to become of me?" the worst of her sorrow was over; and her husband knew this; for as he tenderly put his hand upon her shoulder, he said:

"Cheer up, Betsey, and look at the light through the clouds! You will have a cosy little home close by, and I know you will be very happy. I will come home every afternoon for a bit, and for meal-times too; and you'll often come in and see me. You will have no work to do, for I don't hold that the coffee-house trade is a work for women. But if you pray for a share in the service of the King, He will give you something to do in helping on His great kingdom. And you will be my 'help-meet,' won't ye now?"

We need not certify precisely how the conversation ended! But suffice it to say that soon both were kneeling beside the old chair, that had rested weary limbs so often; and the new work was being committed to His loving care.

Thus, on the day of the horse market, Hutton was ruling supreme within the wooden coffee-house. As a manager, he answered admirably. The former inclinations to a dark view of things with which he had occasionally been infected by poor Betsey, had, under these new auspices, been wonderfully metamorphosed into a grave and unfitful species of geniality, which soothed and welcomed and at the same time controlled the variety of elements that composed his throng of customers.

curious moving scene it was, strangely panoic, and for that reason bearing with it its own rests. While order was preserved, and to some ree an atmosphere of quiet fostered, there was e sufficient freedom allowed; so that the men l not but feel perfectly at home. At the same they were protected from anything like angry ds, fighting, swearing, or drunkenness. This ection they most fully appreciated, as you may e by the sentences Hutton and his helper, Bill es, have just overheard from the farmer at the ner table, as his coffee was handed to him. ng vis à vis with another farmer, the following ɔquy took place:

Good place this!"

Ain't no noise, at any rate!" is the rejoinder. That chap 'pears to know his business, he do." Them walls is uncommon pretty. I shall g my missus down to have a look in some day," farmer No. 2.

Ain't no drunken rows nor nothing, and as good a as anything you would wish!"

was not long before the dainty prettiness of whole interior, and the substantial reality of its forts ranged about the bar, combined with the ɔted attentions of Etta, Mr. and Mrs. Clemence, one or two other friends to the cause, with ton's devoted service, began to secure real ularity to the new building.

THE PASSOVER.

Lesson for Aug. 7. Exod. 12: 1-14. Golden Text 1 Cor. 5: 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HE time of deliverance for the children of el was at hand. One plague more terrible l all which had gone before was yet in reserve the former oppressors of God's people; death to enter into every house, and lay low the heir very family. God had sent unto Pharaoh and " Israel is My son, even My firstborn: and I unto thee, Let My son go, that he may serve Me: if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay son, even thy firstborn" (Ex. 4: 22, 23). Pha- had refused, and Pharaoh's firstborn, Egypt's born, must be the victim of his folly. He had sured his puny strength with the Almighty, he must learn that He whose sword is death o foe to be trifled with. God had declared, in tion to this last plague, "But against any of children of Israel shall not a dog move his gue, against man or beast: that ye may know that the Lord doth put a difference between Egyptians and Israel" (Ex. 11: 7). What was difference? What is now the difference be- en God's people and the world? Redemption red and accepted.

he key to our subject is contained in our den Text, "Christ our Passover is sacrificed us." Sin has been to all of us a hard and bit- bondage. We have been slaves to impatience, ontent, unkind words and feelings, jealousy, ruth, meanness, perhaps secret impurity or dis- esty, and we have loathed ourselves at one ment, perhaps justified ourselves at another; anyway our lives have been "made bitter with d bondage," and often we have thought that the t lay with our circumstances, our surroundings, vith our natural character, or sometimes with unjust partiality of God who had placed others we thought in more favorable circumstances u ourselves. And God has waited until He ld detect in the midst of our sighing and aning, one real look upward, one answer to striving of His Spirit with us.

ut Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us. Lord said unto Moses and Aaron, "This nth shall be unto you the beginning of months: hall be the first month of the year to you." sacrifice of Christ is the beginning of all gs to the redeemed sinner. "Other founda- can no man lay than that is laid, which is us Christ" (1 Cor. 3: 11). "In the tenth day his month, they shall take to them every man a b." "They shall take," appropriate for nselves, so as to say, "This is my lamb, the rifice for me." Have we personally thus ap- priated "the Lamb of God who taketh away sin of the world"? Every father of a family was to take the lamb "according to the house of their fathers, a lamb for an house," not a lamb for an individual. O father, God's provision is for thee and thine house (Gen. 7: 1; Acts 16: 31). How far does thy faith reach? For whom dost thou count upon Him who was sacrificed for us? for thyself only? or for wife and children and servants? "If the household be too little for the lamb, let him and his neighbor next unto his house take it according to the number of the souls: every man according to his eating shall make your count for the lamb." It is a blessed sign when the house is too little for the lamb, when we go out and invite others to the Lord's Passover to make a claim upon His salvation and His strength.

The lamb must be "without blemish." God can accept no imperfect offering for sin, for He says, "that is an abomination unto the Lord thy God" (Deut. 17: 1). "And if ye offer the blind for sacrifice, is it not evil? and if ye offer the lame and the sick, is it not evil? Offer it now unto thy governor; will he be pleased with thee or accept thy person? saith the Lord of hosts" (Mal. 1: 8). Christ alone was without blemish and without spot. He "did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth" (1 Pet. 2: 22). The whole assembly of the children of Israel were to kill the lamb in the evening. Standing as their representative, to suffer in their stead, their hands must take its life, as the hands of guilty men have been imbrued in the blood of Jesus which was shed for them.

But that blood is the pledge of security; it speaks of ransom paid, of justice satisfied. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," is God's righteous judgment, but the sinless One adopted as His own humanity with all its sin and corruption, and He became upon the cross one Person in whom all other persons should be seen and dealt with. Thus the death which "came upon all men, for that all have sinned" (Rom. 5: 12), fell upon "the Man," and His blood poured out is the token that the law of sin and death has been fulfilled. The blood of the Passover lamb was to be sprinkled on the two side posts and on the upper doorpost of the houses, so that when the destroying angel came he should find the token that life had already been poured out.

Child of God, do you so fully believe in your oneness with Christ that you see it is impossible for God to condemn you, because the condemnation has already fallen upon Him, and do you see that this position of oneness with Christ involves necessarily the entire renunciation of your own life apart from Him. "None of you shall go out at the door of his house until the morning," under cover of the blood, the witness of life poured out, you are hidden undiscovered, under shelter; there remain abiding in Christ. A thought which is not sheltered by the blood is an open door to condemnation for the past and fresh falling into sin for the present. Away from our hopes, plans, regrets, experiences, and efforts, hidden from ourselves and from others in Christ, there alone we are safe. "And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where ye are: and when I see the blood, I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt."

Security is however not all which Christ provides by the work of His redemption. The flesh of the lamb was to be eaten in the same night, "roast with fire" (literally crucified). Just as food renews the continual waste of our bodies, so Christ is our Life, taking the place of our old condemned life, pouring in His new life as we renounce the old. His death provides our standing, His life is our power. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink His blood, ye have no life in you" (John 6: 53). Eating presupposes hunger, a sense of need, emptiness, and weakness. The children of Israel were called upon to leave their slavery and enter upon a journey unknown to them, untried and without provisions for the way. They were to leave behind all past experiences, and in view of such an undertaking they needed strength. This God gave through the Passover Lamb. And we are called to leave all slavery behind, and to take our journey toward and into the land of promise. Experiences of failure in the past are not to hinder us now, remembrances of hard bondage are to lose their hold upon us. The watchword is Forward, and in the strength of the Passover Lamb we must and we can go on. Although every step of the way is unknown to us, we have a leader with us who knows it thoroughly, and who demands only complete confidence on our part.

But they who eat of the Passover lamb must eat with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. Leaven is the element of corruption, and nothing which is corrupt must mingle with "the bread of life." Jesus warned His disciples of "the leaven of the Pharisees which is hypocrisy," and the leaven of Herod (Luke 12: 1; Mark 8: 15). And Paul thus exhorts us: "Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us. Therefore let us keep the feast, not with the old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth (1 Cor. 5: 6-8). "The old leaven," surely this is the old man, the "I," which, thank God, is crucified with Christ, and whose very existence we are privileged to deny (Rom. 6: 11). The unleavened bread is sincerity and truth, the true heart, full assurance of faith, hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and bodies washed with pure water with which we may draw nigh unto God (Heb. 10: 22).

One thing more we must notice, the attitude of the redeemed Israelites: "And thus shall ye eat it; with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and ye shall eat it in haste: it is the Lord's passover." "Let your loins be girded about and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord" (Luke 12: 35, 36). Ready to follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth, ready for service or for suffering, for joy or for sorrow. All which was without the houses of the children of Israel must be left behind, no trifle must occupy them, they must live now in the future which was opening to them. A true soldier, a true servant, a true scholar, and still more a true bride is never preoccupied. Great things lay before them and little things must be sacrificed. The old associations must be renounced, nothing could make Egypt to be other than Egypt, and they must be ready to turn their backs upon it for ever. They were redeemed, and they must walk in the power of their redemption.

The moment came, of death to the firstborn of Egypt, of freedom to the Lord's firstborn. It was midnight, the cry of death arose and ran from house to house and from city to city; but with it came a pressure from the Egyptians to drive out the people of God, and they lent them jewels of silver and gold and raiment and they spoiled the Egyptians. He brought them forth also with silver and gold; and there was not one feeble person among their tribes. Egypt was glad when they departed; for the fear of them fell upon them.

The Sandwich Islander and the Lawyer.—While Hopu, a young Sandwich Islander, was in England, he spent an evening in a company where an infidel lawyer tried to puzzle him with difficult questions. At length the native said: "I am a poor heathen boy. It is not strange that my blunders in English should amuse you. But soon there will be a larger meeting than this. We shall all be there. They will ask us all one question, namely, 'Do you love the Lord Jesus Christ?' Now, sir, I think I can say, Yes. What will you say, sir?" When he had stopped, all present were silent. At length one of the company said that, as the evening was far gone, they had better conclude it with prayer, and proposed that the native should pray. He did so; and as he poured out his heart to God, the lawyer could not conceal his feelings. Tears started from his eyes, and he sobbed aloud. All present wept too; and, when they separated, the words, "What will you say, sir?" followed the lawyer home, and did not leave him till they brought him to Christ.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Irish Land Bill Passed through its Final stage in the British House of Commons on July 22d, and has been sent to the House of Lords. It has been materially altered since it was introduced by the government. A leading journal criticizing its present condition says: "During its progress through committee the bill was amended in important particulars, to suit the demands of Irish members, and if it is passed in anything like its present shape by the Lords, it will confer enormous benefits on the agricultural classes in Ireland. Though not so revolutionary as was demanded by extreme Land Leaguers, it is as radical a measure as would have any chance of serious consideration by the peers. Even extreme members of the Irish party privately admit that it is a great measure of reform, pregnant with happiness and prosperity for the distressful isle. A provision has been made in the amended bill to protect tenants who are victims of three bad harvests from eviction on account of arrears. Important provisions, intended to improve the condition of agricultural laborers, have been inserted, which must greatly benefit the most miserable part of the population by giving them proper dwellings and garden plots at reasonable rents."

The Success of the Land Bill in Alleviating Irish distress will, if it passes the House of Lords depend mainly on the capacity and impartiality of the commissioners who form the Board of Arbitration. Those named by the government are Mr. O'Hagan, who has held a leading position at the Irish bar for some years, and is a stanch Liberal. Mr. Litton, who is also a distinguished member of the Irish bar and a Liberal in politics. He has rendered great assistance to the government in the discussion on the Land Bill, and he and Mr. O'Hagan may be looked upon as champions of the tenant. The third is Mr. Vernon, who is popularly supposed to represent the landlords. The Home Rulers received Mr. Vernon's name with groans, and Mr. O'Donnell gave notice that unless he was left off the commission the Irish party would obstruct the appointment of all three members at every opportunity. The insertion of Mr. Vernon's name on the commission is regarded as an attempt to enlist the confidence of the landlords in the House of Lords. Their salaries will be $15,000 each per annum.

The Application for the Removal of William Penn's remains from England to Philadelphia has been courteously but firmly declined. The trustees of the Jordans, the burial ground where the corpse was interred, have sent to the American emissaries a letter in which they say: "The trustees, after careful consideration in a cosmopolitan spirit, deem it their duty to refuse the application. The retired spot where Penn's remains rest was selected by himself in the vigor of his life, and a removal would be repugnant to the known character of his sentiments. The trustees have received communications from influential friends and from most of the lineal descendants of Penn on both sides of the Atlantic, desiring that the proposal of the Pennsylvania Legislature may not be acceded to."

Russian Nihilism still Pursues its Machinations, so also do repressive measures. The St. Petersburg Press, including even the most moderate journals, are muzzled to the fullest extent, criticism on General Ignatieff's policy being in particular prohibited. The Czar continues to lead a most carefully-secluded life. His apartments are guarded night and day, he scarcely ever leaves them, and only one person at a time is permitted to enter them. Two of the ablest secret police agents have disappeared recently, one being found murdered in the park, while eight police officers are also missing.

Dr. Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, Dean of Westminster, England, died July 18th. He was attacked on the previous Friday by erysiplas in the head, and the danger to his life was at once apprehended, and Sir William Jenner, the Queen's own physician, was summoned. He suffered severely until Monday night, when he died. Dean Stanley was probably better known in this country than any other English clergyman. He visited the United States in 1878 and was an honored guest of some of our most prominent men. He was also entertained by several clubs during his stay, not only Episcopalians, but Methodists and Baptists gave the Dean a cordial welcome. In public in England he gave many interesting reminiscences of his trip, and announced his hope of once more paying a visit to the country where he had received so many kindnesses. His last work on Christian Institutions has been widely circulated here.

Dean Stanley was the son of a clergyman who became Bishop of Norwich. He was born in 1815, and educated at Rugby under the famous Dr. Arnold. He studied at Oxford University, where he afterward became a regius professor and canon of Christ Church. He was appointed Dean of Westminster in 1864. He was an intimate friend of Queen Victoria and the late Prince Consort. His portrait and a sketch of his life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 12th, 1880.

A Strange Story Comes from Russia. It is stated on apparently good authority that a young student has committed suicide under extraordinary circumstances. This suicide awakened the suspicions of M. Baranoff, the chief of police. He found the man apparently dead, but, in fact, still breathing and in a swoon. M. Baranoff, by the aid of doctors, applied restoratives to the dying man and obtained a confession from him. The student declared that he had formed part of a secret society of twenty Nihilists who had all sworn to kill the Emperor. They had drawn lots and it had fallen to his lot to carry out the plan of assassination on the 13th of July. Nineteen daggers were suspended over his head and his brother nihilists swore to kill him if he showed the slightest hesitation, but notwithstanding this threat his heart failed him, and he resolved to die by his own hand. Before breathing his last he revealed the names of his nineteen brother nihilists, who have been all secured by the police. It is believed that many young men have hastily joined the nihilists under a mistaken idea of the society, who would be glad to leave the order if they could do so safely.

A Council of Socialists from all Countries is being held in London. A report of the first meeting of the council says: "Delegates from various parts of Europe and America were present. About seven hundred attended, mostly workmen. Red flags were displayed. Mrs. Lecompte, an American lady delegate, described the disappointments of small farmers going west, depending upon the illusory promises of an emigration agent, and how the great capitalists in possession of the railways oppress the laborers and raise the price of food in the seaboard States. Louise Michel, the amnestied French communist, then spoke, and male delegates from America, Switzerland, Italy and Germany followed. Prince Krapotkine, the Russian socialist, applauded the assassination of several Russian generals." It is stated that it was originally intended to hold the meeting at Zurich in Switzerland, but the authorities interfered and forbade the council assembling there.

A Hot Wave Accompanied by Drought is Inflicting much suffering on Paris and London. In Paris a panic has been caused by the official announcement that, in consequence of the phenomenally hot weather prevailing there, the water supply is running short. At the best of times it is utterly inadequate to the wants of the population, and a drought at this moment would be quickly followed by a rapid rise in the city death rate. In London the weather continues dry and hot. Pall Mall and Regent Street are choked with dust. The water carts have altogether disappeared. The excuse is the scarcity of water. The Post advises pumping water out of the Thames. Several private citizens and representatives of business firms have complained at a police court against the water companies for shortening or cutting off the supply.

The Seizure of Tunis by the French has already become a fertile source of complications in North Africa and elsewhere. The Arab tribes on the frontier are in a state of great commotion, and have found an able and ubiquitous leader in Bou Amena, who has ravaged Oran, eludes the French troops sent against him, and retreats into the burning desert, whither, at this season, they not follow him. Some of the independent trit Morocco have sided with him, and many hun of Spanish settlers have been killed, which created a marked revulsion of feeling ag France in the Peninsula. A still more trouble incident is the rising of fanatical natives ar Sfax, a small but flourishing seaport of Tuni the borders of Tripoli, where there is a consi ble colony of enterprising Europeans. The l with difficulty escaped in boats to the ship many being wounded. The Arabs sacked French consulate, wounded some naval offi occupied the town, and refuse to allow the I troops to land. A French squadron bomba the town, attacked it in front, and occupied spite of vigorous resistance. Sfax was stro fortified by the Arabs and surrounded by trenches. The present agitation in Tripoli Algeria, and the uneasiness of France, of I and of Spain, all arising out of the annexatio Tunis, show what enormous dangers to the tinued tranquillity of the world lurk under crumbling throne of the Sultans.

The Leader of the Algerian Rebellion, wh name is now on all French tongues, is an extr dinary man named Bou-Amena. This stra fanatic, who has unfurled the banner of the Pro of Islam, and preaches war against the infidel the old Mohammedan spirit, has taken a sa character upon himself; or, as he pretends, been called to his work by a peculiar divine in vention. In other words, he claims to be a prop Bou-Amena appears to be an incorruptible enth ast, a splendid orator, and a skilful leader of A bands. He is a master of the peculiar A tactics. When he comes suddenly upon a tribe tells them that Allah has sent him to them for t earthly and heavenly salvation. The hour l appointed by Allah has struck, and, if the t joins him in his war upon the infidel, it will the triumph of the crescent.

The Charges Against Mr. H. M. Stanley, African explorer, of practising cruelty against natives and of trafficking in slaves, are denied b Belgian journal, which says: "Mr. Stanley's structions from the Belgian government, he sa are to send back to Europe any officer using fo against the natives. The men employed are free, and joined the expedition of their own wil They are well paid and well treated.

A Youthful Japanese Missionary, who was heathen boy till quite recently, as soon as learned that Christ was his Saviour, and was se ing other lost sinners like himself, at once show much anxiety to tell of Him to others. Mrs. B lagh, whose Christian school at Kobe, Japan, doing much good, says: "There, nearly a thc sand miles from us, where no missionary h been, this dear boy of nineteen has taught abc the true God. The Lord has blessed his effor and now he has sent to Kobe for one of the m sionaries to come and baptize thirty people—the people offering to defray the missionary's expens in coming." And she rightly adds, "How t Lord does use the weak things of the world confound the mighty."

Messrs. FULLERTON and SMITH—The METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE, Mr. Spurgeon's Church.

THE METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE, LONDON.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Church.

In 1853 Mr. Spurgeon First Preaches in New Park Street, and Becomes the Pastor of the Church—The Building Enlarged—Exeter Hall Services—The Surrey Music Hall—A Fatal Panic—Foundation Stone of the Tabernacle Laid August 16, 1859, and the Opening Services Held May 1861.

THE readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, especially those to whom the sermons of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, published therein every week, have been blessed, cannot fail to be interested in the picture we give this week of the building in which those sermons are delivered. In our issue of October 24, 1878, we published a narrative of the events that led to this enormous edifice being erected, and to the formation of the church over which Mr. Spurgeon presides. But as many of our readers may possibly have missed that number, the following brief summary will be appreciated.

In the month of December, 1853, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, being then nineteen years of age, was invited to preach in New Park Street Chapel, Southwark, London. The congregation was a mere handful. The chapel was large and gloomy; but there was an improvement in the ordinary state of things every service, so that the building was soon crowded. Mr. Spurgeon's ministry was so acceptable and successful, that he received an invitation on April 19, 1854, to become the pastor of the church.

The chapel in the evening, when the gas was burning, was like the black-hole of Calcutta. One evening, in 1854, the preacher exclaimed, "By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, and by faith this wall at the back shall come down, too." An aged and prudent deacon, in somewhat domineering tones, observed to him, at the close of the sermon, "Let us never hear of that again." "What do you mean?" said Mr. Spurgeon; "you will hear no more about it when it is done, and therefore the sooner you set about doing it the better." A meeting was held, a fund was commenced, and in due course the building was considerably enlarged.

While this was being done, worship was carried on at Exeter Hall, the building now acquired by the London Y. M. C. A., from February 11, 1855, to May 27th of the same year. At this time paragraphs began to appear in the papers, announcing that the Strand was blocked up by crowds who gathered to hear a young man in Exeter Hall. Remarks of no very flattering character appeared in various journals, and the multitude was thereby increased. Caricatures adorned the printsellers' windows, the most ridiculous stories were circulated, but all these things worked together for good.

The return to Park Street Chapel even in its enlarged state revealed at once its inadequacy. The services in Exeter Hall had made Mr. Spurgeon's power as a preacher the talk of the whole city. Those who had heard him in Exeter Hall followed him to the enlarged chapel, and brought their friends with them, and the place would not contain half of those who struggled for admission. Hundreds had to be turned away at every service, and those who gained admission were subject to discomfort, for the crowding was excessive, and the heat overwhelming. In June, 1856, Mr. Spurgeon was again at Exeter Hall, preaching there in the evening, and at the chapel in the morning; but this was felt to be inconvenient, and, therefore, in August a fund was commenced to provide for the erection of a larger sanctuary. Meanwhile the Exeter Hall proprietors intimated that they could not let their hall continuously to one congregation; and just at the right moment, though not without trembling at the magnitude of the enterprise, a large music hall in the Royal Surrey Gardens, which had just been completed for the monster concerts of M. Jullien, was secured for Sunday evenings.

On October 19, 1856, a large number of persons, about seven thousand, were assembled there, and the service was commenced in the usual way. Just, however, as Mr. Spurgeon had commenced his prayer, a disturbance was caused, as it was supposed, by some evil-disposed persons acting in concert, and the whole congregation was seized with a sudden panic. This caused a fearful rush to the doors, particularly from the galleries. Several persons, either in consequence of their heedless haste, or from the extreme pressure of the crowd behind, were thrown down on the stone steps of the staircase and were trampled on by the crowd pressing upon them. The lamentable result was that seven persons lost their lives, and twenty-eight were removed to the hospital seriously bruised and injured. Mr. Spurgeon was so affected as to be seriously ill for some days.

For three years the music hall continued in a crowded condition at every service. All classes attended, both high and low. Hundreds of souls were led to Christ, and found in Him eternal life. On October 7, 1857, the day of National Humiliation for the Indian Mutiny, Mr. Spurgeon preached in the centre transept of the Crystal Palace to nearly 25,000 people, and the sum of £686 was paid over to the National Fund.

Meanwhile the collection of money for a new building went on, and in January, 1859, the cash in hand was equivalent to $47,231, and $25,000 of it was set aside to pay for the ground on which the Tabernacle now stands.

THE FIRST STONE of the building was laid, with great rejoicings, on August 16, 1859, by Sir Morton Peto.

In May, 1861, after about a month of Opening Services, regular work was begun at the Tabernacle the whole of the premises being declared free of debt, the accounts showing that $153,526 had been received, and the same amount expended. The Tabernacle is 146 feet long, 81 feet broad, and 62 feet high. There are 5,500 sittings of all kinds. There is room for 6,000 persons without excessive crowding. The lecture-hall will hold about 900 persons, and the school-room 1000 children; besides which there are class-rooms, kitchen, lavatory, and retiring-rooms below, while upstairs, from the ground level to the second gallery, there are numerous convenient rooms and vestries. But the accommodation, vast as it seemed at first, is all too little for the immense work carried on, and the requirements of an immense and ever-augmenting membership.

During one of the preliminary services before the opening of the magnificent building, Mr. Spurgeon said, "The word Tabernacle involves a religious doctrine—namely, that we have not come to the temple state here; we are now passing through the tabernacle-state. We believe this building to be temporary, and only meant for the time that we are in the wilderness without a visible King. Our prayer is, 'Thy kingdom come.' We firmly believe in the real and personal reign of our Lord Jesus Christ, for which we do devoutly wait. That is the reason why it is called a tabernacle, not a temple. We have not here the King in person, the Divine Solomon; till He come, we call it a tabernacle still."

MESSRS. FULLERTON & SMITH: MR. SPURGEON'S EVANGELISTS.

Messrs. Smith and Clarke as Mr. Spurgeon's First Evangelists—Mr. Clarke's Health Failing Mr. Fullerton Becomes Mr. Smith's Coadjutor—Personal Characteristics and Deepening Success.

FEW men of any age have possessed the dual gifts of Evangelist and Pastor to a more remarkable degree than Mr. Spurgeon, and no age has produced his superior in encouraging and assisting others. His college has, perhaps, done more for the revival and maintenance of pure religion than any other institution during an equal period. The men of his training, but of God's calling, are to the front everywhere, and if his valuable life is spared and the help he needs is forthcoming, we shall see yet greater things.

It was a wise venture when he sent forth two evangelists, Messrs. Smith and Clarke, in 1878, to labor in the cause and kingdom of the Saviour as the church should open to them a door of utterance. To this day thousands cherish very fragrant memories of their mission in various parts of Great Britain.

It is all very well to quarry and to shape the stones of a building, but if at the same time we can put them into an edifice, energy is economized and effort is doubly rewarded. One of the growing evils of the age is that so many good men hold aloof from church fellowship, and it is no breach of charity to designate them spiritual nomads or religious gypsies. They are the "casuals" of the church, denying themselves "a local habitation and a name."

In the evangelistic movement which he projected and still directs, Mr. Spurgeon was resolved if possible, to win for Christian fellowship in worship and service Christians who held aloof from Church fellowship. In doing this it was not so much a feeling of jealousy for the honor of a denomination by which he was prompted, but to strengthen the Church of God, and to promote the growth of its members in all that goes to make up a robust spiritual manhood.

Messrs. Smith and Clarke were just the men for the work, and labored with zeal and discretion to justify their vocation. But for the failure of Mr. Clarke's health in April, 1879, the work begun would have been carried on by these two evangelists. Mr. Clarke was compelled to resign his appointment, and betake himself to a more congenial climate. The voyage to Australia proved most beneficial, and the Lord has owned his labors in the colony to a remarkable degree.

Greatly as Mr. Clarke's removal was deplored, the hand of the Lord was apparent, for an opportunity was furnished for bringing into the field who had already given abundant evidence of his fitness for the work. While engaged in business at the West End of London, he devoted his evenings and his Sundays to the work of the Gospel, and while pursuing his studies in the Pastor's College, continued his labors in connection with "The Tabernacle Evangelists' Association" with a devotedness worthy of all praise.

From that time to the present Messrs. Fullerton and Smith have continued to co-operate, and they have been "in labors more abundant." With the prestige of their president, and the vantage furnished by their association with the Tabernacle, an ever-widening sphere of Christian activity and usefulness has been opened up to them, and they have won their way with all classes of the British community. They never stood higher in public esteem than they do now, as is abundantly attested by their three months' mission at Sheffield; and their services were never more earnestly in request. To God be all the praise!

Mr. Fullerton is a worthy colleague of Mr. Smith, and has all the qualities demanded by his position as a leader. There is none of the verdure of his native isle about him, if we except the perennial freshness of his spiritual life, and its outcome. Rich in natural endowments, profound in the intensity of his convictions, and mature in his Christian experience and attainments, he is just the man to make a preacher, and just the preacher to reach the people.

As an evangelist he may have some equals, but certainly no superior. To preach from eight to ten times a week; to conduct daily Bible readings; to give addresses at the noon prayer-meetings; to direct the difficult work of the inquiry rooms; to preside over a Bible Union numbering thousands of members; and to carry on all the correspondence incidental to so great a work, is to prove himself a man of no mean order. And to do all this, moreover, in a campaign in the same town extending over several months, is sufficient to stamp him as possessed of qualities which, in their exercise, magnify the grace of God.

Mr. Fullerton's distinguishing characteristic is the accurate and extensive knowledge of Scripture which he possesses, and the ready use he can make of it in his discourses. He is a Bible student, and rarely advances a truth without quoting texts in point, giving chapter and verse from memory. His command of anecdote is truly remarkable, and his skill in telling a story is only equalled by the adroitness of the application. It is impossible to Half involuntarily the prayer arose from his soul, "Oh, great and gracious God, guide Thou me in safety through all peril; uphold and preserve me for Christ's sake, Amen." The sequel showed this prayer to be needed by the thrilling perils of the journey.

THE ADVENT PARABLES.

By Rev. Richard Chester, A.B.

I. The Ten Virgins—The Question Suggested—A Practical Lesson—Watchfulness Enjoined—For the Coming For the Saints—The Coming to Judgment at an Assigned Period—The Foolish Virgins—Excluded Because of Unreadiness—Not for Lack of Oil—What Constitutes Readiness.

THE parables of our blessed Lord contained in the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, may well be styled Advent parables, inasmuch as they constitute the conclusion, in the way of practical application, of the memorable predictions concerning "His appearing the second time," which are recorded in the preceding chapter. The first in order is that of

I.—THE TEN VIRGINS.

This parable has given rise to far more variety of opinion, and consequent diversity of interpretation, than any other which the Great Teacher has spoken. The exact period in the prophetic history of the advent to which the then with which it commences refers. The virgins, wise and foolish collectively, or the foolish as distinguished from the wise—who are they? Do they represent the Christian Church, or any portion of it? Or are they to be regarded as representing a Jewish remnant, distinguished and separate therefrom? Or are the foolish virgins to be regarded as only nominal believers, and as such finally excluded from the kingdom? or as real, but unready, believers, and therefore only excluded for a time? Again, what are we to understand as represented by "the lamps" and "the oil?"—the insufficient supply of the latter possessed by the foolish virgins?—the request for a portion of their oil, addressed by them to the wise?—their refusal, and the reason assigned for it?—and the subsequent "going to buy?"

All these questions have been asked again and again, and have been answered by replies for the most part widely differing the one from the other. My present purpose, however, is to establish the

of this parable, the enforcement of which I reverently believe to have been the one object of Him who uttered it, rather than to answer any of these questions further than may be actually needful in the endeavor to effect such purpose.

To determine what that lesson is must be the first step toward a true and useful interpretation of the parable. Assuredly we have not far to seek in order to accomplish this. In chapter 24, verse 42, we read the exhortation: "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." The subsequent portion of chapter 24, in which our blessed Lord speaks of the "good man of the house," the "faithful and wise servant" (the same word in the original as that employed to designate the "wise" virgins), and the "evil servant," continues the same subject of watchfulness.

That the immediately succeeding parable of the Ten Virgins is spoken in further special enforcement of the need of such watchfulness, would seem to be put beyond question.

The great lesson of the parable, then, is simply that of watchfulness for the coming of the Lord. To illustrate the need for and the character of such watchfulness, the Lord makes use of the procession at a Jewish marriage, as a matter with which His hearers were most familiar; as an illustration, moreover, which was peculiarly apposite, inasmuch as the coming for which the watchfulness is enjoined is actually that of the Son of Man as bridegroom to take His bride to "the marriage supper of the Lamb." For this reason it would appear that He had previously employed the same illustration of a Jewish marriage when speaking upon the same subject of watchfulness (Luke 12: 35–38).

In order fully to realize the appositeness of the illustration thus employed, it is well to call to mind the customs of

A JEWISH MARRIAGE.

It was invariably celebrated at night; hence the lamps, or torches, and the oil. The bridegroom, accompanied by his friends, "the children of the bride-chamber" (Matthew 9: 15), "the friends of the bridegroom" (John 3: 29), goes to the house of the bride, and conducts her to his own home; or, should that be too narrow to receive the guests, to some larger apartment provided for the occasion. She is accompanied from her father's house by her youthful friends and companions (Psalm 45: 15); while others of these, the "virgins" of the parable, at some convenient place meet and join the procession, and enter with the rest of the company into the banquet hall.

Another point no less essential to the right understanding of this parable is the determination of the exact time to which the emphatic "then" with which it commences refers. When shall the kingdom of heaven present this aspect of readiness and watchfulness upon the part of some of its members, and unreadiness and unwatchfulness upon that of others, which the parable prefigures in its virgins? Will it be at the coming of the Lord in judgment upon His enemies, as spoken of in Matthew 24: 29–31? Or at that coming of the Lord for His saints, when "one shall be taken and the other left," as set forth in verse 36 to the end of the chapter? Most assuredly it will be at the latter.

That the Lord's coming with His saints to judge the world is ever set forth as a subject of watchfulness, or as taking place at an hour of which His disciples shall not be aware, I must take leave altogether to disbelieve. This coming will take place at an assigned period from the commencement of the "great tribulation," at the close of the 1260 days, or latter half of Daniel's seventieth week. It will take place when the nations are gathered in siege against Jerusalem (Zechariah 14). How, therefore, could the language of uncertainty, and the exhortations to watchfulness, based altogether upon that uncertainty, which our blessed Lord employs so frequently, refer to it? Do they not manifestly refer exclusively to that coming for His saints for which no date is given, no day assigned, and which no special signs are to precede?

Besides, the illustration of the marriage would be altogether unsuitable for and inapplicable to the coming of the Lord with His saints in judgment. Such will be a day, not of joy and gladness and festivity, but a "day of wrath," a day of "tribulation, and mourning, and woe." Previous to that day—we know not how long previous—the Lord will have come as the bridegroom for His Church, and will have taken her, His bride, to the marriage supper of the Lamb, which will take place, not on earth, but in heaven, and to which this parable beyond all question refers.

WHO ARE THE VIRGINS?

But it is objected that the virgins of the marriage procession cannot possibly represent the Church, being the bride, and that as there is no mention of, or reference to, the bride in the parable, it cannot apply to the Church at all. The reply to this, however, seems very simple, namely, that if the object of the parable be to inculcate watchfulness for the coming of the bridegroom previous to the holding of the marriage festival, its application must be to the Church; and further, that while the Church in her collective capacity is undoubtedly the bride, our Lord's object in this parable is not at all to speak of her in that capacity, but to give a most solemn warning to each individual member of the Church as to the need of individual watchfulness and readiness for His coming, illustrated by the procession of virgins at a Jewish marriage.

The presence or the mention of the bride is such a parable, spoken for such a purpose, would have been altogether out of place. Nor can there be any more valid objection to the virgins, for a specific purpose and for the inculcation of a specific lesson, here representing individual members of the Church, although the Church in her corporate capacity be the bride, than there is to "the guests" having, for a like reason, a similar signification in the parable of "The Marriage Feast and Wedding Garment" (Matthew 22: 1–14).

The actual cause assigned for the exclusion of the foolish virgins from the marriage seems to me to be the chief practical point in the parable, as inculcating the need of watchfulness, and as teaching the nature of that watchfulness and what it ought to be. They were excluded because of unwatchfulness and unreadiness, and these did not consist in their never having been possessed of oil. They had been manifestly possessed of it in the first instance, or the lamps would not have been alight at all. They had, it would further appear, some oil even when the awakening cry arose, otherwise they could not have trimmed their lamps or have said "Our lamps are going out" (see margin). Without oil their lamps would have gone out long before.

THE EXCLUSION OF THE FOOLISH VIRGINS.

Nor yet did the unwatchfulness and unreadiness of the foolish virgins, which caused their exclusion from the marriage feast, consist in the smallness or insufficiency of their supply of oil. When they came to the door after having gone to buy it would seem to be, at all events, the most probable inference—an inference which the parable in no way contravenes—that they had obtained and were in possession of a fresh supply of oil. They were excluded because it was "while they went to buy that the bridegroom came" (verse 10).

Even were we to suppose that they had not any oil, or but a very small supply of it, at the time of their coming to the door, we can scarcely, I think, regard such as the actual cause of exclusion. Oil, either in the lamp or in the vessel, however needful for the midnight procession on the dark road outside, can scarcely be regarded as essential for the lighted chamber of the marriage feast, and the want of it, therefore, as a sufficient reason for exclusion therefrom. They were excluded, because when they came for admission "the door was shut!"

The whole force of their exclusion—the entire lesson to be learned from it—turns, to my mind, upon this one fact, that they formed no part of the watching, waiting, ready procession at the actual moment of the bridegroom's coming; they were not with the other virgins at the open door at the critical time for entrance with the bridegroom, before he had gone in and the door was closed. Just when, more than at any previous time, they should have formed part of the watchful procession, they were employed and intent, not upon waiting for the bridegroom, but upon the procuring of oil.

If this be a correct view of the matter, then the teaching of the parable as to

for the coming of the Lord, over and above the being numbered among His truly believing, blood-washed people, none save whom can possess the smallest pretension to readiness, is just that it consists in incessant watchfulness—unintermitting expectancy—such expectancy as will give continued occasion for the question, "Can I enter into this occupation, can I engage in that pursuit, assured that, were the Lord to come and to find me in the midst of it, there would be no displeasure upon His part—no fear, no shame upon mine?"

From the ordinary employments of the lawful calling, be they what they may, there need (in order to such readiness) be no shrinking whatever. We learn from a previous portion of this same discourse of our blessed Lord that of those who shall be engaged in their lawful avocations at the moment of the advent, some shall be "taken," while others shall be "left" (Matthew 24: 40, 41). But the pursuit, the occupation—whether it be in the way of business or of pleasure—which would cause us to entertain the hope that the Lord may not come while we are engaged in it, even as the unwise virgins of the parable must have hoped that the bridegroom would not come while they were absent from the procession upon their search for oil; such, if there be any significance in its teaching, must constitute the unreadiness, to warn each and all of His disciples against which is the special object for which this parable has been spoken by our loving Redeemer, and has been by the Holy Spirit recorded for our instruction upon the inspired pages of the blessed Word of God.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Bulletins Issued by the President's Physicians last week were full of hope and encouragement. There was no return of the chills which produced alarm on July 23d. The discharge of pus from the wound continued regular, and its properties on analysis showed that the healing process is satisfactorily progressing. Dr. Agnew, of Philadelphia, and Dr. Hamilton, of New York, the consulting physicians, have alternated their attendance at Washington, one or other of those eminent practitioners being always at the White House throughout the week. Dr. Agnew, in examining the wound on Tuesday, July 26th, detected the presence of two or three sharp splinters of bone, which he succeeded in removing with his forceps. This operation, though a painful one, gave the President much relief.

It has not yet been deemed prudent to attempt to extract the ball. Efforts have been made to ascertain its position by means of an electrical apparatus, called the induction balance, which when brought into proximity with metal gives a signal, and indicates how many inches the metal is from the electrical coil. The physicians are now agreed that the ball is lodged in the front wall of the abdomen, above the groin, and that it traversed a passage over twelve inches in length. Those who know anything of anatomy, and remember how many vital organs lie near the track of the bullet —organs which the missile must have almost touched, but yet did not injure—will see additional reasons for thankfulness to God for the Providential care evident in what some men call "a lucky escape."

The chief cause of anxiety now consists in the possibility that minute portions of the President's clothing may have been carried by the ball into the wound, and may produce inflammation; but with the acute watch now being maintained by the skilful surgeons in attendance, it is hoped that this danger may be warded off.

Two Important Inferences May be Drawn from the brave fight for life the President is making. All the physicians who have been consulted in the case concur in the opinion that, humanly speaking, his chances of recovery rest mainly on the way he has spent his past life. By regular and temperate habits his constitution was in the most favorable condition for sustaining a shock such as that of the attempted assassination, without developing the fatal fever which often results from gunshot wounds. Also that he has shown cheerful resignation to the will of God and a calm Christian equanimity in the face of death which could only spring from assurance of a personal faith in the Saviour, and this freedom from distressing anxiety is also a sign from which those about him derive encouragement. Young men may wisely learn a lesson from both these statements.

"I am Sorry for Conkling," said President Garfield, when told that Lapham and Miller were elected, "I should like to give him a foreign mission." There are few men, whatever may be their party affiliations, who will not admire the President for the Christian spirit displayed in that speech (Job 31 : 29). It shows that he has too much nobility of character to join in the unseemly vindictiveness shown by some journals, which have showered vituperation on a man in his defeat whom they lauded with fulsome adulation when he served their cause. Certain pusillanimous writers have even stooped so low as to charge on the fallen Senator and his friends responsibility for Guiteau's crime, have cabled to Europe their mendacious insinuations, and have thus misled the British press, which now moralizes over the evil influence of our system of government, as "a system capable of turning able statesmen into assassins." The men who thus slander their fellow-countrymen in foreign journals are traitors, to whom the example of the President may be commended.

The Foreign Trade of the United States for the year ending June 30th, 1881, has been summed up in an exhaustive report issued last week by the chief of the Bureau of Statistics. It appears from the report that during the fiscal year the value of the exports of merchandise amounted to $902,319,473, being larger than ever before in the history of the country. The value of the imports of merchandise amounted to $642,593,219, and was larger than during any preceding year with the exception of the year ending June 30th, 1880. Since the year ending June 30th, 1875, the total excess of the value of the exports of merchandise from the United States over that of the imports of merchandise into the United States has amounted to the sum of $1,180,681,641. We may reasonably rejoice over the unprecedented prosperity of which this return is an evidence. We should also remember the source and origin of our national wealth (1 Chron. 29 : 12).

The Daring Robbery of a Railroad Train on the Chicago & Rock Island Railroad, on July 15th, is one of those incidents which prove how prevalent now is the spirit of lawlessness which prophecy directs us to recognize as a sign of the last days. Just as the conductor gave the signal to start from Winston, Mo., two brigands jumped on the locomotive before it had got under way, and presenting their revolvers drove the engineer and fireman from their posts. The engineer, with some presence of mind, dodged before his engine and hid himself in front of the smoke-stack, where he rode unobserved on the pilot. Four confederates of the men who were on the engine then entered the smoking car. The conductor and a passenger made some show of opposition, but they were promptly shot. They then overpowered the express messenger, shooting at him and making him open the safe, from which they took $2000. The robbery occupied about twenty minutes and all the time the train was in motion. It was then stopped and the outlaws fled.

A Disastrous Cyclone Struck the Town of New-Ulm, Minn., situated on the Minnesota River, sixty-five miles from St. Paul, containing about 3500 persons, on the evening of July 16th. It seems that two currents of air swept the valley simultaneously, coming from different directions. The scene, as described in the dispatches, was appalling in the extreme. An eye-witness writes: "The storm burst upon the town in the form of a terrible hurricane from the west. Darkness enveloped everything, and it was impossible for friends to recognize each other at a distance of ten feet. Over a hundred residences—all of modest pretensions—were swept away by the wind in the twinkling of an eye, and several hundred persons rendered homeless. The German Methodist and the German Lutheran churches, both handsome edifices, were hurled to the ground in an instant, inflicting a loss upon each congregation of about $10,000. When the tornado struck the business centre of the town, the air was full, in a few moments, of flying timbers and débris of every description, fence boards, fragments of roofing, wagons, window sashes, doors, and all conceivable articles; while above the roar of the tempest could be heard the frantic shouts of men, the piercing shrieks of women and the agonizing wailings of children. The crash of falling walls was heard on every side, while ever and anon the scene of terrible picturesqueness was lit up by lurid flashes of lightning. For several minutes—which seemed almost an age—the play of the lightning was almost incessant, and nearly a score of buildings were struck and more or less injured by the electric fluid." Thirty persons are reported killed, and the loss of property cannot be accurately estimated, but is believed to exceed half a million dollars.

Sitting Bull with Two Hundred of his Tribe surrendered to Major Brotherton on July 20th. They marched to Fort Buford, Minn., and gave up their arms and ponies. Sitting Bull is reported as being sullen and insolent, but it is thought that kind treatment will soon make him satisfied. The telegram announcing his surrender says, "The government has accepted his surrender in good faith. A dispatch was forwarded to Standing Rock to inform Crow King and Low Dog of Sitting Bull's arrival, and it is believed that this news will remove any desire the Indians there may have to leave the agency." The Northern Cheyennes are very much dissatisfied with their present location in the Indian country, and want to go north to the Missouri River country. They wish to live at Fort Keogh, but there is no Indian reservation there. Secretary Kirkwood, of the Interior, and Mr. Lincoln, Secretary at War, recently held a conference on the subject at Washington, at which General Sherman and Little Chief were present. It was decided that a delegation of Missouri River Indians, including Spotted Tail, Red Cloud, Standing Bear, and others, should be invited to Washington early in September to discuss that and other questions with the authorities there.

Justice Nathan Clifford, of the Supreme Court of the United States, died at Cornish, Me., on Monday, July 25th. He had been ill since last October, when he was seized while on a train with a paralytic stroke. He partially recovered under treatment, but it was observed that his mental faculties were failing, and he never sat in court afterward. The immediate cause of his death was an injury to one of his feet, which produced gangrene and rendered amputation necessary.

Justice Clifford was born at Rumney, N. H., in 1803. After serving in several responsible offices in the State of Maine, he was elected to Congress in 1839. In 1857 he was nominated by President Buchanan Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, to succeed Benjamin R. Curtis, and was confirmed by a close vote in the Senate on January 12th, 1858. By virtue of his office he was president of the Electoral Commission in 1876, and although he arrived at a firm conviction of the validity of Mr. Tilden's election, he nobly sacrificed his personal preferences, when on the 4th of March he might, by a slight delay, have prevented a peaceful termination to the contest. At the celebration of his golden wedding, on July 4th, 1878, thirty-two children and grandchildren gathered at the house of his son in Portland, Me.

The Chinese Students in American Universities have been withdrawn, in compliance with an order issued by the Pekin government. It appears that an emissary of the government recently visited these students, and finding they had cut off their queues, and in other respects had conformed to American customs, he sent home an unfavorable report of the influences of American colleges. He declared that the effect of their sojourn was "to alienate the boys from their country and its customs, to undermine the most sacred traditional principles of government and society, to implant and foster seditious ideas, which would become the germ of social, if not civil and religious troubles among their own people." The Emperor of China is endeavoring to secure an American professor to conduct the education of the upper classes of Chinese boys in China. An offer of $100,000 for five years' service has already been made to one professor.

Another Munificent Gift has Been Made by Mr. George I. Seney, of Brooklyn, to the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., for the purpose of founding scholarships for meritorious students. The income of $100,000 is to be annually applied as follows: At the end of the next freshman year fifteen competitive scholarships, from $100 gradually ascending to $250, will be awarded in the order of proficiency, according to conditions to be hereafter announced. At the end of each sophomore, junior, and senior year, seven competitive scholarships of similar amounts will be awarded, the whole beginning with the next class, so that after the fund is in full operation, thirty-six competitive scholarships from $100 to $250 will be annually awarded to those who earn them.

The Confession Made by a Girl of Ladylike and prepossessing appearance, who was sentenced on July 27th, in Brooklyn, to imprisonment for two years and a half, for a series of sneak robberies, deserves notice as a warning. She stated that her life had been honest and virtuous until one day recently she attended a picnic of the employes in a house of business. There she drank champagne and became intoxicated. She did not remember what followed, but on awaking next morning her surroundings were evidence that her character was ruined. She lost her situation and in her poverty and desperation obtained a livelihood-by dishonest acts (Rom. 13 : 13).

The Fall of a Mountain in Montana is Thus described in the Missoulian of July 15th. "Citizens many miles away were startled by a loud noise in the mountains on the west side of the Bitter Root, the report resembling the firing of cannon and reverberations. The noise was caused by the falling of a high peak on one of the mountains about opposite Corvallis, and was so loud that it was distinctly heard at Eight-Mile, below Stevensville. Probably thousands of tons of rock, the foundations of which had been crumbling for ages, came down in the grand crash." It is hoped that no lives were lost by the descent of this immense mass of rock. How awful would have been the fate of any one who might have been in its track, imagination cannot conceive. Yet even that horrible end will be desired by impenitent sinners in the great day of judgment as preferable to that awaiting them (Rev. 6 : 16).

The Life-saving Heroine, Ida Lewis, now Mrs. Ida Lewis Wilson, has been awarded by Secretary of the Treasury Windom, the gold Life-saving medal in recognition of her services in rescuing a number of persons from drowning since the passage of the act authorizing such awards. Most of the rescues made were under circumstances which called for extreme and heroic daring, and involved the risk of Mrs. Wilson's life. Her heroism on various occasions has won her the tribute of her State's Legislature expressed in an official resolution; the public presentation to her of a boat by the citizens of Newport; a testimonial in money from the officers and soldiers of Fort Adams for saving their comrades; and medals from the Massachusetts Humane Society and the New York Life-Saving Benevolent Association. To these offerings is now fitly added the gold medal of the United States Life-Saving Service.

Leo Hartmann, the Notorious Nihilist, Arrived in New York on Thursday, July 28th. He is the man who planned and executed the attempt to assassinate the late Czar of Russia on December 2d, 1879, when the line of railroad between St. Petersburg and Moscow was blown up under a passing train, by which the conspirators supposed the Czar was travelling. Hartmann is an emissary of "the executive committee of the Russian Social Revolutionary Party," better known as the Nihilists, and in the commission he bears from that order, he is instructed to undertake "the great work of organizing and founding in Europe and America permanent bureaux for the purpose of disseminating our doctrines." Interviews with him have been published in the newspapers, in which he avows his determination to proceed with his wicked plots, and glories in the revolutionary deeds which have sent a thrill of horror through the world.

While Hartmann is spreading the doctrines of Nihilism in the city, and soliciting subscriptions to aid the order in its revolutionary work, O'Donovan Rossa, the Fenian conspirator, is inciting his fellow countrymen here to engage in work similar to that of the Nihilists, against England. In the columns of the journal he edits, appeals are regularly made to Irishmen to combine to destroy British ships in foreign harbors, although he admits that such attempts, if successful, might involve the death of citizens of the country which has given him shelter. With these and other unscrupulous foes of law and order laboring in our midst, it becomes Christians now more than at any past time to work diligently in the cause of the Prince of Peace (Titus 3 : 1, 2).

The Murder of Philip Klingen Smith is Reported from Mexico. His body, bearing marks of violence, was found a few days ago in a prospect hole at Sonora. He was once a bishop among the Mormons in Utah, and was one of the principal witnesses against John D. Lee and the Mormon miscreants who were responsible for the Mountain Meadow massacre. After the trial he fled to Arizona, where two attempts were made on his life. It is a startling sequel to one of the foulest chapters of Mormon history. What makes the fate of the witness terribly significant is his own prediction: "The Church will kill me sooner or later."

A Flagman's Neglect of Duty Caused a Collision on the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroad on Friday, July 29th. A wrecking train was being loaded with the debris of a train which had been broken down by a collision, and a flagman was sent along the line to stop a fast heavy freight train nearly due. The flagman had other duties to perform, and he appears to have thought he had time, or had been instructed, to attend to them first. While he was doing so, the rapid freight train arrived and dashed into the wrecking train. How like this conduct was to that of some Christians, and even of some ministers, who fail to recognize what is their primary and most important duty (1 Cor. 2 : 2).

The Sudden Death of the Rev. John Q. Adams, of New York, on July 27th, has caused profound sorrow among his friends and those who were interested in his Berean Bible College. In a recent number we called attention to the useful work this institution has been instrumental in accomplishing, which will be suspended if not wholly terminated by the death of its founder. Mr. Adams was a native of Philadelphia, and at the time of his death was fifty-five years of age. The disease from which he died was aneurism of the heart.

The Marriage of Bright Eyes, the Indian maiden, to Mr. L. H. Tibbals of Omaha, the earnest friend of the ill-used Poncas, has been announced. Bright Eyes is twenty years of age, is a refined, well-educated, Christian young woman, of delicate and regular features, and pleasing manners. She attended school in Elizabeth, New Jersey, for several years, and was an apt pupil. She has only recently returned to her old home. She first appeared in public on behalf of the Poncas in the winter of 1879 and 1880, and her pathetic appeals did much to hasten the righting of the wrongs heaped upon the tribe. Mr. Tibbals is a journalist, who was moved to indignation by the wrongs inflicted on the tribe by the Interior Department under the Hayes administration, and who came east with Standing Bear, a Ponca chief, and made appeals for aid for the tribe. Bright Eyes joined them, and they met with good success on their mission. The acquaintance then formed between Mr. Tibbals and Bright Eyes led to their bethrothal.

The eloquent addresses of Bright Eyes will not soon be forgotten in New York and other eastern cities, where she appealed to American citizens against Mr. Schurz and his underlings. She concluded her last speech as follows: "It seems to us at times that this great government treats us more like dogs than human beings. I believe, however, that we are God's people, and He will not desert us. It brings Christ nearer to my heart to think that He suffered so when He was on earth. Please believe that we are human beings, and that we love and hate just as you do."

THE DOUBLE "COME."

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"AND the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come."—REVELATION 22 : 17.

How shall the Book Finish?—I. The Twofold Ministry—A Cry for the Coming of the Lord—Its Near Approach—A Cry to Sinners to Come—The First Call not Opposed to the Second—Must not be Obscured—They are Linked together—II. It is Secured — The Spirit and the Bride United—III. It is Increased—No Commission to the Unconverted—The Cry Perpetuated—The Torches of the Greek Athletes—Its Volume Swollen—Its Force Strengthened—IV. Urged on All who have Heard—The Commission—A Lay Preacher's Answer—A Little Italian Guide—How to Get at the Masses.

WE have open before us the last page of the Word of God. The Spirit of God will not dictate a single fresh line of truth. We have come to the last chapter, and very soon we shall reach the Amen. We are also, according to Divine revelation, approaching the last page of human history. So short a time will elapse before the present economy shall conclude that the angel saith, "Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book: for the time is at hand."

How shall the book finish? If we have come almost to its last verse, how shall it conclude? If we could have been asked by the great Spirit of God, How shall it close? what would have been our reply? We must certainly have left it entirely to His infinite wisdom; but what suggestions might we have made? Shall it finish with a promise? It is well that it should, and there is the cheering word for the righteous, "Blessed are they that do His commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city."

But if we close with comfort for saints, what about the multitude outside? what about the tens of thousands who are perishing? Does not our love to sinners suggest that there should be a word to them? Shall it, then, be a word of threatening, stern and vigorous, to awaken their consciences, and convince them of sin? Here it is: "Without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie." Yet one does not like to finish with

A SENTENCE OF EXCLUSION.

The Old Testament closes with the word "curse;" let not the New Testament conclude in the same fashion. What, then, shall it be? Shall the last sentences be full of tender invitation and earnest entreaty to the sinner, bidding him come to Christ and live? Yes, let it be so: and yet shall we forget the Lord Himself while we are thinking of the sinner? He has told us that He will come, should not the very last word of Scripture have a reference to Him and to His glorious advent? Should not the Spirit at the last, as well as at the first, bear witness to Jesus? Shall not the last word that shall linger in the reader's ear speak of the approaching glory of the Lord? Yes, let it be so; but it would be best of all if we could have a word that would combine the four: a promise to the righteous, a threatening to the wicked, an invitation to the poor and needy, and a welcome to the coming One. Who could devise such a verse? The Holy Ghost is equal to the emergency. He can dictate such a verse; He has dictated it. Here it is in the words of our text: "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come."

"Come," is the word of the Spirit and the bride, and our text urges us to let it be our word, too, if we have ever heard it. "Let him that heareth say, Come." In trying to open up this passage we shall notice, first, that here is a twofold ministry, we are bidden to say, "Come;" but it is in a double sense: we say to Jesus, "Come," and we say to the sinner, "Come." Secondly, we shall notice how this twofold ministry is secured, "the Spirit and the bride say, Come;" this is actually and perpetually done according to the ordinance of God. Then, thirdly, we shall see how this twofold ministry is to be increased—let him that hear-eth add a new voice to that which is already speaking, and let him say, "Come!" In conclusion, you who are hearing ones shall have this twofold ministry urged upon you. May the Spirit of the Lord bless our discourse to him that heareth.

I. First, then, let us consider the twofold ministry.

There is in the text

A CRY FOR THE COMING OF THE LORD.

If you read the verse in connection with that which goes before it you will be persuaded that the cry of the Spirit and the bride is addressed to the Lord Jesus concerning His second advent. As the echo of the Saviour's previous words, "Behold, I come quickly," the Spirit and the bride say, Come.

This cry is continually going up from the Spirit and from the Church of God; and the more gracious the season the more intense the prayer. Because we have the first-fruits of the Spirit we groan within ourselves for the glorious manifestation of our Lord. Just as the twelve tribes, serving God day and night, looked for the first coming, so ought all the tribes of our Israel, day and night, without ceasing, to wait for the Lord from heaven. We are looking for the blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. "Even so, come, Lord Jesus" is the desire of every instructed saint.

I shall not go into any details about when He will come; I will not espouse the cause of the pre-millennial or the post-millennial advent; it will suffice me just now to observe that the Redeemer's coming is the desire of the entire Church; and "unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation." The ministry of prayer for the coming of the Lord ought to grow more and more fervent as the years roll on; even as the watchers look for the morning the more eagerly as the night wears away. Certainly the time draweth nearer, and the event can hardly be far removed; therefore let the prayer be general and eager till our Lord heareth it.

> "Hark how Thy saints unite their cries
> And pray and wait the general doom!
> Come, Thou, the soul of all our joys!
> Thou, the Desire of Nations, come!"

Let every one that hears the prophecy of our Lord's assured coming join in the prayer, "Thy kingdom come."

But there is a second ministry of the Church, which is the cry for the coming of sinners to Christ. In this respect "the Spirit and the bride say, Come." It is a very sad calamity when any church ceases from its mission work; it is clearly out of fellowship with the Spirit of God, and has ceased to work with Him. The cry of "Come" should never cease at any time or in any place; but it should be addressed to all men, as we have opportunity. The world should ring with "Come to Jesus! Come to Jesus! Come and welcome, sinner, Come." The Spirit abides here, and the Church abides here, that together they may continually cry, "Let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

This, then, is the double ministry, and I want you to notice that the first call is not opposed to the second. The fact that Christ is coming ought never to make us any the less diligent in pressing sinners to come to Christ. I deeply regret when I see persons so taken up with prophecy that they forget evangelism. Trumpets and vials must not displace the Gospel and its invitations. By all means pray fervently for the advent, and search the roll and see what the Spirit saith concerning it; but still look on the world that lieth in the wicked one, and let its sorrows command your tears, let its sins excite your zeal. Go out into the world and cry, "Come," and the Spirit of God will cry with you, and by your cry many shall be brought to Christ that they may live. A desire for the personal coming of the Lord is by no means antagonistic to the resolve to labor on in His absence, in the hope of subduing the world to His gracious reign.

Again, take heed that the second call never obscures the first. Albeit we are to seek sinners with all our might, and to compel them to come in to the marriage supper, yet we must not forget whose marriage it is, nor cease to pray for the majestic appearing of our Lord, the Prince of life. Despise not prophesying. Be taken up with evangelical work; let it fill your heart, and fill your hands; but, at the same time, which, to many, will be as unwelcome as a thief in the night.

WATCH FOR THAT SUDDEN APPEARING

Let the two comes leap at the same moment from your heart; for they are linked together. Christ will not come until He hath gathered unto Himself an elect company; therefore, when you and I go forth and say to sinners, "Come," and God blesses us to the bringing of them in, we are doing the best we can to hasten the advent of the Son of man. Jesus will not descend till He hath borne long with the ungodly, until indeed His word shall have been preached throughout all nations for a testimony against them, and then shall the end be. Brethren, the two truths work together as a matter of fact, and we are not to dissociate them. Look for the Lord's coming, and then work toward that coming, by bidding sinners come to Christ and live. To my mind the doctrine of the coming of Christ ought to inflame the zeal of every believer who seeks the conversion of his fellow men; and how can he be a believer if he does not seek this end? The Lord cometh quickly: O sinner, come quickly to the Lord, or it may be too late for you to come.

I am sure that everybody who is eager to save souls will soon be driven to desire the advent. If we vehemently cry "Come" to the ungodly, and see their rejection of the Gospel, we shall at times become so cast down that we shall cry, "Come, Lord, and end this dreary age. Men reject and despise Thee, and Thy servants are distressed; it is time for Thee to interpose, for they make void Thy law." Go into a heathen land and see their images, and preach to them concerning the true God; and when they reject your testimony you will be driven to cry, "Come, Lord Jesus." Stand in a Popish country and see them altogether given to their idols, and worshipping crosses and relics, and you will soon cry, "Come, Lord Jesus." The vehemence of your desire for the destruction of evil and the setting up of the kingdom of Christ will drive you to that grand hope of the Church, and make you cry out for its fulfilment.

There is no need to say more about this twofold ministry; only let its two parts be evenly balanced; let there be prayer to our Lord, "Come quickly!" and an equal measure of entreaty to sinners, "Come to Christ!" Blend the two in wise proportion, and set both on fire. Tell of Christ's coming to judgment, and then invite men to come to Christ for mercy. Warn them that He is on the way; but tell them that He waits to be gracious, and that while He lingers they have space for repentance. You will thus both drive and draw, both convince and comfort, and your testimony will have two hands with which to bear men to their Saviour.

II. And now, secondly, let us note that this twofold ministry is secured. According to our text, say, Come." They always do say it, and always will say it till Jesus comes.

THE SPIRIT AND THE BRIDE

The Spirit says it. What a cry must this be which comes up from the Spirit of God Himself! Given at Pentecost, He has never returned nor left the Church, but He dwells in chosen hearts, as in a temple, even to this day. With groanings that cannot be uttered He maketh intercession for us, and this is one of his intercessions, "Come, Lord Jesus." We are sure that Christ will come, if for no other reason, from this fact that the Spirit cries "Come;" for the Spirit cannot plead in vain.

This also is certainly fulfilled by the Church wherever she is a true Church. Note, that here she is called "the bride." A bride is one that has been chosen from among others and set apart by love to be specially dear to him who chose her; so is the Church chosen by God's eternal election and by the love of Christ, to be Christ's beloved forever. Joy, joy, joy awaiteth the elect Church of Christ. Ere long shall heaven and earth be filled with the splendor of the nuptials of the King of kings, when He shall take to Himself His great power and reign, and take to Himself His bride, who shall then be called the Lamb's wife. Even to-day the Church is the bride of Christ, reserved unto Him alone.

This Church, which deserves to be called "the bride," is always fulfilling the double ministry which lies in the cry of "Come." Her prayers rise to heaven incessantly for her Bridegroom's appearing.

> "Come, Lord, and tarry not;
> Bring the long-look'd-for day;
> Oh, why these years of waiting here,
> These ages of delay?"

And then she turns round to an ungodly world and she cries, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, let him come." So, you see, the Church speaks up to her Lord that she may bring Him down, and she speaks down to the world that she may bring sinners up to Christ.

Thus our God secures the ceaseless double ministry; for while the Spirit is upon the earth, and the Church is yet among men, the two together will continually say, "Come."

I think I have sufficiently shown the character of this twofold ministry, and how our God has provided for its continuance.

III. I want your practical attention, and your prayers, while we speak upon the way in which

THIS TWOFOLD MINISTRY IS INCREASED.

"Let him that heareth say, Come." The hearing man is to say, "Come," but the unconverted man is not bidden so to do. I want you to notice the gradations. "The Spirit and the bride say, Come;" that is actually done. The man that "heareth" is bidden to say, "Come;" this should be done. But the man who is thirsting is not told to say, "Come." No, he cannot say "Come" till he has first come for himself. The exhortation, then, to say "Come" is only addressed to those who drink of the water of life. You that are not saved cannot invite others. How can you? You do not know the way, you do not know the blessing to be found in that way.

A more pitiable being than a man who tries to preach before he is converted I can hardly imagine, and it is lamentable that there are in England hundreds of men ordained to the Christian ministry who themselves do not know what it is to be born again. They are preaching mysteries in which they have no fellowship. This is unhappy work and unlawful work. "Unto the wicked God saith, What hast thou to do to declare my statutes?" Yet all of you who have really heard the Gospel with opened ear, and received the truth of God by faith into your souls, are called upon to cry, "Come." Every man that has really heard and learned the Word of God, is to go forth, and bid others come to Christ.

See, brethren, how this perpetuates the cry. I have cried, "Come;" but my voice will be hushed in the grave ere long. Younger men who have heard through my voice, will cry, "Come" when I am silent, and those that hear them shall cry, "Come" when that generation shall have passed away. As in the old Greek games the athletes ran with torches, and one handed the light to another, and thus it passed along the line, so is it with us. Each man runneth his race, but he passeth the torch on to another that the light may never go out from generation to generation. "Let him that heareth say, Come."

This precept secures the swelling of the volume of the cry; for if every man that hears the Gospel is to cry, "Come," then there will be more voices and yet more. What a feeble few they were who stood up at Pentecost, and by the mouth of Peter began to say, "Come." When each man went out to preach, though they spoke in all kinds of voices, they were but a few that said, "Come;" but ere the sun went down there were three thousand baptized into Christ, every one ready to say, "Come." Ere centuries had passed all Europe had heard the voice of those who said, "Come."

"The Lord gave the word: great was the company of them that published it." If at this time we could arouse all that hear the Gospel to say, "Come," what a chorus it would be! All the world would hear it. If all who go down to the sea in ships knew the Lord, and would say, "Come;" ay, if every Christian traveller would take care to proclaim the Gospel wherever he went, what holy voices would be heard in nations that as yet are ignorant of Christ! The volume swells, the sound rolls like thunder along the heavens when all that hear it say, "Come."

And how the force of it is strengthened! When one man saith "Come," and tells out the Gospel tale, men may doubt it. Another steps in and says, "Come," and in the mouth of two witnesses the whole shall be established. If another and another shall say, "Come," if each one shall bear witness to the sweetness and the love of Christ, many will be driven to Christ by the power of such repeated testimonies. There is a young man whose sister has been saved; he laughs at her. His mother is converted; he smiles at her. His father is converted; he begins to think. His brother is converted; one after another all in the house are renewed. They all beseech him; they pray for him; they tell him the way of salvation, and at last he must yield. When so many surround him the testimony is so strengthened that the Spirit of God blesses it to his conversion.

IV. I may not linger longer over this, for I must advance to the fourth part, which is the most practical. This is my point; this twofold ministry is the Word of God. I will leave the point of saying "Come, Lord Jesus" till the close of the sermon, and as it is not easy to ride upon two horses at once, I will keep to that part of our ministry which consists in bidding the thirsting ones come to Jesus.

First, dear brother, dear sister, you who have with the ear of your inner nature heard the Word of God, you are called to cry to others, "Come to Christ." You are called to this work by an obligation—the fact that you have received a very gracious privilege. Somebody else brought the Gospel to you, for faith cometh by hearing, and you heard the report, and therefore you live. Are you not under a moral obligation to carry the Gospel to others that they also may hear it and be saved? Remember how many lived and died to bring you the Gospel. Had it not been for men who burned at the stake, there might have been no Gospel preaching in England; had it not been for those near and dear to you, who loved you, and prayed for you, and wrestled for your salvation, you might have been in the midst of Gospel light, and yet never have seen a ray of it. Are you not a debtor henceforth to all around you? Ought you not to repay your debt by laboring for others as others labored for you?

Now,

LISTEN TO YOUR COMMISSION.

"Let him that heareth say, Come." A believer preaching in the street was accosted by a gentleman who had been ordained to the ministry. Hands which belonged to arms decorated with lawn sleeves had been laid upon this gentleman's consecrated pate, and he was thereby made into an authorized minister. A wonderful thing this! How is it that those of us who were never the subjects of this solemn imposition manage to win souls for Christ? However, this man preaching the Gospel in the street was stopped and asked by this successor of the apostles what right he had to preach; and he was not slow to give an answer. The preacher quoted this text—"Let him that heareth say, Come." "I have heard the Gospel," said he, "in my own soul, and that is my permission to go and preach it, and I shall not be stopped by you."

You who preach the Gospel in the streets are often called lay preachers; but indeed you are as much God's clergy as any others; for the apostle Peter distinctly calls the whole Church, or, if you please, the mere laity, God's heritage, or in the Greek, God's cleros, in that memorable verse addressed to ministers, which warns them against being "lords over God's clergy." All of you who believe in Jesus are God's clergy, and are authorized to speak the word in some form or other. Yea, the women have their places; even though they are forbidden to preach in the public assembly, there are times when they may address their own sex and others, much to the glory of God. Let them speak without fear, as often as God gives them opportunity, in their own modest, affectionate way. Let them tell of Jesus and His love.

Somehow or other you are all to say, "Come," whether you be men or women, ignorant or learned; and here is your permit for doing it: "Let him that heareth say, Come." Let him begin to say it as soon as he has heard it, let him keep on saying it as long as he lives.

"His only righteousness I show,
His saving truth proclaim;
'Tis all my business here below
To cry, 'Behold the Lamb!'

"Happy if with my latest breath
I may but gasp His name;
Preach Him to all, and cry in death,
'Behold, behold the Lamb!'"

This is your commission; mind that you attend to it. O ye commissioned officers of Christ, see that ye sound aloud your Master's word.

The text saith not, "Let him that has heard," but, "him that heareth," that is to say, let the man who is still hearing the voice of God speak. Hear, and then tell what you hear. I have seen pictures of a pope which represent him with a dove sitting upon his shoulder, insinuating that he receives divine intimations. I am afraid that the bird is a raven in the case of these so-called heads of the church; but in the case of humble believers, the Spirit is present revealing Christ to the heart, and that which is revealed is to be spoken by us. There is your qualification; you have proved the truth of God in your own soul, and so can speak experimentally; you have found Christ; you have drunk the living water, and you can say, "Come."

I wanted a drink one day in a thirsty place in Italy, and by the coachman's help I asked at a house for water. The owner of the house was busy and did not come to show me where the water could be found; but he sent a girl with me; she was very little, but she was quite big enough, for she led the way to a well, and I was soon refreshed. She had not to make a well, but only to point it out, and therefore her youth was no disadvantage. We have not to invent salvation but to tell of it; and therefore you who are but babes in grace can perform the work. You have heard the voice of Jesus say, "Stoop down and drink, and live;" go forth and echo that voice till thousands quench their thirst.

Your message is a very simple one: "Let him that heareth say"—a long and difficult sentence in Latin? No. Is he to repeat a very complicated piece of Miltonic blank verse? No. "Let him that heareth say, Come." "I can say that," says somebody. Mind you do, brother. Just go and tell people that Jesus died; tell them that "whosoever believeth in Him is not condemned." Do not be too long over it, it is you know: "Let him that heareth say, Come." Be very earnest about it. There are many ways of saying it—mind you say it in the best possible manner. And then, as the message is very short, repeat it often:

"Tell me the story often,
For I forget it soon."

Tell it over and over again, since it is all in one word, "Come." Mind you do not add anything else to it. Do not tell them to bring a price; do not tell them to prepare themselves, and to do this or that; but just say, "Come, Come, Come away from your selves, Come away from your sins, Come away from your righteousness. Come to Jesus, Come to Jesus, sinner, Come!" It is a very short message.

And so I conclude by saying, Take care to recollect that yours is a two-fold ministry, and so when you have said "Come" to the sinner, mind you back it all up with prayer. Go home and say, "Lord, come to these poor sinners by Thy grace; Lord, come, I pray thee, come, that this poor work of mine may be ended, because a greater work shall be accomplished by Thy coming." Let your heart cry to your Lord, "Come;" for then you will not be engrossed with the world. No man will be anxious for Christ to come while he has everything he wants here below, and is quite satisfied with it. The miser and the voluptuary do not want the Lord to come; they are so glued to this world that they dread anything that might change their relation to it. You must set loose by the world, or you cannot sincerely say to Jesus, "Come," and that is the very spirit of an earnest worker.

You must say, "Come," because you are

that is the way in which to preach the Gospel. I have no right to preach a sermon which I should be ashamed for Christ to hear. You and I ought so live that if our Lord were to come we should not be afraid, but should just go on doing what we have in hand. We ought to live so that if it were a part of the programme that Christ should come at twelve o'clock, we should finish life beautifully at that very hour, and look at the great Judge, and rejoice to appear before Him. This is the spirit in which to go on saying "Come" to sinners.

Hear the wheels of your Master's chariot behind you; then you will not be dull in preaching the Gospel. Feel that men will soon have to stand before the judgment-seat of Christ; then you will not be cold in your delivery. Expect that very soon you, too, must give in your account before the great white throne, and even think you see it, and see yourself and your hearers standing before it; then will you preach as though you ne'er might preach again, a dying man to dying men; and so the "Come" of prayer will help you when you deliver the "Come" of invitation, and you will be enabled to make full proof of your ministry.

I must add how pleased I was when I was seeing applicants who wished to join the church, to see that God is blessing many of you in the conversion of souls. One or two of the number were converted under my ministry out of some fifteen or sixteen; but the most of them were under your ministries; and one another of my beloved members had brought others to Jesus. I noticed scattered in and about Bermondsey to each of which God had been pleased to give conversions through prayer-meetings, or the preaching of certain younger brethren. I am right glad of that, and I wish we had hundreds of such room and cottage meetings.

This big city of London will never be evangelized by our great assemblies. If all the chapels were filled, which they are not, and if all the churches were filled, which they certainly are not, then a large proportion of the people could not get in. But, alas, they do not come to worship; they will not come. I do not think they understand some of my brethren, for they talk too grandly; some ministers have not learned to talk English, they speak a kind of French-Latin-English; it is not the Saxon English which the people know; and as they do not understand what is preached they do not care to come. The way to get at the masses is to reach them by twos and threes—I am sure of it. Get them into your houses, talk about Jesus Christ in your parlors, in your kitchens, in your bedchambers, in the corners of the streets, anywhere. I am so glad that very many of you do so; go on and prosper. It will not matter whether I live or die if you all become ministers. Would God that all the Lord's servants were prophets. May every one of you live to win souls. "Let him that heareth say, Come." God help you to do it, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

CHRISTIAN BENEFACTORS OF YOUNG MEN.

THE departure from New York on July 16th of fifty-three delegates of the Young Men's Christian Associations of America to attend the International Conference in London has attracted public attention to this department of Christian work. We give this week portraits of the eminent men very closely identified with the Y. M. C. A. of London, both by pecuniary gifts and active personal work, who have arranged to give a hearty welcome to the American delegates.

MR. GEORGE WILLIAMS,

whose name has been honorably connected with the rise and progress of the Young Men's Christian Association, is a native of Somersetshire, England, but at a comparatively early age entered the well-known dry goods house of the late Mr. George Hitchcock, St. Paul's Churchyard, London. It is a house in which the services of a considerable number of young men are required, and having given his own heart to the Saviour, the first and paramount duty which presented itself to Mr. Williams was to adopt some plan which, by God's blessing, might be the means of enabling the thousands of young men employed in the great houses of business to "cleanse their way" amid the temptations and defilements of city life.

At the period at which the Young Men's Christian Association was originated, there were probably about 150,000 young men in London: These were either clerks in banks, counting-houses, or in the offices of professional men, or assistants in the various departments of wholesale and retail trade. Commercial assistants generally lived in the houses of business in which they were employed, and at times, though they commenced work before eight in the morning, the toil of the day did not end till long after midnight. In very few houses was there any sitting-room provided beyond the place of refreshment, and that was not infrequently the kitchen of the servants.

Such may be said to have been the state of matters in houses of business generally when Mr. George Williams started a prayer meeting in Mr. Hitchcock's commercial establishment, and the blessing which rested upon this movement soon became manifest in the conduct and conversation of those who were prevailed on to attend.

The result of meetings of this character was most encouraging, and on June 6, 1844, the resolution was taken to form a "Society for Improving the Spiritual Condition of Young Men engaged in the Drygoods and other Trades." Mr. Williams had the joy of seeing the good seed grow which he had dropped in simple faith and earnest prayer, and soon the meetings were held in a large room in a hotel. This went on from their commencement in 1844 until 1851.

Mr. Williams married the daughter of Mr. George Hitchcock and succeeded to the business of the latter after his death in September, 1863.

Religion, it will readily be believed, was the mainspring of the establishment. In the daily routine of business, young men came to Mr. Hitchcock to seek employment. He saw them all himself, and the business inquiry, "What department?" was invariably followed by the sharp, incisive question, "Do you know Christ?" This question was generally followed by prayer as well as by instruction, and frequently accompanied by the gift of a suitable book. It may be added that his wife and his elder children were brought to religious decision by his personal entreaties.

All the employee's still meet every morning for prayers. The library contains upward of 2000 volumes, all departments of English literature being well represented; it is also furnished with an organ, and not the least interesting treasure in this room is the album, which contains the portraits of many who have been connected with the firm.

In 1851 Mr. Williams went to Paris, to encourage Mr. Cook and his friends to form the "Union Chrètienne," and he has also visited Germany and Holland with the one object before him of forming Young Men's Christian Associations, as so many harbors of refuge to the young men of our great cities, surrounded as they are by temptations and dangers to which so many hundreds if not thousands, annually fall the victims. He has lately given a donation equivalent to $25,000 toward the $125,000 required for the purchase of Exeter Hall, for the Y. M. C. A.

MR. W. HIND SMITH.

Mr. W. Hind Smith, the General Secretary of the London Y. M. C. A., which now has its headquarters at Exeter Hall, was appointed to his present important post in February, 1879. He is fifty-two years of age. Though not as yet so well known in London as in the north, Mr. Smith's energy, urbanity, and high Christian character have already gained for him a wide circle of friends in the metropolis. After many years of most successful labor in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association in Leeds and Manchester, Mr. Smith accepted the cordial invitation of the London Committee to act as co-secretary with Mr. W. Edwyn Shipton, whose feeble health made assistance necessary. On the retirement of Mr. Shipton a few months later, Mr. Smith accepted the entire responsibility of the post thus vacated, and since than has devoted himself to his arduous duties with results which may fairly be described as surprising.

Since his accession to office the membership has greatly increased; the rooms of the branch in Aldersgate Street have presented an improved appearance; the East Central Branch has been opened; and now Exeter Hall has been adapted, as described in our number of May 26th, to the work of the Association. In all these varied operations Mr. Smith has rendered invaluable help, and the supporters of the Association have had their confidence in its usefulness increased by his wise and careful superintendence.

In 1874 Mr. Smith visited the United States as the representative of the British Associations, and received from all classes a warm and kindly reception. His graceful, spiritual, and effective addresses were heartily commended by the press. But Mr. Smith carried back with him what was far more important than any amount of compliment—viz., the results of wide and accurate observation of Y. M. C. A. work in some of its most remarkable developments—observation which has stood him in good stead in his important work in England.

Mr. Smith is an ardent teetotaler, and while not obtruding his views on the temperance question so as to interfere with any other part of the work of the Young Men's Christian Association, he may be relied upon to lose no opportunity of creating a healthy opinion among the young men under his influence on the subject of total abstinence. The efforts of his accomplished and gifted wife in the temperance cause have been very influential among ladies. The Bishop of Manchester referring some time ago at a public meeting to the beneficent labors of Mr. Hind Smith in Manchester, specially adverted to the useful influence of Mrs. Smith also.

MR. T. A. DENNY.

Among the most munificent living supporters of evangelistic work in England, no name is entitled to more respect than that of Mr. T. A. Denny. His manly form and genial face may be seen at almost every great gathering which has for its object the spread of the truth among the masses. Many of his most recent benefactions, as well as much personal labor, have been given to the Salvation Army, of which he is a prominent supporter. He has also taken much interest in the Christian Colportage Society, which held its annual meeting in his drawing-room, at 7 Connaught Place, London W., last month.

When the scheme which Mr. George Williams had the honor of initiating for the purchase of Exeter Hall, was laid before Mr. Denny, after careful consideration he entered heartily into it, and in connection with his brother, Mr. E. M. Denny, at once promised a sum equivalent to $25,000 toward that object.

Urgent in business, fervent in spirit, frank, and brotherly, Mr. Denny is altogether a most favorable specimen of the Christian merchants, who are an honor to the British metropolis, and to the Church.

Liberally as Mr. Denny has supported many worthy movements, he has never attempted to make his large contributions an excuse or a substitute for personal effort in the Lord's vineyard. He is distinctly a Christian worker, and as such his influence is even more valuable than that of the most princely gifts to the best of causes.

GRACE.

A Sermon by Mr. D. L. Moody.

"For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world."—TITUS 2 : 11, 12.

What Grace Is—Who it is For—God's Religion in Four Letters—A Shipwreck and a 'Life-boat—Forty-Two Years Learning three Things—Twenty Years' Unavailing Prayer—It is a Gift—Men will not Believe it—A Great Thing to live Forever—A Welcome to a Vineyard—What it is to Have Christ—Three Terrible Enemies—Already Overcome by Christ—Incident of the Ten-cent Man—A Visit to a London Garret—Wanting a Father's Forgiveness—The Father's Promptitude—A Happy Death in an Attic.

I JUST want to put the way of life as plain as I can, so that, if I don't have the privilege of speaking to you again, and if I don't have the privilege of meeting with you again, you can be saved. And you take salvation right here while I am proclaiming the way.

Now grace means unmerited mercy, undeserved favor. You very often hear people say that they would like to become Christians, but they don't think they are worthy to come. They think that they are too great sinners, and there isn't any chance for them to be saved, because they are great sinners. Now grace is for those who are not worthy. Grace was intended for those that do not deserve mercy. That is the meaning of the word "grace"—unmerited favor—and because man is not worthy of it God offers it to him. The grace of God hath already appeared.

Now, there are a great many men that want to be saved, but they don't want to be SAVED FOR NOTHING.

They want to do something toward salvation.

Now, a man may work as hard as he has a mind to, and he ought to work day and night after he is saved, but he can't work to get salvation. Salvation is the gift of God. It is without money and without price, and one thing that keeps a good many from the kingdom of God is, they are trying to work out their salvation before they get it.

But you may then say, What will you do with that passage where it says: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling?" That is after you have become a child of God. That is written, you will find, to believers. The gift of God is eternal life. When I have salvation I may work it out; but I can't work out what I haven't already got. Now, some one has said that man's religion is in two letters—D-O, D-O. It is do, do, do. You will hear a man all the time talking, if he has some false religion—a religion of his own—you will hear him talking about doing: "Well, if I do as near right as I can, I think I will be saved. I think I do a little better than my neighbors, and I know there are a great many men who don't do as well as I do." It is do, do, all the time.

But God's religion is in four letters, D-O-N-E. It is already wrought out. Salvation is finished, it is complete; and what I have got to do is just to take it, and then I will work. Here is that will perhaps help you to see it. Supposing, instead of this platform being a platform, it is a vessel out at sea, a thousand miles from land. It has sprung a leak, and we have all gone to work with the pumps, and we have been pumping and pumping, and still the water is gaining every minute, and the men are set to work with pails to bucket out the water; but it is doomed. The vessel is going down. It is sinking gradually, but it is a sure wreck. It must go. There isn't anything that can save it; and while we are in just that ruined condition, up comes a life-boat.

The grace of God hath appeared, bringing salvation. That life-boat is salvation to every man on that wreck. The Captain of the life-boat runs his boat right up close to the deck and says, "Jump aboard," and all we have got to do is just to renounce the old vessel, get off of it, and leap on to the life-boat and it is done in an instant. One leap and we are out of the way of the danger of death, and we are in that boat where life and safety are. Now that is a good illustration of how you can be saved, this afternoon. But you may say, "I have got some bad habits." Well, you just bring them to the Lord Jesus. You cannot deliver yourself. He came into the world to deliver us from sin. He came into the world to give us power over sin, and that is His work. I can't deliver myself; if I could I wouldn't need a Saviour.

A man got up in one of our meetings and he said he had been

FORTY-TWO YEARS LEARNING THREE THINGS.

Well, I listened at once; I wanted to know what it took a man forty-two years to learn. He said the first thing was that he couldn't do anything toward his own salvation. It took a man forty-two years to learn that lesson, all the time working in hopes that he could save himself. And the next thing was that God didn't require him to do anything; and the third was that God had done it all. Well, I said to myself, "That is worth knowing, if it did take a man forty-two years to find it out."

Now, mark! the first thing is, you cannot do anything toward your own salvation. You are lost, dead in sin, and if you are dead, what is going to do? It is Christ, and Christ alone, that must give life. You cannot make yourself alive, if you are dead. God is the author of life, and He is the only one who can quicken a dead soul. All the philosophers in the world can't give life to a little fly, not even to the smallest insect. They haven't that power. They may go on and discuss about life and the origin of life, and they may spend months and years doing that, but they cannot give life. Jesus Christ is the author of life, and He gives life. He quickens the dead. So you cannot do anything toward saving yourself. Give is all up. Get done trying to save yourself and just believe what God says, that you are lost, and that you haven't any power in yourself to save.

Then another mistake that people make is, they are thinking that they have got to do something to merit salvation; they have got to do something to put themselves in favor with God; they have got to do something to commend themselves to God. A man told me since I have been in this city that he had been twenty years praying every night that the Lord would save him.

"Well," I said, "how are you getting on? Are you saved?" "No; I don't think I am any nearer it now than I was when I commenced. Twenty long years I have been praying every night that God would save me." And in talking with that man I found that he had not been willing to turn from one sin. It was downright mockery to get down on his knees and ask God to save him, and just get right up and go on in sin, living as he had lived. "Let the wicked forsake his way and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him turn unto God, and He will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon." There is grace for you. There is plenty of grace. But a man when he comes to God and asks Him for salvation, asks God to save him, he must be willing to turn away from his sins. But the moment a man is willing to turn away from his sins, he hasn't got to ask for salvation. Did you know that? You can't find a place in Scripture where a man is ready and willing to turn from his sins, that he is told to ask for salvation. Why, what is he to do? Just take it. The moment a man has got that far, that he is willing to give up his sins and to turn his back upon his past record, and to give up his past life and turn to God that moment he can take salvation without asking. God offers it to him.

Now the grace of God hath appeared, bringing salvation to all men, every one, and what are you going to do? Why, receive it or reject it. You must do one thing or the other. He came unto His own, that is the Jews, and they wouldn't have Him. They rejected Him. He came to His own and His own received Him not. Now, mark you, it is a person. It is not a doctrine; it is not a creed; it is not a dogma, but a person. "He came unto His own but His own received Him not, but as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name." Now, if you are ready and willing to receive the grace of God into your heart, then He will give you power over sin; then He will give you the victory—that is the power. People are struggling and trying to get the power and trying to make life, and trying to make themselves Christians and they fail, utterly fail, all the while. Give it all up. Take Christ as your salvation, and then you can say as the Psalmist did, "Behold God has become my salvation." God will be your salvation. I put my trust in Him, not in myself. I don't doubt Him any more, but I doubt myself, and you can afford to do that a good deal better than to doubt Him.

I have stood here and preached, and a good many of you have sat there and looked at me just as if it was not true. And when the grace of God is offered to an audience like this not one quarter of you believe it is a gift. We talk about it, but it seems like an idle tale.

YOU DON'T BELIEVE IT is the gift of God. If you really believed that you could get eternal life here to-night for nothing, all you have got to do is just to take it, do you think there would be a man go out of this house without it? It is a great thing to live forever. It is a great thing to live in the presence of God forever and to live in a land "where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest"—to live in the presence of Jehovah as eternal ages roll on. There is nothing to be compared with eternal life.

Would you compare wealth with it? Pile up wealth; put $100,000—yea, a million—on that table to-night. You can look at a million of dollars, and if you could just put eternal life right beside it, and you could see eternal life, and you could have your choice, do you think there is a man in this house to-day that would come forward and take that million of dollars and turn his back on the gift of God—turn his back on eternal life? There is not a solitary man in this house that would do it. You know very well that you wouldn't do it. There are men hanging around these meetings, and they don't care anything about the Gospel that we are offering them, because they don't believe it is what we claim it to be. They don't believe it is really eternal life. When men seek for the kingdom of God with all their hearts, when they are ready and willing to take it into their hearts, when they are ready to have eternal life, then it is theirs. But you don't believe.

A few years ago I was the guest of a friend, he took me to his orchard and his vineyard, and he says, "Mr. Moody, while you are my guest I want you to make yourself perfectly at home, and if you see anything in this orchard or vineyard that you want, help yourself." Well, I didn't go out and get under the orange trees and pray that the oranges might tumble into my arms. My friend had said you can take whatever you want, and so I took him at his word, and I went up to the tree and plucked the fruit, and took the oranges that he had offered and ate them. Well, here is eternal life that is offered to us to-day. God offers it, "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life." Who will have the gift? Who will take the gift? That is the question, and that is for you to settle.

Let me just read a few verses right upon that very point in John's first epistle, fifth chapter, ninth verse:

"If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God which He hath testified of His Son. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God, hath made Him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of His Son. And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in His Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life."

Have you got the Son? That is the question. Have you got the Son? But perhaps you say, I am a member of the church. Well, that is very good in its place, but that is not having the Son. A man may be a member of a church and not have Christ. A man may have joined some church and not joined Christ. "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life." You can't get life away from the Son. It is impossible. He is the author of life.

And then again these men that are trembling and are afraid if they become Christians they cannot get the victory over sin. I will tell you why. They have tried and failed because they tried in their own strength. As long as you do this you will fail. You will fail if you try in your own strength even though you live to be as old as Methuselah. You can keep on trying, but you will fail all the while. If you could get the victory over sin in your own strength Christ need not to have come. God made a mistake in sending Christ if man could get the victory over sin. But when we were without strength, in due time Christ died; and man will have the power when he takes Christ; then he gets the victory.

(To be concluded.)

TOUCHES OF REAL LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Lady Hope, of Cariden.

The General Meeting at the Coffee Room—Mr. Hamilton's Speech—The Hearty Response—The Rector's Visit—Aleth's Welcome—King Hal makes a Speech—Ferdinand Marshall's Testimony—Michael Suggests a Warning Sign—Hutton's Practical Invitation—Mr. Harcourt's Encouragement.

THEN there came an evening when a general meeting was summoned. Mr. Hamilton and Lady Isabel had come by train from Lionel Court, bringing with them a large number of their Thornham men. It was "a treat," in fact, and jointly served that purpose to both towns. After a united rendering from the volunteer choir of a simple and favorite hymn, in its different parts, Mr. Clemence stood up on the low platform and said:

"I am a working man!"

This sentence was provocative of great and prolonged applause. He had evidently hit the right nail on the head.

He then proceeded to say that their Rector, Mr. Habershon, would be with them in a very few minutes. But the real object in their meeting to-night was to hear testimonies from working men. Therefore he would merely contribute as his share in that testimony, the fact that in heat and cold, travelling and at home, in different countries, amidst very varied companionship, and in all sorts of circumstances, he had been enabled to abstain from alcoholic liquors; and had never suffered thereby, nor had he ever known men suffer by a close adherence to such principles. There were public-houses enough in Shenstone. Now a new kind of public-house had been opened, and it wanted their support. Would they give it? (Shouts of, "Yes! yes! that we will.") Then, there were to be plenty of Bible-classes and prayer-meetings, which he looked to his audience to uphold.

In the midst of the enthusiasm the door opened, and Mr. Habershon appeared. With him was Aleth, the people's darling, dressed in her simple white frock and colored sash, her little pale blue velvet hat scarcely concealing the radiant face, sparkling eyes, and rippling golden tresses that fell in profusion about her shoulders. No event could have produced greater joy than this. The emotion was intense. Every one knew everything in Shenstone. There was scarcely a dry eye among the audience, as Mr. Habershon, holding his child by the hand, said:

"I am sure you will unite with me in thanking God for the restoration of my child, and at the same time unite with me in asking His blessing upon these rooms, the rebuilding of which has been the day-dream of my darling's heart during her long illness."

"Pretty dear!" said old Michael out loud.

And then, weeping as they were at the glad yet touching sight, the kind sympathy of their Rector, and the general sense of love and tenderness with brightness that pervaded their meeting, the whole crowd silently rose to their feet. It was their welcome to Aleth. The act touched her father's heart.

Raising his hand he said, "Let us pray!" In a few words praise and petition were offered.

After the hearty "Amen" that testified to a very real reciprocity of feeling had been uttered, Aleth took her seat by her father. Though it was her very first appearance in public—if this quiet room so near her own home could be called "public!"—she seemed quite at her ease. She recognized many faces that she knew in the meeting, and nodded and smiled at them. Little did the child know that, by her loving joyous glances, she was fast snapping many of the Evil One's chains that night.

How could those strong men drink and swear again? How could they curse the God that made them, the Christ that redeemed them? They had seen "an angel!" They had seen an element of loveliness, of purity, to which they had been strangers before.

So Sykes said on his way home that night.

"I say! we ought to be good here, with that little angel a-caring for us all like that! and Miss Fennecker—bless her!—and all the rest of 'm. There ain't no excuse for us now."

It was an interesting hour, and passed only too quickly.

Some of the speeches of the Thornham men might be worth listening to. They certainly afforded great satisfaction to their hearers.

Hal was the first to stand up.

"My name is Henry King," he said. "I ain't ashamed of it. Time was—not so very long ago neither—when I thought I was a-going down hill in right good earnest, I did. What they call the sliding-scale. Them public-houses nearly did for me, my friends. The landlord would come out a-rubbing his wily hands together, and say, 'Fine day, Mr. Hal! and how's your young 'un?' and all the rest of it. Soft sawder, you know, that kind of thing. But he very nearly turned me into a drunkard. Take one glass of that deadly stuff, and there's no saying what you'll come to.

"Then her ladyship here, and Mr. Albert Eldridge, our master's son, they both began a-talking to me. I began coming into the coffee-rooms, and I liked them, and I brought ever so many more with me, and they brought ever so many more. And so we went on, and now we have a goodly lot that comes regular. Our lady can tell you some of us wasn't very good. Here's old Ferdy. He can say a thing or two to you."

Whereupon Ferdinand Marshall stood up and said:

"I was very bad—very bad. It do make me a most ashamed to think of it." So saying, he looked bashful, and confused, and hung down his head. A cheer encouraged him, however, and he continued:

"They used to call me 'Drunken Ferd;' now they call me 'Mr. Marshall.' But that's not all. I was a pauper! Yes! a strong man like me!" (And here he straightened himself up, and broadened out his shoulders, and swung his brawny arm. Little Aleth gazed upon him admiringly.) "But I had a trouble." Here his voice was choked. . . "I brought it on myself. . . . I went a deal to a public, they call it 'The Man in Mischief.' I think that there signboard was a likeness of me! I've often thought so. I was the 'man in mischief,' and there was a good many more like me too!" . . . Again he was stopped. "Well, I can't tell you about it. It was something I did very nigh to murderin'."

His face looked so ghastly as he said this, and such a tremor shook his powerful frame, that the audience shuddered. But all eyes were tently fixed upon him, so he went on.

"Then I went to God. I had a little chil I've got her now—" and he smiled. "She ringed me to Him. And I told Him I was a eadful sinner—dreadful, down-right bad—cr l, and drunken, and wicked. And He did forgive me. Then my friend here, Job Wilks—he says I won't speak, and he never do, so I shall have to tell on him—he was a father to me—and Hal, he was like a brother, and so I came round. And here's a great deal more about it, but I can't spea proper, so I'll sit down.'

And he collapsed into his seat. But his broken, untutored utterances had done their wor; yes! and a very mighty work. It had been more efficient with those working men than a hundred sermons from the best of pulpits could ever have been.

Old Michael Bateman then stood up, and he said: "Our friend, Mr. Marshall, has told you about the place that did him a lot of harm, and made him miserable. I'll tell you what I think is the real, true name that should be put upon the signboard of every one of them great flaring gin-palaces:

"'Through me ye enter the abodes of woe;
Through me to endless ruin ye are brought;
Through me among the souls accurst ye go:
All hope abandon ye who enter here.'"

"It was writ on a bit of paper I got give me once as I was going along the street by some of them open gin-shops. And ye see I've never lost it. I've got it now. And it's true, for I know it.

"I didn't care for nothing but pleasure and mirth once; but now I love the Lord. He died instead of me, and I love Him for it! I praise Him every day. I thank Him, and I be very happy. I wish you was all in the same box along with us. We are not very rich, but we 'possess all things.' We have got the smile of Jesus resting upon us, and we have nothing to fear. He takes away bad habits and gives us good ones. He answers our prayers too. We asked Him to build up our shed [illegible] and here it is! See what a beauty! Our poor old place warn't a bit like this—and to see the Rector here, and Miss Aleth, and Miss Fennecker, and the lady and gentleman from that 'ere white House, and all—it's a' most too much for one, it is!"

Michael here found it necessary to blow his nose very lustily, and then he was fortified for his conclusion, which consisted in a very simple, forcible appeal.

"Won't you come 'long with us?" he said

"Won't you, now? You won't be sorry by and by. Come one and all, and get your names written in the Lamb's Book of Life. There's no blots and scratchings out there. Once on that list, ye're on for ever! Will ye come, and be on the right side? Ye will!" he was saying very emphatically, when a sudden, spontaneous response from the meeting,

"We will!" effectually, from its unexpectedness, put an end to old Mike's further eloquence, and he disappeared into his chair.

Then Mr. Hutton was brought forward, but his only remark was:

"I'll try to make you good coffee, and I hope you'll all come. And don't forget there's a prayer-meeting in the screened room on Mondays, Tuesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, and Miss Fennecker will read the Bible with us on a Thursday evening. There'll be lots of singing every Wednesday and Saturday, and anybody can join in. And mind you come on Sunday, and there'll be some ladies and gentlemen here for a meetin'. You will find all on the bills outside."

Having presented the "advertisement sheet" of the proceedings in a very practical manner, Hutton concluded by saying:

"At the bar, come and order whatever you want. We'll do our very best."

Of course the men cheered him, but their applause was deafening when the Vicar said, smilingly

"I indorse these invitations."

And Etta begged that they would pay many an evening visit to the Coffee-house, where she would often hope to meet them.

Mr. Edgar Harcourt wound up the proceedings quoting the all-precious verse of Hebrews 12: "Looking unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher our faith;" saying, as his brief comment

"If you LOOK UP, you cannot stumble;
If you LOOK ON, you will not faint;
If you LOOK ROUND, you must Work!"

THE END.

A NEW SERIAL STORY, by Hesba Stretn, will be commenced in the next Number of HE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and continued om week to week.

THE RED SEA.

S. Lesson for August 14. Exod. 14: 15-31. Golden Text, ver. 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WITH all the tender consideration of a Father His weak and helpless children, God did not ow the Israelites to come into a position of danr at the Red Sea without warning them beforend. There was everything to strengthen their th. They had the experience of God's deliverce on the Passover night, they had God's solm promise that He would bring them into a land wing with milk and honey, they had the visible esence of God with them: "And the Lord went fore them by day in a pillar of a cloud, to lead m the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to e them light; to go by day and night. He took away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the lar of fire by night, from before the people." ey had the bones of Joseph, which he had comnded some centuries before should be carried up o Canaan when God visited His people; and w God sent Moses to tell them beforehand that araoh should follow after them; but He added, will be honored upon Pharaoh and upon all his st; that the Egyptians may know that I am the rd."

And yet, so accustomed were they to judge acding to the sight of their eyes and the hearing their ears (Isa. 11: 3) that "when Pharaoh drew h, the children of Israel lifted up their eyes, d, behold, the Egyptians marched after them; d they were sore afraid: and the children of ael cried out unto the Lord." "Sore afraid." hough God was with them, and although He had pared them for what was happening? O how at injustice does our fear do to God! It is as ough He were not to be relied on, as though He ght fail us after all. Did the children of Israel pect that He who had done such great things them was about to desert them after all? O en shall we learn that God allows us to come o positions of the greatest difficulty in order that r faith may have exercise, and that He may so iver us that an unbelieving world must be ought to acknowledge that God is with us of a th?

The people gave way to despondency, and they oke not unto the Lord but unto Moses. When look at circumstances instead of looking to the ord of God, we are more ready to speak to man n to God, we are breathing the air of earth and t the air of heaven. Once put the circumstances rly into God's hands we are back in our native on the pathway of faith, where despondency s no foothold, and where we have to do with the mighty. The Israelites saw nothing before them t death, and blamed Moses for bringing them t into the wilderness to die; they thought it uld have been preferable to die in Egypt, and y for whose sake so many and great deliverces had been wrought, said, "Let us alone that may serve the Egyptians."

And God did not lose patience, and Moses did lose patience. Moses only said, "Fear ye not, d still, and see the salvation of the Lord, ch He will show to you to-day: for the Egyps whom ye have seen to-day, ye shall see n again no more forever. The Lord shall t for you, and ye shall hold your peace." God undertaken the cause of His people. Reader, He undertaken yours? Is the anxiety which haps presses this very day upon you, and from ch you see no way of escape, is it a cause ch you really and actually transfer from your hands to God's? Is the battle with temptation which is assailing you, and which seems, like the pursuing Egyptians, to drive you into the very sea of despair, is it solemnly and really made God's battle, by your faith which has committed it to Him? Then your part is to "fear not," whatever may happen, but believe that God will surely fulfil His Word and deliver you; and to "stand still," using no effort of your own, not trying to help God, but waiting in confident expectation until He delivers.

What could have seemed more improbable than that deliverance could come to the children of Israel; the sea a mighty barrier to their further progress, the Egyptians eager for their blood, cutting off all retreat, and on either side rocky cliffs which hemmed them in! And just while in this position there came the word of command from their great Leader to Moses, "Wherefore criest thou unto Me? speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward." Forward? but the sea is there! Yes, forward, for God is there! He told Moses what He was about to do, and in token thereof "the Angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them: and it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel; and it was a cloud and darkness to them [the Egyptians], but it gave light by night to these; so that the one came not near the other all the night." God between us and our foes, between us and our danger, this is true safety, and thus it is with all them that put their trust in Him.

And the people went forward; but the sea which they had feared was made by the hand of God to be a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left. God can create, and He can transform, and often that which is the greatest obstacle in our progress heavenward is transformed by His providence into a wall of defence for us; and where we see no way, He makes one for us, either like that of the Israelites through the water, or like that of Peter upon the water. O let us take for granted once for all that difficulties are not really against us, that God maketh all things to "work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8: 28). The irritable disposition of some one with whom we have to do, which may strain our patience to the utmost, is nevertheless a proof to us whether we live or Christ lives in us, and it may bring us to reality in our experience. If we suffer wrong at the hands of one whom we have benefitted, we have the best of opportunities for discovering whether we have really renounced our own rights, and are living as crucified and buried. If we pass through these difficulties as Christ would have done, they are a wall between us and our great foe, who will not forget where he has been conquered.

But what about the enemies of Israel? In their impious rage against God and against His people, they followed into the midst of the sea. The morning broke, and the presence of God, which shielded Israel, became a trouble to Israel's enemies. God's look upon them was more than they could bear, the wheels of their chariots refused to turn, and they began to be conscious that they had gone too far. "Let us flee," they said, "from the face of Israel; for the Lord fighteth for them against the Egyptians." But there was no way of return. The children of Israel went on, still on dry ground in the midst of the sea; but behind them the walls of water gave way, and the Egyptians who had dared the wrath of Israel's God became a prey to the mighty flood, and when God's people gained the farther shore there were their enemies "dead upon the seashore." Thus God delivered, and thus God delivers now those who unreservedly put their trust in Him.

"And Israel saw that great work which the Lord did upon the Egyptians: and the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord and His servant Moses." Confidence was restored again, all distrust was swept away from their hearts at this time; they seemed to understand God, and to rely fully upon Him, and, it could not be otherwise, their hearts broke forth in praise. It is as natural to a child of God to sing as it is to a bird or to a little child when there is no burden pressing upon him. When God delivered David from the horrible pit and from the miry clay, He put a new song into his mouth, even praise unto our God (Ps. 40. 1–3). When God had answered his prayers he said, "Blessed be the Lord, because He hath heard the voice of my supplications. The Lord is my strength and my shield; my heart trusted in Him, and I am helped; therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth: and with my song will I praise Him" (Ps. 28: 6, 7). It would seem as though in the fulness of his heart Moses poured forth his song and the people took it up, and then Miriam the prophetess, Aaron's sister, set it to music, and formed a choir of female voices who sung with timbrels and dances.

And the song was all about the Lord: "I will sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously. . . . The Lord is my strength and song, and He is become my salvation. . . . The Lord is a Man of war; the Lord is His name. . . . Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power: thy right hand, O Lord, hath dashed in pieces the enemy. . . . Who is like unto Thee, O Lord, among the gods? who is like Thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? . . . The Lord shall reign forever and ever." This is real adoration. We may sing of our experience, as we so often do in revival meetings, and strongly accent what Jesus has done for me, but let us not forget the higher form of praise, the adoring God for what He is in Himself, that we may learn by and by to mingle our praises with those who cry, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty."

A Wife Deserter was Approaching the Open door of a glaring gin palace in London, one Sunday evening, early in the present year. Mr. W. Chorley, of the Gospel Missions, stood in the middle of a short by-street, with a little carriage, upon which was an harmonium. Mr. Chorley, with a Bible in his hand, was giving a brief address, and concluded with an invitation to attend a service in the neighboring Gospel Hall. The man, who was about to enter the gin palace, stood and listened, and after a considerable struggle with himself, resolved to attend the meeting. At the close of the service he was spoken to by Christian friends. He told them he had caused one poor woman, his first wife, to commit suicide, while his present wife had, with a young babe, to fly from his house, and had returned to her parents. He had come to London from the country, and was leaving on the following Tuesday for Liverpool en route for America. However, he did not go. The Word of God had reached his heart. He stayed over another Sunday to go to the hall again, when a visit to Mr. Chorley's house was arranged. To-day that man with his wife are living lovingly together, and are, we trust, subjects of grace.

Mr. Inskip Writes Thus of Ballarat, One of the places where the "round the world" evangelists labored during their Australian tour: "It is almost incredible that thirty years ago a dense forest covered the site now occupied by the 'Garden City of Victoria.' The name 'Ballarat' signifies a resting place or camping ground. It contains a population of about 40,000, and is one of the most healthy localities in the whole country. The yield of gold for the last twenty years from the famous mine known as 'Band and Albion Consols,' has been about 600,000 ounces, worth about $12,000,000—over half a million annually—and the dividends paid have aggregated nearly $5,000,000. The town extends north and south about five miles in a direct line, east and west about four-and-a-half miles, being one continuous line of buildings, covering 9500 acres, containing 90 miles of well made streets, 10,000 residences, 56 churches, 500 hotels (drinking places) and 20 state schools, with from 300 to 1000 scholars in each, besides colleges and private educational establishments of a high order. Underground are 90 miles of water pipes and 60 miles of gas pipes."

It is gratifying to know that the evangelists were very cordially received in this young and flourishing city, and that more than 500 persons were converted during their eight days' services there.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Irish Land Bill was Read in the British House of Lords on July 29th, for the first time. The hope is indulged that the bill will pass, in substantially the same shape as that in which it left the Commons. That it is popular in the Upper House no one pretends to believe, and it is certain that many of the Peers, prominent among whom is the Duke of Argyll, regard its provisions as little short of confiscation. It is, however, manifest to all that some measure for the relief of the Irish tenants must be enacted, or there will be a revolution in Ireland. The Lords concede so much, and then the merits of this particular bill have to be considered. It would be possible to moderate some of its more radical clauses in the committee, so as to render the concession to the people smaller than that granted under the bill. This course would involve a collision with the House of Commons and would increase the hostility which already exists among the Radical section of the people against the House of Lords. It is therefore anticipated that although the Lords will probably denounce the measure in strong terms, they will end in voting for it as the less of two evils.

The Scene in the House of Commons when the debates on the Land Bill were finally concluded and the last division taken, is described as unprecedented in the history of Parliament. On entering the House from the division lobby Mr. Gladstone received an enthusiastic ovation from the liberals and from a portion of the Irish members. For several minutes after he had resumed his seat the House rang with cheers, repeated again and again. When the result of the division was announced the House again broke into loud cheers, many members in their excitement standing up and waving their hats while giving vent to their feeling of satisfaction. A moment later there was a general rush of members from the House, and as they departed cheering, the House presented the appearance of a school breaking up for the holidays. It is worthy of note that Mr. Parnell, the man who pretends to be the friend of the Irish people, did not vote for the bill which is enacted for their relief. He was probably aware that this radical measure promises to alleviate some of the most pressing grievances of Ireland, and in so doing will render the position of agitator in chief less lucrative than it has been.

The First Meeting of the Ninth Triennial International Conference of the Young Men's Christian Associations met in Exeter Hall, London, on Saturday, July 30th. At 2:30 o'clock a meeting of the World's Committee, consisting of one delegate from each country represented in the Alliance, was held. In the evening there was a welcome meeting, Mr. George Williams, the founder of the associations, presiding. Responses to addresses of welcome were made by Mr. John Wanamaker, President of the Philadelphia association; Rev. Theodore Cuyler, Mr. Carey Thomas, of Baltimore, and Rev. Mr. Cook, of Paris. The meeting was followed by a dinner and a devotional meeting. About five hundred delegates are in attendance, representing the associations of the United States, the Dominion of Canada, Great Britain, France, Switzerland, Germany, and other countries.

Considerable Uneasiness has Been Produced by the discovery of ten destructive machines on board two steamers, which recently arrived at Liverpool from America. On the arrival of the Cunard steamer Malta, she was boarded by officers of the British Government, who were instructed to search the vessel for explosives. They found a barrel purporting to contain cement, but which, when opened, was found to contain six zinc boxes in which were machines prepared with dynamite, each one fitted with a clockwork arrangement. This being set, would run about six hours; then it would cause a lever to descend upon a tube bearing a cap and communicating with the lower half of the case, filled with the dynamite compound. A few days afterward a barrel containing four more machines was found on board the Bavarian. It is stated that in some the barrels billheads bearing O'Donovan Rossa's name were found.

Sir William Harcourt, the Home Secretary, informed the House of Commons that the cartridges in the cases were each charged with nitro-glycerine and a compound of the nature of and similar to gun cotton. One of the supposed cement barrels had in all fourteen pounds of this dangerous explosive material in it, and he said it was impossible to estimate the fatal effects of even an accidental concussion upon such a mass. They were probably intended for use against public buildings in England, but they might have exploded on the passage, in which case the vessel carrying them must have been destroyed.

Unanimity Among the European Powers on the subject of Turkey and Greece is said to be maintained. Mr. Goschen, who was sent to Constantinople as the representative of England during the crisis, has returned. In a speech recently delivered, he testified to the cordial co-operation of the six ambassadors of the Powers in settling the Greek question. He declared emphatically that he saw no deviation from a straight course on the part of Russia, who was so much suspected, and that no Power had been more prudent than Austria, no Power so anxious to prevent a cannon shot from being fired in the Balkan Peninsula, and no Power more anxious to prevent any complication in the East, or any encroachment on the Turkish Empire beyond the decisions of the Berlin Congress. He declared that no Power retained so much real influence at Constantinople as England, because Turkey believed England had no designs upon her.

The Pretender to the Spanish Crown, Don Carlos, who since his cousin Alfonso became King of Spain has resided in Paris, has been requested by the President of the French Republic to quit the country. He left Paris on July 18th for London, his wife remaining to attend to the education of the children. The expulsion of the Pretender at this particular juncture has caused general astonishment. Possibly it may be accounted for by the politic desire of the French Government to remain on good terms with Spain.

The Czar of Russia has at Length Emerged from his seclusion. He left St. Petersburg on July 29th for Moscow. Four hundred police were sent before him as a precaution, and troops were stationed all along the line between Moscow and St. Petersburg, a distance of about four hundred miles. The Czar and the Empress received an enthusiastic welcome. On reaching the city they proceeded on foot from the palace to the Cathedral, an immense crowd cheering them lustily all the way. The visit to the Cathedral was followed by a reception at the Kremlin.

Fresh plots to assassinate the Czar have been discovered, and it is evident that he is continually in imminent danger of a violent death. The German Government recently informed the Russian Government that another plot to assassinate the Emperor was known to be on foot among the officers of his household, and reminded Russia that Germany had vainly given a similar warning just before the explosion in the Winter Palace.

The Turkish Pashas Found Guilty of Complicity in the murder of the late Sultan embarked on Monday, July 25th, for El Hedjaz, in Arabia, where they will remain in exile for life. Much embarrassment was felt concerning a place of exile for Midhat Pasha and the other State prisoners, as most of the governors of provinces objected to the prisoners being sent into their districts. It is reported that Midhat Pasha will be confined on an island and apart from the others.

Intelligence from Afghanistan Proves that the settlement of the affairs of that country which was made when the British troops were withdrawn is not likely to be permanent. Abdurrhaman, the Ameer, has been defeated in a pitched battle by his rival to the throne, Ayoob Khan. A telegram from Bombay says: "A battle was fought on July 27th, between the Ameer and Ayoob Khan, during which one of the Ameer's regiments deserted and went over to the enemy. Thereupon the remainder of the Ameer's troops fled, leaving eighteen guns and all their baggage on he field." The London correspondent of the World cables as follows: "The new turn of affairs in Afghanistan causes some anxiety to the British Government and is held to confirm the opinions of the Cons atives concerning the imprudence of the policy sued by the Ministry in India. The Ameer, received enormous subsidies in money and m tions of war from the British Government, is capsized, and it is doubtful whether the Anglo dian force in the Candahar country is safe. A Khan is looked upon as the special agent of sia, and undoubtedly all his influence will be thr in favor of the designs of the Czar in that pa Asia."

Bou-Amena, the Fanatical Leader of Arabs who menaced Tunis, has according to re reports shown signs of submission. A Tunis spatch to the London Times says: "A teleg from Mascara states that Chief Bou-Amena sent two guns and a horse as a token that h ready to treat for peace. The telegram states Bou-Amena's prestige is falling off, and that natives assert that after an incursion into Mor he will return home for good. Reports from giers, however, indicate that a dangerous fana spirit is evident among the Arabs. The colo fear a rising, and ask for arms and permissio form a local corps, but the governor opposes the That the Europeans are not without cause alarm is evident from the fact that only a few ago four Europeans and three Arabs were mur ed on the road to Tunis. There was great ex ment. The alarm was so great that many o shops were closed.

The Persecution of the Jews has Bro out afresh in Germany. A dispatch from B says: "There are demonstrations every against the Jews at Hammerstein, West Pru and further excesses are feared. The gendar are powerless. There were similar riots at Baerw Pomerania, on Tuesday, July 26, when a quar of Jewish property was destroyed. Thirty no belonging to Jews at the villages of Borispol Birizen, in the government of Poltava, have destroyed. The troops fired upon the rio four of whom were killed and two wounded.

The Position Occupied by Great Britai reference to the opium traffic, is defined by Viceroy of China in a letter written to the s tary of the Society for the Suppression of Opium Trade, who, acting on the suggestio Colonel Gordon, some time ago wrote to the V roy of China, explaining the society's views or traffic. The Viceroy, in reply, says: "Opiu a subject on which England and China can n meet on common ground. China views the w question from a moral, and England from a standpoint. The Chinese government is impre with the necessity of making strenuous effor control the flood of opium before it overwhelm whole country. The new treaty with Am containing a prohibitory clause, encourages th lief that broad principles of justice and feelin humanity will prevail in the future relation China with the western nations."

THE Word of God specially intimates regarding several devout persons of the olden time that they occupied influential positions in society. Such persons were Job, Joseph, Daniel, Obadiah (the governor of Ahab's house), Nehemiah, Paul, Joseph of Arimathea, Cornelius, Dionysius the Areopagite, Publius, the Shunammite woman, and certain women of Thessalonica and Berea mentioned in Acts 17 : 4 and 12. Now although the Lord Jesus took His birth in humility and obscurity, and although the possession of this world's riches and honors is ever attended with danger to the soul, still these cases show us that a position of influence is a valuable opportunity to be used for the glory of God. So that while we are taught that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God, we are also given the example of the servant to whom five talents were intrusted, and to whom it was afterward said, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things; I will make thee ruler over many things."

Our portrait to-day represents one of the foremost men in the United States, and the object of this article will be to show that in every position he has occupied he has used his influence openly and consistently for the glory of God.

Alfred Holt Colquitt comes from an

his grandfather, Henry Colquitt, having left that State and settled in Georgia in the first year of the present century. His father, Walter T. Colquitt, the most eminent lawyer and judge the State of Georgia has produced, was a signal example of a wicked and godless man changed by conversion into a bright and faithful Christian. His mother, a Miss Lane, also a Virginian, and belonging to one of the first English families that settled in Virginia, was another of the many remarkable women that have been the mothers of distinguished men.

This lady was the means of her husband's conversion, and he openly honored her for it during the many years that he lived a great and a good man. For, in the days of his dissipation, when he used to come home long after midnight, he never failed to find his wife waiting for him and ready to give him a pleasant welcome. But one night he reached home later and more turbulent than usual and found his wife still waiting, and if possible more cheerful and kind than usual; and he broke down, saying to himself that it was "a shame before God and man to treat any woman as he treated his wife." He was a man of a violent and combative disposition, whose boast it was that he had "whipped," in fight or in argument, every man to whom he had ever been opposed; and he acted with his customary courage in confessing his new resolve. He went the very next day to one after another of his boon companions and said to them, "Look here: you are my friend; but you will not be that very long if you ask me to drink or gamble or go to a cock-fight with you again." Thus the patient and faithful wife had "saved her husband" (1 Cor. 7 : 16), and she saw him grow up into as grand a man morally as he was physically and intellectually, testifying of the grace of God, and going out to preach the Gospel in the evenings after his day's work was over.

The son, the present Governor, received his elementary education under private tuition, and his associates of that time speak of him as one who was singularly free from the vulgar vices of most boys, and who showed a rare conscientiousness in fulfilling punctually whatever duty there was laid upon him. He was converted while a school-boy in the beautiful little city of La Grange, Ga., which contained a population of cultured Christian people, and was, as it still is, famous for good schools. There Governor Colquitt embraced religion and joined the Methodist Church; and from that early beginning he has continued in all his private and public life a consistent Christian. Called very young to public life, and kept in circumstances of exposure till now, he has pursued the path of the just and has been watched over by Providence.

Soon after his conversion he was sent to Princeton College, N. J., where he maintained his religious character, and where he graduated in 1844. Professor Walling, President of Columbia College at Washington, and the Rev. Dr. Schenck, were his classmates. After his graduation he studied his father's profession at Columbus, Ga., and being admitted to the bar in 1845, began practice at Macon.

Two years later the brief war with Mexico, arising out of the incorporation of Texas in the Union, broke out, and Mr. Colquitt was appointed paymaster to the United States forces, and staff-major, and was present at more than one engagement. In 1848, having returned to his professional practice at Macon, he married the daughter of General H. H. Tarver.

In 1852 he was elected to Congress from the Second Congressional District, and was again unanimously nominated in 1854, but declined the nomination. In 1856 he was chosen a delegate to the National Democratic Convention, and also attended that of 1860 at Baltimore. He had by that time engaged in cotton-planting, and had become one of the wealthiest planters in Georgia. A great bereavement had likewise befallen him in the death of his wife.

Governor Colquitt's career as

is thus sketched in "Representative Men of the South": "When the war broke out, he entered the Confederate army as Captain of the Sixth Georgia, and was afterward elected its colonel. He was present with his command at Yorktown, Va., and participated in all the battles of the Seven Days' Fight around Richmond, during which he was made Acting Brigadier-General in command of General Rains' brigade. He took part in the first campaign into Maryland, and was ordered to reinforce General J. E. B. Stuart, then at South Mountain, near Boonsboro. General McClellan was at that time making his move through Frederic toward Antietam, and his presence at that point was so unexpected by the Confederates that Stuart had left when the Federal forces came up.

"The first notice of the approach of McLellan's army was conveyed to General Lee by General Colquitt, and with one brigade of infantry and a battery of artillery he confronted for twenty-four hours the Federal forces as they came up by detachments, until the Confederate army could be brought up. At the sanguinary battle of Sharpsburg which followed, he had his horse shot under him, and after the battle was made Brigadier-General. He was engaged in all the battles of the Army of Northern Virginia, until the commencement of the Pennsylvania campaign, when he was ordered to Charleston. In one of the fights at battery Wagner he had a narrow escape from being shot, the ball passing through the crown of his hat.

"In Florida, at the battle of Olustee, or Ocean Pond, he distinguished himself greatly, and by his successful generalship completely defeated the Federals, and thus terminated their occupation of that part of the country and saved Florida and the lower part of Georgia from devastation. His gallantry in that memorable fight obtained for him the title of 'The Hero of Olustee.' He seemed to bear almost a charmed life,* as he rode on his white horse, a conspicuous object for the enemy's fire, and a Federal officer afterward stated that the soldiers' attention was specially directed to him, and that whole platoons fired at him at a time. He escaped unhurt, however, although his horse was wounded.

"Returning to Virginia with General Beauregard, with whom he was a great favorite, he commanded a division at Drewry's Bluff. When General Grant transferred his forces from the north to the south bank of the James River, with the view of investing Petersburg, General Colquitt's troops, with those of General Hagood, of South Carolina, were hastily moved to protect that city. The two generals in their reconnaissance found no organized Confederate force between the city and General Grant's advanced guard, and at night, without any knowledge of the surrounding country, seated in a ditch to escape observation, they, with the assistance of an old map and by the light of a candle, laid down the lines of defence and stationed their troops, Colquitt on the right and Hagood on the left. These afterward became the permanent lines of fortification around the city, and that point became a noted position, and was known as 'Colquitt's Salient.'"

Many incidents are remembered of General Colquitt's behavior during those awful and trying times, when men's characters were tested and their inner nature exposed. During the bombardment of Charleston by the Federal ships of war, James Island, in the harbor, was fortified by the Confederates for the defence of the city. The exchange of fire was kept up for many days and nights, and the command of the island was held week about by General Geo. P. Harrison, Jr., now of Alabama, General Hagood, now Governor of South Carolina, and General Colquitt. The strain of mind from the prolonged imminent danger and from the responsibility was terrible, and General Colquitt said one day, on being relieved by Harrison, "I would rather face all the forces of the enemy in the open field at once than stand my week of this." But he did his duty sternly.

It was also observed that he had the tenderness of Wellington, which has been often contrasted with the callousness of Napoleon, and that while brave in the face of battle himself, he was careful about his soldiers. On one occasion his brigade was filing past him in a manœuvre preliminary to making a dangerous charge, and the brave fellows on the brink of a deadly engagement, raised their caps and saluted him with repeated cheers. The sight was too much for him who was to lead many of them to certain death, and a friend who was riding near saw great tears come up to his eyes and roll down his cheeks as the emotions of the moment convulsed his heart.

AFTER THE WAR

he returned to his plantations in Baker Co., and like thousands of other wise and humane masters found his freed negroes glad to continue in their old positions and to live and work under him—they lazy withal, but faithful in their service, and he steadfast in his kindness. In 1868 he was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention at New York, at which Horatio Seymour was nominated, and he was afterward a Seymour elector and two years later he was elected Chairman of the State Convention.

The same year, 1870, and, as it happened, on the same day with that election, he received one of the most coveted honors of the State, in being elected President of the State Agricultural Society, an office which he held till 1876, when he was nominated for Governor in succession to James M. Smith. There were several other strong and popular candidates, but General Colquitt was elected by 82,000 votes, the largest number ever cast for one man as Governor in Georgia.

In 1877 President Hayes visited Atlanta, and Governor Colquitt discharged the duty of delivering the address of welcome to him with an ability, courtesy, and a delicacy that were generously and even enthusiastically recognized by statesmen and men of letters in the most Republican sections of the United States. From that time the Governor's eloquence was remembered whenever a worthy occasion for a great State speech presented itself. It

* There is no such thing as a charmed life. God protected General Colquitt from being shot.

April, 1878, at the meeting of the Second International Sunday-school Convention at Atlanta; and again at the laying of the corner-stone of the Confederate Monument at Macon; in May of the same year, at the Eighth General Conference of the M. E. Church South, at Atlanta; and in June at the annual commencement of the Trinity Methodist College, N.C., he delivered addresses instructive from their breadth of view, powerful in their independence of spirit, and beneficent from their depth of sympathy.

In all these utterances the Governor neither flinched from the principles for which his State had gone to war, nor qualified the frank submission that ought to follow defeat in an appeal to arms; while his sentiments regarding the freedmen commended themselves to the North, were echoed in the South, and planted the assurance of warm friendship in the hearts of the colored race.

On the presentation of the fraternal delegation from the

to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, before mentioned, one of the delegates thus referred to a significant incident: "Let me state a circumstance which has just now occurred. When in the vestry there we were consulting your committees, among whom was your illustrious Christian Governor, the Hon. A. H. Colquitt. Feeling an unusual thirst, and expecting in a few minutes to appear before you, thoughtlessly I asked him for a glass of water to drink. He, looking about the room, answered, 'There is none; I will get you some.' I insisted not; but presently it was brought and handed me by the Governor.

"I said, 'Governor, you must allow me to deny myself this distinguished favor, as it recalls so vividly the episode of the warrior king of Israel, when with parched lips he cried from the rocky cave of Adullam, Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem that is at the gate! And when three of his valiant captains broke through the hosts of the enemy and returned to him with the water for which his soul was longing, regarding it as the water of life he would not drink of it, but poured it out to the Lord.' So may this transcendant emblem of purity and love from the hand of your most honored co-laborer and friend of the human race ever remain a memorial unto the Lord of the friendship existing between the Methodist Episcopal Church South and the African Methodist Episcopal Church upon the first exchange of fraternal greeting."

Many of the Northern delegates to the Sunday-school Convention at Atlanta joined in an urgent request that Governor Colquitt would take part the following August in the annual gathering of the friends of Sunday-school work at Chautauqua, N. Y.; and the invitation being accepted, that annual August gathering, which always overflows with genial interest, became in 1878 one of the great religious and social events of the generation. There, too, the distinguished guest made an eloquent and impressive address.

The next event we have to chronicle was a political and religious speech delivered before a vast audience of the excitable and enthusiastic colored race. It took place in October, 1878, but the circumstances leading up to it require explanation. Christian people in the South had been much exercised at the apparent indifference of the colored people to give their children the benefit of which were opened among them after the emancipation; and in the year we speak of, General Harrison, of Savannah, Ga., the father of the defender of James Island, took the trouble to question several of the leading pastors of the Methodist and Baptist colored churches on the subject. These men candidly told him the reason was that their people were not certain how far the whites sympathized with them and wished them well.

On hearing that General Harrison asked them if it would not be practicable to convene a general meeting for the consideration of the matter, and to hold it under the presidency of Governor Colquitt, who was equally strong in his influence over the whites and in the confidence of the colored people. The proposition was eagerly accepted, and General Harrison found the Governor, as he had anticipated, ready to enter into the idea. So the pastors went to work, and after considerable delay a mass meeting of the colored people of Chatham County was held in Savannah, and Governor Colquitt made them a long address in words of wisdom, kindness, and assurance. The effect was amazing, and in the overflow of enthusiasm, which was such as only those who have seen similar demonstrations among the Africans can realize, a regiment of volunteers was organized on the spot under the name of "The Colquitt Blues," and it is to-day one of the most martial of all the military bodies of that eminently martial race.

After that magnificent achievement, nothing would suffice the colored people of Liberty County but that they must do something on an equal scale; and scorning outside aid, Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists united in a spontaneous invitation to the Governor in the following words: "It is an honor that this county never before received, and it would be especially appreciated by your colored fellow-citizens as a cordial recognition of their new citizenship and an encouragement to their efforts to become better and wiser citizens, and to take their place honorably by the side of their white fellow-citizens. We entreat your Excellency, therefore, to give this invitation your kind consideration and to meet us and our children in the ancient Midway ground on Thursday, October 17th, 1878, at ten o'clock A.M."

It need scarcely be added that Governor Colquitt filled the position to which he was invited with credit to himself and with great encouragement to his colored friends.

While we are on the subject of the negro race, we may mention that in no particular has Governor Colquitt's character as shone more brightly than in his uniform recognition of that people as possessing souls redeemable by the blood of the Saviour. Under the institution of slavery, when he was himself a large slave-holder, he used to gather the negroes together and read and explain the Bible to them on Sabbath evenings; and his earliest interest in Sunday-school work, with which his name is now so prominently connected, was as a teacher of a colored class in the Sunday-school of the church where he held his membership.

The negroes loved him as their best friend, and when the war broke out, and he was called away to the battle-fields of Florida, he left his wife and children to their unaided protection, no white man being near them. And his confidence was abundantly justified; for one of the first letters that reached him by the uncertain postal communication of those four years of disorganization and war contained a little passage in words like these: "Godfrey carries on the meeting every evening as usual, and last night —— passed by the room and heard him praying for you. He said, 'O Lord God, bless our good master. Protect him in de war, and if it is in accordance wid dy will, quickly bring him back to his dear wife and de children.'"

After the emancipation, when the freed men wished to have a larger number of churches of their own, instead of worshipping in the white churches as they had been generally in the custom of doing, the first church that was built for them was erected by Governor Colquitt.

Any account of a great and good man would be incomplete without at least a reference to the inevitable calumny under which he had had to pass. In the case of the subject of this sketch the charge was the vulgar one of taking a bribe, and the occasion was his indorsement of the bonds of the North-Eastern Railway in 1878. The affair brought small honor to the maligners. The accused Governor was the first to challenge inquiry; a committee of thirteen of its own members was appointed by the General Assembly to investigate the case; before the conclusion of the inquiry the public indignation was roused against the parties who brought the charge, and they were forced to protest that they had never intended to impugn the Governor's purity of purpose; the committee unanimously exonerated him; and the Legislature passed resolutions of unshaken confidence in him. That was the end of the charge of taking bribes.

A few things remaining to be said regarding the subject of this article must be very briefly summarized. Governor Colquitt is notably independent in his opinions and fearless in expressing them. This was well illustrated at the Third International Sunday-school Convention at Toronto in June last. The Governor had the duty of opening the Convention, having been President of the previous one in 1878, and he attracted much notice by his tall, strong, and well-knit figure, and by the dignity of his bearing. On the third day of the Convention he was on the programme to deliver an address on Sunday-schools among the freedmen at the South, and there, before a great assembly of Canadians and Northerners, he boldly vindicated the position of the South as first and not second in all efforts to promote the moral and religious elevation of the freedmen. His frank confession of the principles which his State and party had submitted to the arbitrament of war, and for which he had exposed his life on many battle-fields, made a deep impression of admiration and respect.

The same independence of character, which so well becomes a man who has subordinated his will to the will of God, made him, when President of the Georgia Agricultural Society, take a determined stand against at the Annual State Fair; and so far from the Fair suffering by that bold innovation in the customary practices, it was the most successful State Fair ever held in Georgia. Governor Colquitt is also an out-and-out teetotaller, and on one occasion some years ago he created considerable consternation by treating to cold tea a fashionable party that had come together in full expectation of a stronger beverage for refreshment.

He was elected Governor for a second term in 1880 by 55,000 votes, in the face of a strong opposition, such as is never likely to be raised against an unobjectionable man again. For the action of the Legislature at that time took a large amount of public patronage out of the Governor's hands, no more to leave him exposed to the ill will of nineteen out of every twenty persons who expected public appointments.

The idea prevails in some quarters that Governor Colquitt is an ordained minister, or at least a licensed preacher. But it is not so. He is simply a gifted and well informed layman, who has had a rich religious experience, and is willing on all proper occasions to use his gift of public speaking in testimony for his Master. In that capacity he has frequently preached the sermon at a Sunday morning service at a camp-meeting with several prominent ministers on the platform beside him. On such occasions he delivers the message of salvation with much plainness and simplicity. Governor Colquitt had a younger brother, Colonel Peyton L. Colquitt, who was killed at the battle of Chickamauga. He was Secretary of the State Senate in 1856 and 1857. An only sister was married to Colonel Orlando B. Vickling, then member of Congress for Illinois, and still an able and well-known lawyer in that State. A daughter by his first marriage is the wife of Captain T. F. Newell, of Milledgeville, Ga.

MRS. COLQUITT.

On the 23d of July, 1856, Governor Colquitt was married to Sarah B. Tarver, widow of Mr. Frederick Tarver, his first wife's brother, and a planter and gentleman of wealth, formerly of Twiggs County, Ga. This lady has been a strong support to her husband, thoroughly identifying herself with his interests, using her exceptional energy for the promotion of his welfare, and presiding at the Executive Mansion and dispensing its hospitality with genial grace.

She is a member of the First Baptist Church in Atlanta, the Rev. Dr. Gwin, pastor, while the Governor, as we have shown, is a Methodist. This union of two denominations in the family has happily contributed to develop the large-heartedness which is characteristic of Governor and Mrs. Colquitt, both of whom are in hearty sympathy with Christian people and ready to take part in Christian work, whatever the denomination represented. However, Mrs. Colquitt is very strongly attached to her own church, and puts forth her most steady efforts in its interest.

The benevolent enterprises of the city and State have always a large share of her attention, and she takes a particular interest in whatever relates to the extension of religion among the poor. She is President of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Atlanta. One who is well acquainted with her says: "Gentle, genial, earnest, she never seems weary of her work as wife of the Governor of a great State, and as a Christian woman."

She has five graceful and well trained children, all of whom, except the youngest, a boy of seven years, are members of the Church. May the great blessing of God continue to rest upon the household.

A GOSPEL ARBOR.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Go forth unto the mount, and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths."—NEHEMIAH 8 : 15.

The Feast of Tabernacles—A Gospel Arbor—I. Olive Branches—A Token of Peace—Peace with God—Peace with Man—II. Pine Branches—A Token of Health—An Evergreen—Muckle Backie the Fisherman—The Cardinal's Gold—III. Palm Branches—A Token of Usefulness—A Token of Victory—More than Conqueror—IV. Branches of Thick Trees—A Token of Strength—Mr. Finney in a School House—The Pigeon-Catcher's Booth.

IT seems as if Mount Olivet were unmoored. The people have gone into the mountain, and have cut off tree-branches, and put them on their shoulders, and they come forth now into the streets of Jerusalem, and on the house-tops, and they twist these tree-branches into arbors or booths. Then the people come forth from their comfortable homes, and dwell for seven days in these booths or arbors. Why do they do that? Well, it is a great festal time. It is the feast of tabernacles; and these people are going to celebrate the desert travel of their fathers and their deliverance from their troubles, the experience of their fathers when, travelling in the desert, they lived in booths, on their way to the land of Canaan. And so these booths also become highly suggestive—I will not say they are necessarily typical, but highly suggestive—of our march toward to heaven, and of the fact that we are only living temporarily here, as it were in booths or arbors, on our way to the Canaan of eternal rest.

And what was said to the Jews literally may to-night be said figuratively to all this audience. Go forth into the mountain, and fetch olive branches and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths. Yes, we are only here in a temporary residence. We are marching on. The merchant princes who used to live in Bowling Green, New York, have passed away, and their residences are now the fields of cheap merchants. Where are the men who fifty years ago owned New York? Passed on.

There is no use in our driving our stakes too deep into the earth; we are on the march. The generations that have preceded us have gone so far on that we cannot even hear the sound of their footsteps. They have gone over the hills, and we are to follow them. But blessed be God we are not in this world left out of doors, and unsheltered. There are gospel booths, or gospel arbors, in which our souls are to be comforted. Go forth unto the mountain, and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick trees, and build booths.

Well, now we are to-night to construct or gospel booth; and how shall we construct it? Well, we must get all the tree branches and build. According to my text we must go up unto the mount and bring olive branches. What does that mean?

The olive tree grows in warm climates, and it reaches the height of twenty or twenty-two feet, a straight stem, and then an off-shoot from that stem. And then people come, and they strip off these branches sometimes, and when in time of war the general of one army takes one of these olive branches and goes out to the general of another army, what does that mean? Why, it means, unsaddle the war chargers. It means hang up the war knapsacks. It is but a beautiful way of saying, Peace!

I. Now if we are to-night going to succeed in building this gospel arbor, we must go into the Mount of God's blessing, and fetch the and whatever else we must have, we must have at least two olive branches, peace with God, and peace with man. When I say peace with God, I do not mean to represent God as a bloody chieftain, having a grudge against us, but I do mean to affirm that there is no more antagonism between a hound and a hare, between a hawk and a pullet, between elephant and swine, than there is hostility between holiness and sin. And if God is all holiness, and we are to-night all sin, there must be a readjustment, there must be a reconstruction, there must be a treaty, there must be a stretching forth of olive branches.

There is a great law-suit going on now, and it is a law-suit which man is bringing against his Maker; that law-suit is now on the calendar. It is the human versus the divine; it is iniquity versus the immaculate; it is weakness versus omnipotence. Man began it; God did not begin the law-suit. We began it; we assaulted our Maker, and the sooner we end this part of the struggle in which the finite attempts to overthrow the infinite and omnipotent, the sooner we end it the better.

Travellers tell us there is no such place as Mount Calvary, that it is only a hill, only an insignificant hill; but I persist in calling it the Mount of God's divine mercy and love, far grander than any other place on earth, grander than the Alps or the Himalayas, and there are no other hills as compared with it; and I have noticed in every sect where the cross of Christ is set forth, it is planted with olive branches. And all we have to do is to get rid of this war between God and ourselves, of which we are all tired. We want to back out of the war, we want to get rid of this hostility. All we have to do is just to get up on the Mount of God's blessing, and pluck these olive branches and wave them before the throne. Peace through our Lord Jesus Christ!

Oh, it don't make much difference what the world thinks of you; what this king, that queen, that senator thinks of you. But come into the warm, intimate, glowing and everlasting relationship with the God of the round universe; that is the joy that makes a hallelujah seem stupid. Ah, why do we want to have peace through our Lord Jesus Christ? Why, if we had gone on in ten thousand years of war against God, we could not have captured so much as a sword or a cavalry stirrup, or twisted off one of the wheels of the chariot of His omnipotence. But the moment we bring this olive branch, God and all heaven come on our side. Peace through our Lord Jesus Christ; and no other kind of peace is worth anything.

But then we must have that other olive branch

PEACE WITH MAN.

Now it is very easy to get up a quarrel. There are gunpowdery Christians all around us, and one match of provocation will set them off. It is easy enough to get up a quarrel. But my brother, don't you think you had better have your horns sawed off? Had not you better make an apology? Had not you better submit to a little humiliation? Oh, you say, until that man takes the first step I will never be at peace with him; nothing will be done, until he is ready to take the first step. You are a pretty Christian. When would this world be saved if Christ had not taken the first step?

We were in the wrong, Christ was in the right, all right and forever right. And yet He took the first step.

And instead of going and getting a knotty scourge with which to whip your antagonist, your enemy, you had better get up on the radiant mount where Christ suffered for His enemies, and just take an olive branch, not stripping off the soft, cool, fragrant leaves, leaving them all on, and then try on them that gospel switch. It won't hurt them, and it will save you. Peace with God; peace with man. If you cannot take those two doctrines you are no Christian.

Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in christian love;
The fellowship of kindred minds
Is like to that above.

From sorrow, toil and pain,
And sin we shall be free;
And perfect love and friendship reign
Through all eternity.

II. But my text goes further. It says: Go up into the mountain and fetch olive branches and

PINE BRANCHES.

Now what is suggested by the pine branch? The pine tree is healthy; it is aromatic; it is evergreen. How often the physician says to us, his invalid patients. "Go and have a breath of the pines; that will invigorate you." Why do such thousands of people go south every year? It is not merely to get to a warmer climate, but to get the influence of the pine. There is health in it, health in it, and this pine branch of the text suggests the healthfulness of our holy religion; it is full of health, health for all, health for the mind, health for the soul.

I knew an aged man, who had no capital of physical health. He had had all the diseases you could imagine; he did not eat enough to keep a child alive; he lived on a beverage of hosannas. He lived high, for he dined every day with the King. He was kept alive simply by the force of our holy religion. It is a healthy religion, healthy for the eye, healthy for the hand, healthy for the feet, healthy for the heart, healthy for the liver, healthy for the spleen, healthy for the whole man. It gives a man such peace, such quietness, such independence of circumstances, such holy equipoise. It is a healthy religion. Oh that we all possessed it, that we possessed it now. I mean it is healthy if a man gets enough of it. Now there are some people who get just enough religion to bother them, just enough religion to make them sick; but if a man take a full, deep, round inhalation of these pine branches of the gospel arbor, he will find it buoyant, exuberant, undying, immortal health.

But this evergreen of my text also suggests the simple fact that

IT IS EVERGREEN.

What does the pine branch care for the snow on its brow? It is only a crown of glory. The winter cannot freeze it out. This evergreen tree branch is as beautiful in winter as it is in the summer. And that is the characteristic of our holy religion; in the sharpest, coldest winter of misfortune and disaster, it is as good a religion as it is in the bright summer sunshine. Well, now, that is a practical truth. For suppose, if I should go up and down these aisles, and through all these galleries, I would not find in this house fifty people who had had no trouble.

But there are some of you who have especial trouble. God only knows what you go through with. Oh how many bereavements, how many poverties, how many persecutions! How many misrepresentations! And now my brother, you have tried everything else, why don't you try this evergreen religion? It is just as good for you now as it was in the day of prosperity; it is better, better for you. Perhaps some of you feel almost like Muckle Backie, the fisherman, who was chided one day because he kept on working, although that very day he buried his child. They came to him and said, it is indecent for you to be mending that boat when this afternoon you buried your child. And the fisherman looked up and said, "Sir, it is very easy for you gentlefolks to stay in the house with your handkerchief to your eyes in grief; but sir, ought I to let the other five children starve because one of them is drowned? No, sir, we maun work, we maun work, though our hearts beat like this hammer."

You may have had accumulation of sorrow and misfortune. They come in flocks, they come in herds upon your soul; and yet I have to tell you that this religion can console you, that it can help you, that it can deliver you if nothing else will. Do you tell me that the riches and the gain of this world can console you? How was it with the cardinal who had such a fondness for money that when he was sick he ordered a basin of gold pieces to be brought to him, and he put his gouty hands down among the gold pieces, cooling his hand off in them, and the rattle and rolling of these gold pieces were his amusement and entertainment.

Ah, the gold and silver, the honors, the emoluments of this world are a poor solace for a perturbed spirit. You want something better, something better than this world can give. A young prince, when the children came around to play with him, refused to play; he said, I will play only with kings. And oh, it would be supposed that you would throw away all other solace before this regal satisfaction, this imperial joy.

The hill of Zion yields
A thousand sacred sweets,
Before we reach the heavenly fields
Or walk the golden streets.

III. But my text takes a step further, and it says, Go into the mountain and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and

PALM BRANCHES.

Now the palm tree was very much honored by the ancients. It had three hundred and sixty different uses. The fruit was conserved; the sap was a beverage, the stems were ground up for food for camels; the base of the leaves was turned into hats, and mats, and baskets; and the leaves were carried in victorious processions; and from the root to the top of the highest leaf there was usefulness.

The tree grew eighty-five feet in height sometimes, and it spread broad leaves four and five yards long; it meant usefulness, and it meant victory; usefulness for what it produced, victory because it was brought into celebrations of triumph. And oh, how much we want the palm branches in the churches of Jesus Christ at this time! A great many Christians don't amount to anything. You have to shove them off the track, and let the Lord's chariots come along. We don't want any more of that kind of Christians in the Church.

I know the old plan was, the plan now is, in regard to worldly investments—you hear it, merchants tell you—don't put everything into one thing, don't put all your eggs into one basket; but I have to tell you in this matter of religion you had better give your all to God, and then get in yourself. Oh, says some one, My business is to sell silks and cloths. Well then, my brother, sell silks and cloths to the glory of God. And some one says, "My business is to raise corn and carrots. Then my brother, raise corn and carrots to the glory of God. And some one says, My business is to manufacture horseshoe nails. Then manufacture horse-shoe nails to the glory of God. There is nothing for you to do that you ought to do but for the glory of God.

Usefulness is typified by the palm tree. Ah, we don't want in the church any more people that are merely weeping willows, sighing into the water, standing and admiring their long lashes in the glassy spring. No wild cherry, dropping bitter fruit. We want palm trees, holding something for God, something for angels, something for man. I am tired and sick of this flat, tame, insipid, satin-slippered, namby-pamby, highty-tighty religion! It is worth nothing for this world, and it is destruction for eternity.

Give me five hundred men and women fully consecrated to Christ, and we will take this city for God in three years. Give me ten thousand men and women fully up to the Christian standard; in ten years ten thousand of them would take the whole earth for God. But when are we going to begin? We all want to be useful. There is not a man in the pews that does not want to be useful. We all want to be useful. When are we going to begin?

Ledyard, the great traveller, was brought before the geographical society of Great Britain, and they wanted him to make some explorations in Africa, and they showed him all the perils, and all the hard work, and all the exposure, and after they had told him what they wanted him to do in Africa, they said to him: Now, Ledyard, when are you ready to start? He said, To-morrow morning. Well, the learned men were astonished; they thought he would take weeks or months to get ready. Well, now, you tell me you want to be eminent for Christ; you want to be useful in Christian service. When are you going to begin? Oh, that you had the decision to say, To-night; now; now. Oh, go into the mount and gather the palm branches.

But the palm branch also meant

VICTORY.

You all know that; in all ages, in all lands, the palm branch means victory. Well, now, we are by nature the servants of Satan. He stole us, he has his eye on us, he wants to keep us. But word comes from our Father that if we will try to break loose from this doing of wrong, our Father will help us; and some day we rouse up, and we look the black tyrant in the face, and we fly at him, and we wrestle him down, and we put our heel on his neck, and we grind him in the dust, and we say, Victory, victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ! Oh what a grand thing it is to have sin under foot, and a wasted life behind our backs. "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, and whose sin is covered" (Ps. 32 : 1).

Oh, says some one, how about the future? What, says the man, I feel so sick and worn out with the ailments of life. You are going to be more than conqueror. But, says the man, I am so tempted, I am so pursued in life. You are going to be more than conqueror. I who have so many ailments and heart aches, going to be more than conqueror? Yes, unless you are so self-conceited that you want to manage all the affairs of your life yourself instead of letting God manage them.

Do you want to drive and have God take a back seat? Oh no, you say, I want God to be my leader. Well then you will be more than conqueror. Your last sickness will come, and the physicians in the next room will be talking about what they will do for you. What difference will it make what they do for you? You are going to be well, everlastingly well. And when the spirit has fled the body, your friends will be talking as to where they shall bury you. What difference does it make to you where they bury you? The angel of the resurrection can pick you out of the dust anywhere, and all the cemeteries of the earth are in God's care. Oh you are going to be more than conqueror.

Don't you think we had better begin now to celebrate the coming victory? In the old meeting-house at Summerville, my father used to lead the singing, and he had the old-fashioned tuning-fork, and he would strike it upon his knee, and then put the tuning fork to his ear, to catch the right pitch and start the hymn. But friend, don't you think we had better be catching the pitch of the everlasting song, the song of victory when we shall be more than conquerors? Had we not better begin the rehearsal on earth? "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them to living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes" (Rev. 15, 17).

City of eternity; to thy bridal halls
From this prison would I flee;
Ah, glory! that's for you and me.

IV. My text brings us one step further. It says, go forth into the mount, and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and

BRANCHES OF THICK TREES.

Now you know very well—I make this remark under the head of branches of thick trees—that a booth or arbor made of slight branches would not stand. The first blast of the tempest would prostrate it. So then the booth or arbor must have four stout poles to hold up the arbor or booth; and hence for the building of the arbor for this world we must have stout branches of thick trees. And so it is in the gospel arbor. Blessed be God that we have a brawny Christianity, not one easily upset. The storms of life will come upon us, and we want strong doctrine, not only love, but justice; not only invitation, but warning. It is a mighty Gospel; it is an omnipotent Gospel. These are the stout branches of thick trees.

I remember what Mr. Finney said, in a schoolhouse in this State. The village was so bad it was called Sodom, and it was said to have only one good man in all the village, and he was called Lot: and Mr. Finney was preaching in the schoolhouse, and he described the destruction of Sodom, how the city was going to be destroyed unless they repented; and that there would be rain from heaven of sorrow and destruction unless they too repented. And the people in the schoolhouse sat and ground their teeth in anger, and clinched their fists in anger; but before he got through with his sermon they got down on their knees and cried for mercy while mercy could be found. Oh it is a mighty Gospel; not only an invitation, but a warning; an omnipotent truth, stout branches of thick trees.

Well my friends, you see I have omitted one or two points, not because I forgot to present them, but because I have not time to present them, I have shown you here is the olive branch of peace, here is the pine branch of evergreen gospel consolation, here the palm tree branch of usefulness and of victory, and here are the stout branches of thick trees. The gospel arbor is done. The air is aromatic of heaven. The leaves rustle with the gladness of God. Come into the arbor. Come into the booth. I went out at different times with a fowler to the mountains to catch doves, to catch pigeons; and we made our booth, and we sat in that booth, and watched for the pigeons to come. And we found flocks in the sky, and after a while they dropped into the net, and we were successful. So I come now to the door of this gospel booth. I look out, I see flocks of souls flying hither and flying thither. Oh, that they might come like clouds and as doves to the window. Come into the booth. Come into the booth.

A Champion Blasphemer Was Recently Converted in one of the colliery villages in the north of England. He obtained a livelihood by catching sparrows to be used as targets at shooting matches. He was a thorough adept in drinking, gambling, and blasphemy. Nearly every sentence he uttered showed that his tongue was set on fire of hell, and ordinary swearers stood aghast at him. He once had a swearing match with another blasphemer, who, after listening for a few moments to his devilish expressions, said to him, "Man, you are not human," and withdrew. He led many of the young into the paths of sin, especially that of gambling, and was considered by many a hopeless case. Through the instrumentality of a missionary, he was induced to attend some revival meetings, and, after a good deal of persuasion, was constrained to admit that he was a great sinner. Presently he wept like a child, and two of the friends prayed for him, he kneeling between them. That night he gave his heart to Christ. The general topic on the following day, yea, for many days, was the conversion of the devil. Some gave him a week, some a fortnight, and some three weeks until he should be back again into the world. The woodhouse in which he had kept his sparrows is now converted into a devotion house, in which other sinners have listened to the Gospel and found peace.

A Daughter's Peaceful Death was a Never-forgotten lesson to her irreligious father who recently quitted this world. When he was taken ill he sent for the minister who had visited his daughter during his illness. "Will you tell me, sir?" he asked, "what made my daughter Anne (what you used to come and see long ago) so happy when she was dying? for I have a great dread of death." The old man had been very much opposed to the minister's visits to his daughter, but now his gaze was earnest, anxious, and expressive of relief that the minister had come. "Your daughter trusted in Jesus," replied the minister; "and it is He alone who can take away the sting of death, which is sin. His blood cleanses us from all sin, and whosoever cometh to Jesus will in nowise be cast out." Then opening to him more fully the Gospel plan of salvation, on this and other occasions, he had the joy of seeing his tears give place to a peaceful trust in Christ.

The First Victim of the Expedition—No Water!—The Mare's Piteous Appeal—Resolution to Return—Earnest Prayer for Divine Help.

On the first day of their memorable journey in the bush, Graham, Gordon, and Duncan arrived and camped on the Duck Creek, beside the burial place of the Blan blacks. This solemn resting place of the natives was far, far away from the wood-embosomed churchyard, where James many years since had wept over the burial of two sisters younger than himself; but its seclusion was so deep, it recalled that scene and his mother's tears. The solemnity of the place and the associations awakened by it, together with the responsibility and perils of the present enterprise, made him look up solemnly to the bright stars above him, as he lay with his head on his saddle, and caused him to pray with more than usual earnestness to the God who sustains those stars, and without whom a sparrow cannot fall.

Thirty miles more, next day, brought them to the Merule Creek—the last on the verge of the desert. As they were thinking where they should dig for water, before camping, a warragel started from under a great gum tree on the dry creek. He had been scraping for water by the roots of the tree. The kangaroo dog, Fly, was with them, and soon despatched the wild dog. With a shovel, improvised from the bark of the tree, they dug where the dog had scraped; and in three quarters of an hour's shovelling came on a spring of beautiful clear water, which soon formed a clear well, at which all slaked their thirst. Next morning, after breakfast, by early dawn, they started to penetrate the twenty miles of scrub which lay between them and the desert. In some parts it was hard work, but they effected it by eight o'clock, and even then the sun was intensely hot, and the kangaroo dog was panting with protruded tongue.

The only chance to save a dog in such circumstances, is to get him before you on the saddle, and gallop to water and throw him in over head and ears. Graham could not do so now with poor Fly. He heard the rattles in her throat, and helplessly watched, while she ran and thrust her head into a hollow log for coolness, and in a few minutes was dead—the first victim of the expedition.

On the verge of the desert stood the hill called Sugar-loaf Bulgar (native for "rock"), which they ascended for a look-out over the desert toward the Binier range.

The hill may be some 1800 or 2000 feet high, principally composed of white, very white, sandstone, rising like a loaf of white sugar or a pyramid of bleaching linen. Round its base for acres grew the wattle and mimosa. When they had had a look from this hill, and clearly descried Binier with its central depression or gap, Graham, pointing to the vast tracts of glowing sand, asked Duncan solemnly, "Shall we go on?" Duncan, pointing to the distant hills and the gap in them said, "There must be water there, and why should we now turn back with our finger in our mouth?" Graham said, "If there is no water here, there is none there, and we may say farewell to daylight for ever."

Duncan led the way, and they followed into the sand, which grew deeper and more scorching to the horses' feet as they advanced. Every mile our travellers advanced the tufts of scrub and grass grew thinner and thinner, and the character of the sandy desert more marked. They had full sixty miles of this wilderness from the Sugar-loaf Bulgar to Binier. When they stopped mid-way to rest they had no shelter from the sun-blaze, except a tent formed by stretching a blanket on a prickly bush and their guns. They pressed on; for every hour was most precious. The searching, pitiless rays appeared to reflect from the sand hotter than they fell on it, though in falling they appeared to dart direct into the travellers brains. But their horses bore up nobly; and as the shades of evening fell, they stopped to rest under the shadow of the mountain. There was no water; and the horses, having performed a journey of nearly eighty miles, were greatly exhausted.

Soon after sundown, as it grew dark, they reached the gap in the Binier range; and they tracked the gulley toward the top looking for water; but the darkness increased, and they were compelled to desist till morning. Poor Duncan spent a wretched and restless night in thirst and foreboding. He tried to allay the pain of his thirst, and draw moisture to his mouth by eating quantities of sugar, which subsequently inflamed his thirst. Graham tied his Arab mare to a sapling, and fell into a doze, in which cascades and torrents were sounding in his ears, as lakes had been gleaming in the mirage of the day.

The mare broke her fastenings; and, after rambling about, came to her master and awoke him by her heavy breathing and by licking his face. She said as plainly as she could, "I have searched in vain for water; rise you and search." He felt deeply affected by this unwonted conduct of the gentle, faithful beast, and raised his companions by dawn to renew the search for that element without which all should perish ere long. Alas! alas! the more thorough the search, the deeper the conviction that no water could, lodge in that sandy, porous rock, on which if water were poured it would be drunk up as by a sponge.

Despair glared in the looks of Graham's companions. And no wonder, for the torments of thirst were increasing; the sun would soon be up to increase them; and to re-cross that desert and scrub appeared to be in their case beyond human power. When the daylight dawned they renewed the search, but in vain; and they saw beyond the Binier range a region as hopeless as that they had traversed.

Despair now stared them in the face. The black Jackey looked frightened; and, in sad soliloquy, said, "Bell cooleen, bell pater, these poor fellows, all tumble down when euroka jump up: nothing to eat, nothing to drink, these poor fellows will all die when the sun jumps up." Duncan was shrunk in body and collapsed in soul. The fearful truth was now too plain—he had succeeded in persuading his too facile friend to a common destruction. "Graham," he said, "in Heaven's name what shall we do? I am afraid all is over. I only am to blame. What shall we do?"

Graham comprehended the horrors of their case better than did Duncan; and the excitement which was unmanning the one called up the resources of the deeper but tardier nature of the other. He was quite calm and pitied Duncan. He said "My dear friend, we'll make nothing by talk; further beyond the mountain is but deeper in the furnace. We can die but once, and God can still help us; let us return, there is no time to be lost!"

James Graham did not despair, but felt roused through all his powers to make effort to save himself and his companions. Much—indeed, under Providence everything—depended on the ability of their horses to hold out till they got within reach of water. For the first two days his Arab mare, Sarah, had borne the pack, and her strength had been reserved; he now mounted her, and by sunrise led the party back on their own tracks through the desert they had crossed the previous day.

If he ever lifted his heart to God it was then, as he remembered the words of his Bible: "Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them. Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and He delivered them out of their distresses; and led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation. Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men."

At some two or three miles from the foot of the mountain they were leaving, he discerned to their left an undulating sand mound with some scrub on it. There he thought the waters of the Merule Creek might find an outlet; and thither he led the way. They dismounted, but the burning sand-drifts yielded no water. He and Duncan resolved there to pray; and having pushed aside the burning sand, Graham laid down a blanket on which they knelt, and in succession they poured out their sense of want and dependence to God, as men only can do who are made to feel such utter necessity and helplessness.

Duncan's prayer was passionate, excited, and eloquent; highly characterized by remarkably clear views of the office and value of Christ as a Mediator; but he appeared to give himself up as dead. If Gordon prayed, his prayers were not audible, though indifferent he could not be. But poor Jackey, he knew not God; and he sat on the sand beneath a shrub, swinging to and fro and shaking and tossing his head with a doleful hum—the aboriginal dirge—the requiem of his race. Poor Jackey thus bids farewell to his tribe and to his life, with no hope of sepulture except by the eagle-hawks. He feels that the white man has led him to inevitable and most miserable death, and he has no God to whom to utter nature's last doleful plaint against fate.

(To be concluded.)

GRACE.

A Sermon by Mr. D. L. Moody.

"For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world."—Titus 2: 11, 12.

Three Terrible Enemies—Already Overcome by Christ—Incident of the Ten-cent Man—A Visit to a London Garret—Wanting a Father's Forgiveness—The Father's Promptitude—A Happy Death in an Attic.

We have got

THREE TERRIBLE ENEMIES.

Young man, put them in you mind. The flesh—and some one has said, You resist the devil and he will flee from you; but you resist the flesh and the flesh clings to you; you carry it around with you—the flesh, the world, and the devil—three terrible enemies. We are no match for them in our own strength. We have not got the power to conquer them. But when Christ comes He gives us the power over the world, and we can conquer the world. If I have Christ's spirit in me I can conquer the world. When Christ came He conquered Satan. Satan made his attack upon Him. Christ drew the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, and He said to Satan "it is written—it is written"—and Satan fled. He overcame Satan and He overcame the flesh. He conquered all those enemies, and if Christ is in me I will conquer those same enemies. That is the only way we can get the victory. Now what does He say: "My grace is sufficient for thee; as thy days are, so shall thy strength be."

Did you ever hear of a man failing with a good bank account? Did you? How is a man going to fail with a good bank account? Men are afraid they will fail and that they will not hold out if they become Christians. The bank of heaven has never been empty yet. There is plenty of grace. "My grace is sufficient for thee; as thy days are so shall thy strength be."

Here is a man who wants grace to overcome that mean and contemptible nature of his. Perhaps he is very impatient, and he wants grace to overcome that impatience. "My grace is sufficient for thee." Just think, just say, "My grace is sufficient for thee." There is a man that wants the victory over his appetite. That man has not strength to walk by a saloon without going in to get a drink. I heard of a man who kept in his room all one day this very week, because he was afraid if he went out he would be tempted, and so he stayed in his room. Well, thank God that men are wanting to get away from the tempter; but if that man will look right to the Lord Jesus and say, "Lord, deliver me," he can walk right straight through this city without yielding to temptation; he can conquer the world. I don't care how weak he may be in his own strength. "Lay hold of my strength," says God. Lay hold of Jesus Christ. He will hold men up and He will keep men up.

There was a man that I knew in New York and they used to call him

THE TEN-CENT MAN.

He came to the hippodrome when we were there, and I don't think the clothes he had on were worth ten cents. Some one had given him one of those little pieces of ten-cent scrip that used to be in circulation; he had given it to him to get a drink with. He didn't give it to him for that purpose, for the man told him a lie; he told him he wanted it for bread; and I tell you when men are under the power of the devil they will do most anything. This man said he wanted it for bread, but he wanted to get some whiskey with it. But he came to the meeting; it was a cold day, and he came in there to get warm, and he stayed at the after meeting, and a friend got hold of that man and talked with him and prayed with him.

And when I saw that Christian lady upon her knees, praying with that man, I thought it was a sight for angels to behold. Thank God, we have such ladies, who can labor for poor, weak, fallen manhood. And that lady, with the fire of God burning in her soul, and with a desire to save souls, was down upon her knees, praying with that man. And when he got off his knees he says: "Now, Lord, if you will help me keep that ten cents for twenty four hours I will begin to think you have heard my prayer." And the next day I think he was about the happiest man in New York.

He came back and he says, "My friends, there is that ten-cent scrip; I have carried it for twenty-four hours, a thing that I have not been able to do for years." And when I went through New York last fall, I inquired for the "ten-cent man," and they said he had got the ten cents yet, and that he had never drunk another drop from that day to this. The grace of God was sufficient for him. That is the point: "My grace is sufficient for thee." Are you discouraged; are you disheartened? My good brother, look up and say: "Lord God Almighty, save me." It is a very easy matter for God to save. It is as easy for God to save a drunkard as it is for me to lift my hand.

William Dorsett, the great Yorkshire farmer, preached one night in London, and in his sermon he said that there was not a man so far gone in all London, but that the grace of God could save him. The next morning a lady called upon him, and she said, "Mr. Dorsett, I heard you preach last night, and I heard you make that striking remark. Did you mean it?" She thought perhaps that under the heat of the moment he might have said it without weighing his words, but Mr. Dorsett said, "Of course I meant it: I shouldn't have said it if I had not meant it." She says, "I have found a man in my tract district—my missionary district—who says that he is too vile, and too far gone. Would you go to see him?" "Yes, I should be glad to see him." She took him to the east end of London to a five-story building, and she says, "You will find him in the fifth story, and I think you had better go alone."

He went up five flights of stairs—dark, filthy stairs—and he opened the door and went into a dark, filthy room, and over there in a corner of that room, upon some straw, with scarcely rags enough to cover his nakedness, lay a young man dying. The man of God bent over and whispered in his ear and called him "Friend." The poor man looked up with astonishment, and says he: "You are mistaken, sir: you have got into the wrong place." "How is that?" says Mr. Dorsett. "Ah," says the young man, "I have no friends." "But," he says, "you have a friend;" and then he went on to tell him about the Sinner's Friend, and he told him though every one else had forsaken him, the Lord had not; that the Lord loved and cared for him; and in that dark garret he preached Christ, he held up Christ to that poor, lost, ruined man, and for a long time he couldn't make that man believe that a man like him could be saved.

He thought even Christ could not save; he thought there was not grace enough in heaven to save him. He had been deluded by the enemy of righteousness, and he thought God could not save him. But Mr. Dorsett went on and quoted promise after promise, and at last the light of the Gospel began to break in upon that poor man's heart.

And do you know the first sign of a new life is that a man's heart goes out toward those whom he has injured; that is the first thing when the life of God begins in a man's heart; he will want to straighten out some things in his life, and he said: "Well, I believe that I could die happy now in this garret if I only knew that my father forgave me." "Who is he?" The young man told him. "Where does he live?" "In the west end of London." "Well," says Mr. Dorsett, "I will go and see him and ask him if he will forgive you." "No," says the young man, "I don't want you to do that." "Why not?" "Why," says he, "my father has me out of my name. My name has been taken from the family records; I have been as one dead for years to him; he don't allow the servants or any one to mention my name in his presence, and if you go to him and talk about me it will make him very angry, and you have treated me so kindly I don't want your feelings injured." "Well," says Mr. Dorsett, "I will go and see him."

He got the address, and he went to the west end of London; he rang the door-bell, and he found the man was living in a beautiful palace. A servant in livery came to the door, and Mr. Dorsett inquired if his master was in. He told him he was. "Well," said he, "I should like to see him for a moment." The servant took him into the drawing-room, and presently a proud, haughty-looking man came down; he was a large merchant in London, and as he came toward Mr. Dorsett to shake hands, Mr. Dorsett put out his hand, and as he did so he said: "I believe you have a son named Joseph, have you not?" The man's hand fell by his side and he turned pale. Mr. Dorsett saw that the man was very angry, and he said, "No, sir; and if you have come to me to talk about that worthless vagabond I want you to leave my house. If you have been listening to his lies, you have been deceived. There is nothing good about that man. I disinherited him years ago. He is not my boy, sir. I disown him." "But," says the man of God, "he is your boy still, but he won't be long."

The man's countenance changed again, and he says, "Is Joseph sick?" "Yes, sir;

YOUR BOY IS DYING.

I haven't come to ask you to give him anything—I will see that his wants are met and that he has a decent burial—but I have only come to ask you to forgive him, and if you will forgive him, your boy will die in peace." The great tears trickled down that father's cheeks. Says he, "Forgive him! Ah, sir, I would have forgiven him long ago, if I had known he really wanted to be forgiven. Does Joseph want to be forgiven?" "Yes," says Mr. Dorsett. "He thinks God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven him, and," says he, "he thinks he could die happy now if he knew that you would forgive him." "Oh, forgive him," says the father; "can you take me to him?" "Yes." The man ordered out his carriage, and in a few minutes he was on his way to that dark garret, and as he went up those stairs he said, "Is it possible you found my boy dying here?"

He went into the room and he hardly recognized that poor boy, all mangled and bruised by the fall of sin. Ah, sin is a fearful thing, young man, and may God help you to hate it; may God help you to turn from it. The father bent over his boy, and as he did so he heard a faint whisper; it was very faint; he hadn't but a little while longer to stay; but he heard a faint whisper, and he says, "Father, can you forgive me; can you forgive me?" "Forgive you, my boy? Oh, I forgive you with all my heart, and I would have done so long ago if I had known that you wanted me to." And then he says: "Let the servants take him to the carriage, and take him home and away from this horrible place." "No," says the young man, "I am too weak, father, to be moved; I am too sick; but I can die happy now in this garret, knowing that you have forgiven me. I think God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven me;" and therewith, his head on the bosom of his father, he talked to him of a Saviour's love, and in a few hours from that time he closed his eyes in death, and up from that dark garret he passed into the kingdom of God.

Oh, I thank God that we have got such a Gospel, and that the grace of God stoops down to the lowest and to the vilest, and lifts them up and brings them into the presence of God. Oh, the marvellous grace of God—that grace of God that hath appeared, bringing salvation to all men. Every man can be saved if he will, and if he is not saved it will be his own fault. If a man spurns the grace of God, is there any one to blame but himself? God offers you salvation. Will you have it? Will you take it, young man? Will you receive it to-day? Will you take eternal life as a gift, or will you get up and go out of this house and turn your backs upon it? Oh, may the Spirit of God open your eyes to-day to show you the simplicity of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

"BRANDY I BEGAN WITH AND BRANDY I WILL END WITH."

WOULD you like to hear the story? It is not an uncommon one. Only a young life wrecked for time and for eternity by prescriptions of the physician. This is how I became acquainted with it.

A respectable, elderly man called on me one day, and besought me to try and save his son, to make him a Good Templar if I could, and so keep him from drinking. Harry was his youngest son and his darling. Carefully and tenderly brought up, he had been a Band of Hope boy, a Sunday-school teacher, and an abstainer up to the age of twenty-three.

He was now dreadfully ill with an attack of delirium tremens, the second that he had suffered from, and his father said he had brought it on by his daily visits to a public-house, where he was tempted to drink to excess, and to bet on horse races.

But how came this Band of Hope boy, this Sunday-school teacher, this regular attendant at church, this total abstainer, to frequent the public house? His tale is soon told.

A week after his father had sought my aid I met the young man in the street. His clothes hung in folds about his wasted form, his feverish eyes and burning face, and caged, despairing look, marked him plainly out for one of alcohol's miserable victims. I stopped him and spoke to him, urging him kindly to give up his drinking, warning him of what it would surely bring him to. He looked me in the face with a ghastly stare which I shall never forget, and drew out an empty brandy bottle from under his coat. "Mr. Kidd," he said, "you know nothing about it. I am dying. I cannot eat. I cannot drink anything but brandy. I am now going to get this bottle filled. Brandy I must have. Brandy I began with, and brandy will end it. It is the doctor's doings. I was a total abstainer all my life until I had a severe illness. My doctor ordered me brandy. I refused to take it, but after a severe struggle I gave in. I took the brandy which he prescribed for me, and I soon learned to love it. By degrees I became what I am—a drunkard, and hopeless. Let me alone; it is killing me, but I must have it."

When he had said this he hurried on, in spite of my most earnest pleading, to fill his brandy-bottle at the public-house. It was his last visit there. In three days after he was dead. Very probably the medical man who in his illness had ordered him brandy, and by the force of his medical authority had overcome his reluctance to take it, never heard of the result of his prescription, never saw his own work. But the work was done nevertheless. He saw death staring him in the face when he said, "Brandy I began with, and brandy will end it." Medical men who have studied the subject are generally careful to avoid the prescription of alcohol where their patient has a love for it. They seek some other remedy. But even they do not fully realize the danger of creating a fatal liking for stimulants; they refuse to believe in the facility with which it is often acquired. The patients and their friends realize that. In health there may be no craving for liquor, but a serious illness comes, the sinking, the deadly faintness is experienced, and the stimulant is administered. The sudden transformation that follows is not forgotten. Or, the patient is restless, tossing from side to side of the bed. The glass of brandy is drunk and soon sleep falls on the stupefied brain. But when the patient recovers, is the knowledge that relief may be had from intoxicants a beneficial knowledge? In thousands of cases that knowledge has led to habitual excess and a drunkard's grave.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Reports from the President's Sick Room during the early part of last week were of a hopeful character, but on the last three days it was noticed with apprehension, that he suffered a periodical rise of temperature, indicating that another obstruction to the discharge of pus was forming. Last Monday morning, Dr. Agnew and Dr. Hamilton, after consulting with the other surgeons, decided on making another incision from the surface of the body to the track of the bullet. The operation was performed at nine o'clock, the President being under the influence of ether. The patient endured it well, and on Monday afternoon was reported to be as well as could be hoped.

Every means which science and affection can suggest to add to the sufferer's comfort are employed. A description recently published of the bed on which he lies shows how much ingenuity has been exercised in the effort to save the wounded man unnecessary pain. The mattress is in several parts, so that it can be folded like a chair. Over this mattress is a canvas stretcher, which will support the patient while the mattress is being moved. The canvas can also be lifted at any time so as to admit an under current of air, serving the purposes of a hammock. All the manipulation is done by screws and cranks.

Repeated experiments have been made with the electrical apparatus to discover the spot where the bullet lodged, all of which confirm the conclusions formed when it was first tried. The ball will be allowed to remain until the President regains his usual health, unless it should give trouble. Dr. Hamilton, who is a recognized authority on gunshot wounds, speaking on this subject said, "I may say that I do not know that it could have been lodged in any safer place within the interior of the body." All the physicians concur in the opinion that, humanly speaking, the President will certainly recover. Prayer has ascended unceasingly to God for this result, and it becomes us now to thank Him that we have reason to hope those prayers will be answered (Ps. 17 : 7).

The Virginia State Democratic Convention assembled at Richmond on August 4th. John A. Daniel, of Lynchburg, received the nomination for Governor; James Barbour, of Culpeper, for Lieutenant-Governor; P. W. McKinney, of Prince Edward, for Attorney-General. All three gentlemen are ex-officers of the Southern army. The platform adopted by the Convention contains the following passage, which marks distinctly the issue between the parties in the coming struggle in the State: "We pledge our party to use all lawful authority to secure a settlement of the State debt, so that there shall be but one class of public debt; that we will use all the lawful and constitutional means in our power to secure a settlement upon the basis of a three per cent bond, and that the Conservative-Democratic party pledges itself as part of its policy not to increase the present rates of taxation." The Republicans and Readjusters complain that the statement is not explicit, and urge that the pledge not to increase the present rate of taxation involves repudiation in some degree; also that the expectation of negotiating three per cent bonds is delusive.

The Prohibition Movement has Suffered a severe defeat in North Carolina. The Prohibition law enacted by the Legislature required the sanction of the people, who have rejected it by a majority variously estimated at from forty to sixty thousand. The reports state that the whites divided on the question, but the colored vote was cast solid against prohibition. The friends of the movement are not cast down even by this enormous majority, which they believe is mainly due to a misapprehension that may be removed by an earnest effort to enlighten the people on the merits of the question. It appears that the measure, though passed by a Democratic legislature, did not command the unanimous approval of the party, many members of which voted against it, while a large number of Republican voters persisted in regarding it as a party question, and opposed it solely because it emanated from a Democratic source. The bill was passed by the Legislature by a vote of 104 to 17. Of the Democrats 83 voted for it and 10 against it, while 21 Republicans voted for it and 7 against. The bill made it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, to manufacture, buy, or sell spirituous or malt liquors, wine, or cider, except for medical or mechanical purposes.

Predictions as to the Result of the Temperance campaign in Ohio differ from each other more widely than such political forecasts usually do. The following estimate is made by a friend of the movement residing in Cincinnati, who appears to be among the more moderate of its supporters. "There are 30,000 voters in the State who favor a temperance movement of some kind; and of these 6000 will vote the straight Republican ticket, and attempt to obtain temperance legislation through that party; 9000 will vote the Republican ticket with the exception of Forster for Governor and Longworth for Supreme Judge; and the remaining 15,000 will support the entire Prohibition ticket. This will defeat the Republicans, or come so near it that the party will be obliged to respect their claims to guard against future defeat."

It would appear from this estimate that the utmost the Prohibitionists can do is to defeat the Republican ticket, which at the last election had a plurality of only 17,129. Under these circumstances it is doubtful whether the Prohibitionists will poll their full strength.

An Interesting Experiment with the Object of converting sterile lands into fruitful fields is about to be made. Commissioner Loring has requested Professor C. A. White, of Greeley, Colorado, and Professor Samuel Aughey, of Lincoln, Nebraska, to act as a commission, for the expenses of which Congress made an appropriation, to select a site for sinking experimental artesian wells in the arid regions east of the Rocky Mountains. Should the experiment prove successful, millions of acres on both sides of the Rocky Mountains, which are now absolutely sterile, would become productive. An examination of the soil by scientific men has resulted in the conviction that if a supply of water could be obtained, the fertility of that region would be extraordinary. If that result is achieved it will be a type of the period predicted in Scripture (Isa. 35 : 1).

Bishop Erastus Otis Haven, D.D., LL.D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church died at Salem, Oregon, on Tuesday, August 2d, after a brief illness. He was an active worker both with tongue and pen, and his death is the cause of profound grief through the whole M. E. Church. Bishop Haven was born at Boston, Mass., on November 1, 1820. Entering the itinerant ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1848 he was first stationed in New York and was a pastor until 1853, when he became a professor in the University of Michigan. He was also actively engaged in journalistic work. In 1862 he was elected a member of the Massachusetts Senate, serving two terms. He was also a member of the State Board of Education. In 1863 he became President of the University of Michigan, and held the position until 1869. He was next appointed President of the North-western University at Evanston, Ill., and continued to hold the office for three years. From 1872 to 1874 he was corresponding secretary of the Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1874 he was elected chancellor of Syracuse University, and in 1880 he was made a bishop. He was the author of several useful works, among which the best known are "The Young Man Advised" and "Pillars of Truth."

The following passage from a letter dated July 21st, Bishop Haven wrote to a friend, indicates the state of his mind in the presence of death. He wrote: "Allow me now to add that during every moment of my physical illness the Lord has consciously been with me, and I have had a peaceful assurance that He is mine and I am His."

Mrs. Garfield has Received $500 from England, in aid of the fund for the erection of the new Church of the Disciples in Washington, as an expression of sympathy and congratulation. Accompanying the gift was a letter stating that the money was the gift of four churches planted and aided largely by aid from American brethren, and concluded as follows: "We hope that this small contribution will be accepted by you for the purpose indicated, with the assurance that it comes from hearts full of gratitude to God for His merciful providence over you and yours. Be pleased to tender our hearty sympathy to your dear husband and assure him that while he is passing under the rod, his noble bearing, his Christian patience, his words of faith and hope and his sweet resignation to the Divine will, have been eloquently and effectually preaching to the whole world."

Guiteau has made a Formal Application to be released on bail. There is no probability of his request being granted, but it is an indication of the character of his mind. He does not appear to realize the enormity of his crime as a blow at national institutions as well as a personal attack on the President. He cannot be aware either of the sentiment with which he is regarded in the country; the jail is a place of safety for him, and even that requires to be strongly guarded. If he were set at liberty, as he asks, there is no doubt he would be lynched in less than twenty-four hours. The authorities at the jail say that his application for release is the first sign of insanity Guiteau has displayed since his arrest.

Leo Hartmann, the Nihilist, Left New York abruptly on Thursday last. He is said to have taken refuge in Canada. We have no extradition treaty with Russia, but the public conscience has been quickened by Guiteau's crime, and Hartmann appears to have arrived at the conclusion that he would be safer under the British flag than under the Stars and Stripes. The narrative published by Hartmann proved that he was a murderer in intent, and it was generally felt that the fact that his intended victim was an emperor and not a private citizen, ought not to be regarded as a palliation of his crime. There is no disposition manifest to curtail the hospitality we extend to political refugees, but there is a marked difference between a revolutionist and an assassin.

The Net Results of Prohibition in the State of Maine are summed by ex-Governor Dingley, who states that the number of dramshops has been reduced from one to every 225 inhabitants in 1833 to less than one secret groggery to every 1000 inhabitants in 1881, while the sales in these secret shops are less than one fourth what they would be in openly licensed saloons. He also states that the criminal records afford convincing proof of the benefits of prohibition; there being in Maine only one State prison convict to 2700 inhabitants. That proportion is lower than obtains in seven States which he mentions. The proportion in New York is one to 1400.

Dr. Andrew Bonar, the Eminent Scottish preacher, who has come to this country to attend the Bible Convention Mr. Moody has invited to his home at Northfield, preached in Chicago on July 31st. The service was held in Farwell Hall, where the Moody meetings used to be held. Mr. J. V Farwell presided. Major Whittle made a characteristically hearty and appropriate address. The special subject of the meeting was City Evangelization. Dr. Bonar's text was, "Raise the Dead" (Matt. 10 : 8). He reminded his hearers that they were commanded to "raise the dead!" He said: "Workers for Christ, lay this to heart. Make sure that you are going forth to raise the dead. See that you go forth Sabbath after Sabbath, every day, in this belief, to raise the dead. Ask yourselves, Have I raised any dead yet? There is no joy like doing this. Look at the light this command casts upon the proclamation of the Gospel. You want to go to those that are lying in their sins. You want to go through that valley of dry bones where the dry bones are, and where they are very dry. Give those dry bones life." A large audience listened attentively to Dr. Bonar's fervent discourse. The following day he set out for Northfield.

An Earnest Appeal for Increased Christian activity is made in the columns of a contemporary not usually disposed to take the pessimist view of the world's condition. The cause of the appeal is that owing to the "tremendous dangers now threatening our own land from immigration, ignorance, Communism, Socialism, Nihilism, Mormonism, Kearneyism, Spiritualism, Jesuitism, materialism, rationalism and almost every other evil ism which the fertile brain of man under the instigation of the devil has invented, there is now an unparalleled crisis upon us, and one whose demands it is, and must be, our first duty to meet." This admission, which is quite true, is observed and understood by the watchful Christian as a sign of the approaching advent of his Lord (2 Tim. 3 : 1–6).

A Gospel Ship now being Built by Mr. Ludlow, Clerk of the District Court of Seattle, W. T., is described in the Weekly Post of that city. The steamer is intended exclusively for gospel work on the North Pacific coast, and Mr. Ludlow, who has long contemplated the scheme, is defraying the entire cost. He intends to keep her cruising among the islands and along the coast of Washington Territory, British Columbia and Alaska, holding services, distributing reading matter, and doing general missionary work. She will be provided with a good library and a portable cabinet organ, and will carry a tent capable of holding 200 persons, so that a church can be erected in the wilderness at short notice. She will also act as a bethel ship among the sailors, coming to and going from the sound. It is designed to obviate the difficulties missionaries have hitherto experienced owing to the isolation of the people to be reached, their remoteness from the usual lines of communication and the long distances to be travelled.

The Secret Convention of Irishmen now in Session at Chicago adopted unusually stringent precautions to prevent its proceedings being made public. Sufficient information has however leaked out to show that it was convened to take into consideration the work of "the skirmishers." A Chicago paper says: "Their deliberations are not as to whether dynamite shall be used against England, but as to the most feasible way of using it. The discussion proved that these Irish patriots are as much devoted to their ideas as are the Nihilists, and that there would be no difficulty in finding Irishmen who would accept the possibility or even certainty of death if by it they might do great and serious damage to England. The plans were elaborated by which dynamite was to be furnished and used on vessels and in cities. They considered the question of how to get better manufactories of explosive machines in the United States and France. Their financial condition was reported as being sound." The treasury contains nearly $100,000 for a skirmishing fund, and committees have been appointed to provide for the future and levy a tax to raise more money. It is evident that the spirit of lawlessness which we gather from the prophecy of Daniel and the Apocalypse would be a sign of the approaching end of the age, is now being rapidly developed. It would be difficult to find a more accurate description of the ways of these men than Isaiah wrote (Isa. 59 : 6–8)—men whose feet run to evil and make haste to shed innocent blood, and in whose paths are wasting and destruction.

A Man was Frozen to Death in New York on Friday last. The statement at first sight is incredible, as that day was the hottest we have yet had this summer, but it appears that the heat was the indirect cause of the fatality. The deceased was a saloon keeper residing in Fourth Avenue. He attended to his business as usual on Friday, but was not seen alive by any one after he closed his premises at night. Next morning, however, he was found sitting on a chair in his ice-house frozen to death. It is supposed that he must have felt oppressed by the heat and entered the ice-house to obtain momentary relief. There he must have fallen asleep and so perished. His sad fate is a type of that spiritual death which has overtaken many of Satan's dupes. They excused themselves for indulging in worldly pleasures on the plea that relief from care and worry is necessary, and they soon become insensible of their danger, and fall an easy prey to the enemy of souls.

A Brave Engineer Saved the Lives of his passengers last week at serious risk to himself. A special despatch from Kokomo, Ind., says an eastbound passenger train on the Toledo, Delphos and Burlington Railway jumped the track on August 5th. The engine and baggage-car were overturned; the engineer was so severely scalded that he can hardly recover. He had opportunity to jump from his engine and save his own life, but by remaining at his post the passengers had a better chance for their lives. A deed of self-sacrifice, such as this, proves heroism of a high order, and is an illustration of the sacrifice offered for men (Rom. 5 : 8).

A Slave's Gratitude to his Former Master is described in a Virginia paper in a letter from Salem, Va., which says: "One of the most remarkable characters of the day arrived here on Friday night—a colored man named William Key, from Shelbyville, Tenn. When the war closed he found himself free, and his old master and mistress penniless. His former owner had given him a fair education while a slave, which he made use of by entering college and becoming a veterinary surgeon and physician. With the knowledge thus gained he invented a liniment, the sale of which has netted him a fortune. He now showed his sense of his obligation to his benefactors for the education by means of which he had attained his wealth. He never lost sight of his old master and mistress, but kept them up in their former style of living while they remained on earth. He then undertook the education of their son by sending him to college. This is one of the most remarkable instances of the fulfilment of the Scriptural promise that bread cast upon the waters shall be found after many days (Eccles. 11 : 1)

A Prayer for Rain was Quickly Answered at Albany, Ga., on Sunday, July 31st. The secular local papers call attention to the fact as "a curious coincidence" that the pastors of all the churches in the city, without previous understanding, prayed for rain, and hardly had their benedictions been pronounced, when a little cloud gathered over the sweltering city, others gathered to it, and a refreshing, plentiful shower descended. These curious coincidences are so frequent that if they occurred in natural and worldly concerns they would be characterized by a name which more accurately describes them.

A Delicate Instrument is Used for Weighing gold at the Assay Office. It is said that the scales are so minutely exact that when balanced with two pieces of paper of equal size in the pans, if a name be written with lead-pencil on one it will add enough weight to the paper to turn the scales. The illustration used to exemplify the accuracy of this instrument is suggestive. It reminds us that at the day when all men will be judged according to the deeds done in the body, the deciding difference between the saved and the lost will be the name of Jesus written on the heart.

FAITH: WHAT IS IT? HOW CAN IT BE OBTAINED?

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. Preached on Sunday Morning, July 17, 1881.

"By grace are ye saved through faith."—EPHESIANS 2 : 8.

Grace the Fountain—Faith a Conduit-Pipe—A Negro's Blunder—I. How Can we Obtain and Increase Our Faith?—By Prayer—Hearing—Receiving Testimony—Other Methods—A Foreman and His Employer.

I MEAN to dwell mainly upon that expression, "Through faith." I call attention, however, first of all, to the fountain head of our salvation, which is the grace of God. "By grace are ye saved." Because God is gracious, therefore sinful men are forgiven, converted, purified and saved. It is not because of anything in them, or that ever can be in them, that they are saved; but because of the boundless love, goodness, pity, compassion, mercy, and grace of God. Right well remember this, for else you may fall into error by fixing your minds so much upon the faith which is the channel of salvation as to forget the grace which is the fountain and source even of faith itself. Faith is the work of God's grace in us. Grace is the first and last moving cause of salvation, and faith, important as it is, is only an important part of the machinery which grace employs. We are saved "through faith," but it is "by grace."

Faith occupies the position of a channel or conduit-pipe. Grace is the fountain and the stream; faith is the aqueduct along which the flood of mercy flows down to refresh the thirsty sons of men. It is a great pity when the aqueduct is broken. It is said sight to see around Rome the many noble aqueducts which no longer convey water into the city, because the arches are broken and the marvellous structures are in ruins. The aqueduct must be kept entire to convey the current; and, even so, faith must be true and sound, leading right up to God and coming right down to ourselves, that it may become a serviceable channel of mercy to our souls.

Still, I again remind you that faith is the channel or aqueduct, and not the fountain head, and we must not look so much to it as to exalt it above the divine source of all blessing which lies in the grace of God. Never make a Christ out of your faith, nor think of it as if it were the independent source of your salvation. Our life is found, in "looking unto Jesus," not in looking to our own faith. By faith all things become possible to us; yet the power is not in the faith, but in the God upon whom faith relies.

However, it is a very important thing that we look well to the channel, and therefore at this time we will consider it, as God, the Holy Ghost, shall enable us. Faith, what is it? Faith, why is it selected as the channel of blessing? Faith, how can it be obtained and increased?

I. Faith,

WHAT IS IT?

What is this faith concerning which it is said, "By grace are ye saved through faith?" There are many descriptions of faith, but almost all the definitions I have met with have made me understand it less than I did before I saw them. The negro said when he read the chapter that he would confound it, and it is very likely that he did so, though he meant to expound it. So, brethren, we may explain faith till nobody understands it. I hope I shall not be guilty of that fault. Faith is the simplest of all things, and perhaps because of its simplicity it is the more difficult to explain.

What is faith? It is MADE UP OF THREE THINGS

—knowledge, belief, and trust. Knowledge comes first. Romanist divines hold that a man can believe what he does not know. Perhaps a Romanist can; but I cannot. "How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard?" I want to be informed of a fact before I can possibly believe it. I believe this, I believe that; but I cannot say that I believe a great many things of which I have never heard. "Faith cometh by hearing:" we must first hear, in order that we may know what is to be believed. "They that know thy name will put their trust in thee." A measure of knowledge is essential to faith: hence the importance of getting knowledge. "Incline your ear, and come unto me; hear, and your soul shall live"

Search the Scriptures and learn what the Holy Spirit teacheth concerning Christ and His salvation. Seek to know God, "that God is, and is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." May He give you "the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord." Know the gospel: know what the good news is, how it talks of free forgiveness, and of change of heart, of adoption into the family of God, and of countless other blessings. Know God, know His gospel, and know especially Christ Jesus the Son of God, the Saviour of men, united to us by His human nature, and united to God, seeing He is divine, and thus able to act as mediator between God and man, able to lay His hand upon both, and to be the connecting link between the sinner and the Judge of all the earth.

Endeavor to know more and more of Christ. After Paul had been converted more than twenty years, he tells the Philippians that he desired to know Christ; and depend upon it, the more we know of Jesus, the more we shall wish to know of Him, that so our faith in Him may increase. Endeavor especially to know the doctrine of the sacrifice of Christ, for that is at which faith aims; that is the point upon which saving faith mainly fixes itself, that "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them."

Then the mind goes on to believe that these things are true. The soul believes that God is, and that He hears the cries of sincere hearts; that the gospel is from God; that justification by faith is the grand truth that God hath revealed in these last days by His Spirit more clearly than before. Then the heart believes that Jesus is verily and in truth our God and Saviour, the Redeemer of men, the prophet, priest, and king unto His people. Dear hearers, I pray that you may at once come to this. Get firmly to believe that "the blood of Jesus Christ, God's dear Son, cleanseth us from all sin;" that His sacrifice is complete and fully accepted of God on man's behalf, so that he that believeth on Jesus is not condemned.

So far you have made an advance toward faith, and one more ingredient is needed to complete it, which is trust. Commit yourself to the merciful God; rest your hope on the gracious gospel; trust your soul on the dying and living Saviour; wash away your sins in the atoning blood; accept His perfect righteousness, and all is well. Trust is the life-blood of faith: there is no saving faith without it. The Puritans were accustomed to explain faith by the word "recumbency." You know what it means. You see me leaning upon this rail, leaning with all my weight upon it; even thus lean upon Christ. It would be a better illustration still if I were to stretch myself at full length and rest my whole person upon a rock, lying flat upon it. Fall flat upon Christ. Cast yourself upon Him, rest in Him, commit yourself to Him. That done, you have exercised saving faith.

Faith is not a blind thing; for faith begins with knowledge. It is not a speculative thing; for faith believes facts of which it is sure. It is not an unpractical, dreamy thing; for faith trusts, and stakes its destiny upon the truth of revelation. Faith ventures its all upon the truth of God; it is not a pleasant word to use, but the poet employed it, and it suggests my meaning:

"Venture on him, venture wholly;
Let no other trust intrude."

That is one way of describing what faith is: I wonder whether I have "confounded" it already.

Let me try again. Faith is believing that Christ is what He is said to be. Faith also believes that Christ will do what He has promised; that if He has promised to cast out none that come to Him, it is certain that He will not cast us out if we come to Him. Faith believes that if Jesus said, "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life," it must be true; and if we get this living water from Christ it will abide in us, and will well up within us in streams of holy life. Whatever Christ has promised to do He will do, and we must believe this so as to look for pardon, justification, preservation, and eternal glory from His hands, according as He has promised.

Then comes

THE NEXT NECESSARY STEP.

Jesus is what He is said to be, Jesus will do what He says He will do; therefore we must each one trust Him, saying, "He will be to me what He says He is, and He will do to me what He has promised to do; I leave myself in the hands of Him who is appointed to save, that He may save me. I rest upon His promise that He will do even as He has said." This is a saving faith, and he that hath it hath everlasting life.

But now I thought, as it was a very hot and heavy morning, that I had better give you a number of illustrations, lest anybody should be inclined to go to sleep. If anybody should be drowsy, will his next neighbor just nudge him a little by accident; for it may be as well while we are here to be awake, especially with such a subject on hand as this.

Faith exists in various degrees, according to the amount of knowledge, or other cause. Sometimes faith is little more than a simple clinging to Christ: a sense of dependence, and a willingness so to depend. When you are down at the seaside, as we might all of us wish to be, you will see the limpet sticking to the rock; you walk with a soft tread up to the rock with your walking stick and strike the limpet with a rapid blow, and off he comes. Try the next limpet in that way. You have given him warning; he heard the blow with which you struck his neighbor, and he clings with all his might. You will never get him off; not you! Strike, and strike again, but you may as soon break the rock.

Our little friend, the limpet, does not know much, but he clings.

He cannot tell us much about what he is clinging to, he is not acquainted with the geological formation of the rock, but he clings. He has found something to cling to, that is his little bit of knowledge, and he uses it by clinging to the rock of his salvation; it is the limpet's life to cling. Thousands of God's people have no more faith than this; they know enough to cling to Jesus with all their heart and soul, and this suffices. Jesus Christ is to them a Saviour strong and mighty, and like a rock immovable and immutable; they cleave to Him for dear life, and this

CLINGING SAVES THEM.

God gives to His people the propensity to cling. Look at the sweet pea which grows in your garden. Perhaps it has fallen down upon the gravel walk. Lift it up against the laurel or the trellis, or put a stick near it, and it catches hold directly, because there are little hooks ready prepared with which it grasps anything which comes in its way: it was meant to grow upward, and so it is provided with tendrils. Every child of God has his tendrils about him—thoughts, and desires, and hopes, with which he hooks on to Christ and the promise. Though this is a very simple sort of faith, it is a very complete and effectual form of it, and, in fact, it is the heart of all faith, and that to which we are often driven when we are in deep trouble, or when our mind is somewhat bemuddled by our being sickly or depressed in spirit. We can cling when we can do nothing else, and that is the very soul of faith. Cling, then! Cling to Jesus; for that is faith.

Another form of faith is this, in which a man depends upon another from a knowledge of the superiority of that other, and follows him. I do not think the limpet knows much about the rock, but in this next phase of faith there is more knowledge. A blind man trusts himself with his guide because he knows that his friend can see, and trusting, he walks where his guide conducts him.

Every boy that goes to school has to exert faith while learning. His schoolmaster teaches him geography, and instructs him as to the form of the earth, and the existence of certain great cities and empires. The boy does not himself know that these things are true, except that he believes his teacher, and the books put into his hands. That is what you will have to do with Christ if you are to be saved—you must just know because He tells you, and believe because He assures you it is even so, and trust yourself with Him because He promises you that salvation will be the result.

Another and a higher form of faith is that faith which grows out of love. Why does a boy trust his father? You and I know a little more about his father than he does, and we do not rely upon him quite so implicitly; but the reason why the child trusts his father is because he loves him. Blessed and happy are they who have a sweet faith in Jesus,

INTERTWINED WITH DEEP AFFECTION.

The way of loving trust in the Saviour may thus be illustrated. A lady is the wife of the most eminent physician of the day. She is seized with a dangerous illness, and is smitten down by its power; yet she is wonderfully calm and quiet, for her husband has made this disease his special study, and has healed thousands similarly afflicted. She is not in the least troubled, for she feels perfectly safe in the hands of one so dear to her, in whom skill and love are blended in their highest forms. Her faith is reasonable and natural. This is the kind of faith which the happiest of believers exercise toward Christ.

Faith also realizes the presence of the living God and Saviour, and thus it breeds in the soul a beautiful calm and quiet, like that which was seen in a little child in the time of tempest. Her mother was alarmed, but the sweet girl was pleased; she clapped her hands with delight. Standing at the window when the flashes came most vividly, she cried in childish accents, "Look, mamma! How beautiful! How beautiful!" Her mother said, "My dear, come away, the lightning is terrible;" but she begged to be allowed to look out and see the lovely light which God was making all over the sky, for she was sure God would not do his little child any harm. "But hearken to the terrible thunder," said her mother. "Did you not say, mamma, that God was speaking in the thunder?" Yes," said her trembling parent. "O," said the darling, "how nice it is to hear Him. He talks very loud, but I think it is because He wants the deaf people to hear Him. Is it not so, mamma?" Thus she went talking on; as merry as a bird was she, for God was real to her, and she trusted Him. To her the lightning was God's beautiful light, and the thunder was God's wonderful voice, and she was happy. I dare say her mother knew a good deal about the laws of nature and the energy of electricity; and little was the comfort which her knowledge brought her. The child's knowledge was less showy, but it was far more certain and precious.

We are so conceited nowadays that we are too proud to be comforted by self-evident truth, and prefer to make ourselves wretched with questionable theories. Hood sang a deep spiritual truth when he merrily said,

"I remember, I remember,
The fir trees dark and high;
I used to think their slender tops
Were close against the sky;
It was a childish ignorance,
But now 'tis little joy
To know I'm farther off from heav'n
Than when I was a boy."

A firm form of faith arises out of assured knowledge; this comes of growth in grace, and is the faith which believes Christ because it knows Him, trusts Him because it has proved Him to be infallibly faithful. This faith asks not for signs and tokens, but bravely believes. Look at the faith of the master mariner—I have often wondered at it. He looses his cable, he steams away from the shore. For days, weeks, or even months he never sees sail or shore, yet on he goes day and night without fear, till one morning he finds himself just opposite to the desired haven toward which he has been steering. How has he found his way over the trackless deep? He has trusted in his compass, his nautical almanac, his glass, and the heavenly bodies, and, obeying their guidance, without sighting shore, he has steered so accurately that he has not to change a point to get into port.

It is a wonderful thing that sailing without sight. Spiritually it is a blessed thing to leave the shores of sight, and say, "Good-bye to inward feelings, cheering providences, signs, tokens, and so forth: I believe in God, and I steer for heaven straight away." "Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed:" to them shall be administered an abundant entrance at the last, and a safe voyage on the way.

This is the faith which makes it easy to commit our soul and all its eternal interests into the Saviour's keeping. One man goes to the bank and puts his money into it with a measure of confidence; but another has looked into the bank's accounts, and has been behind the scenes and made sure of its having a large reserve of well-invested capital; he puts in his money with the utmost assurance. He knows and is established in his faith, and so he cheerfully commits his all to the banks. Even so, we who know Christ are glad to place our whole being in His hands, knowing that He is able to keep us even unto the end.

God gives us more and more of an assured confidence in Jesus until it comes to be an unwavering faith, so that we never doubt, but unquestioningly believe. Look at the ploughman; he labors with his plough in the wintry months, when there is not a bough on the tree nor a bird that sings to cheer him, and after he has ploughed he takes the precious corn from the granary, of which perhaps he hath little enough, and he buries it in the furrows, assured that it will come up again. Because he has seen a harvest fifty times already he looks for another, and in faith he scatters the precious grain.

To all appearance, the most absurd thing that ever was done by mortal man is to throw away good corn, burying it in the ground. If you had never seen or heard of its results, it would seem the way of waste and not the work of husbandry; yet the farmer has no doubt, he longs to be allowed to cast away his seed, in faith he even covets fair weather that he may bury his corn; and if you tell him that he is doing an absurd thing, he smiles at your ignorance, and tells you that thus harvests come. This is a fair picture of the faith which grows of experience: it helps us to act in a manner contrary to appearances, it leads us to commit our all to the keeping of Christ, burying our hopes and our very lives with Him in joyful confidence that if we be dead with Him we shall live with Him. Jesus Christ who rose from the dead will raise us up through His death unto newness of life, and give us a harvest of joy and peace.

II. Thus far have I done my best to answer what faith is; we shall now inquire, as the channel of salvation? "By grace are ye saved through faith." It becomes us to be modest in answering such a question, for God's ways are not always to be understood; but, as far as we can tell, faith has been selected as the channel of grace because there is a natural adaptation in faith to be used as the receiver. Do let me put this very plainly. Faith which receives Christ is as simple an act as when your child receives an apple from you, because you hold it out and promise to give it the apple if it comes for it. The belief and the receiving relate only to an apple, but they make up precisely the same act as the faith which deals with eternal salvation, and what the child's hand is to the apple, that your faith is to the perfect salvation of Christ. The child's hand does not make the apple, nor alter the apple, it only takes it; and faith is chosen by God to be the receiver of salvation, because it does not pretend to make salvation, nor to help in it, but it receives it.

WHY FAITH IS SELECTED

Next, God selects faith as the channel of salvation because it is a sure method, linking man with God. When man confides in God there is a point of union between them, and that union guarantees blessing. Faith saves us because it makes us cling to God, and so brings us into connection with Him. When a man trusts to his works, or to sacraments, or to anything of that sort, he will not be saved, because there is no junction between him and Christ; but faith, though it may seem to be like a slender cord, is in the hand of the great God on the shore side; infinite power pulls in the connecting line, and thus draws the man from destruction. Oh, the blessedness of faith, because it unites us to God!

Faith is chosen, again, because it touches the springs of action. I wonder whether I shall be wrong if I say that we never do anything except through faith of some sort. If I walk across this platform it is because I believe my legs will carry me. A man eats because he believes in the necessity of food. Columbus discovered America because he believed that there was another continent beyond the ocean; many another grand deed has also been born of faith, for faith works wonders. Commoner things are done on the same principle; faith in its natural form, is an all-prevailing force. God gives salvation to our faith, because He has thus touched the secret spring of all our emotions and actions.

III. We close with the third point:

HOW CAN WE OBTAIN AND INCREASE OUR FAITH?

A very earnest question this to many. They say they want to believe but cannot. A great deal of nonsense is talked upon this subject. Let us be practical in our dealing with it. "What am I to do in order to believe?" The shortest way is to believe, and if the Holy Spirit has made you honest and candid, you will believe as soon as the truth is set before you. Anyhow, the gospel command is clear: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

But still, if you have a difficulty, take it before God in prayer. Tell the great Father exactly what it is that puzzles you, and beg Him by His Holy Spirit to solve the question. If I cannot believe a statement in a book I am glad to inquire of the author what He meant, and if He is a true man His explanation will satisfy me; much more will the divine explanation satisfy the heart of the true seeker. The Lord is willing to make himself known; go to Him, and see if it be not so.

Furthermore, if faith seem difficult, it is possible that God the Holy Spirit will enable you to believe if you hear very frequently and earnestly that which you are commanded to believe. We believe many things because we have heard them so often. Do you not find it so in common life, that if you hear a thing fifty times a day, at last you come to believe it? Some men have come to believe that which is false by this process: I should not wonder but what God often blesses this method in working faith concerning that which is true, for it is written, "Faith cometh by hearing." If I earnestly and attentively hear the gospel, it may be that one of these days I shall find myself believing that which I hear, through the blessed operation of the Spirit upon my mind.

If that, however, should seem poor advice, I would add next, consider the testimony of others. The Samaritans believed because of what the woman told them concerning Jesus. Many of our beliefs arise out of the testimony of others. I believe that there is such a country as Japan; I never saw it, and yet I believe that there is such a place because others have been there. I believe I shall die; I have never died, but a great many have done so whom I once knew, and I have a conviction that I shall die also; the testimony of many convinces me of this fact. Listen, then, to those who tell you how they were saved, how they were pardoned, how they have been changed in character: if you will but listen you will find that somebody just like yourself has been saved. If you have been a thief, you will find that a thief rejoiced to wash away his sin in the fountain of Christ's blood. You that have been unchaste in life, you will find that men who have fallen that way have been cleansed and changed. If you are in despair, you have only to get among God's people, and inquire a little, and some who have been equally in despair with yourself will tell you how He saved them. As you listen to one after another of those who have tried the Word of God, and proved it, the divine Spirit will lead you to believe.

A better plan still is this: Note the authority upon which you are commanded to believe, and this will greatly help you. The authority is not mine, or you might well reject it. It is not even the pope's, or you might even reject that. But you are commanded to believe upon the authority of God Himself. He bids you believe in Jesus Christ, and you must not refuse to obey your Maker. The foreman of a certain works in the North had often heard the gospel, but he was troubled with the fear that he might not come to Christ. His good master one day sent a card round to the works—immediately after work." The foreman appeared at his master's door, and the master came out, and said, somewhat roughly, "What do you want, John, troubling me at this time? Work is done, what right have you here?" "Sir," said he, "I had a card from you saying that I was to come after work." "Do you mean to say that merely because you had a card from me you are to come up to my house and call me out after business hours?" "Well, sir," replied the foreman, "I do not understand you, but it seems to me that, as you sent for me, I had a right to come."

"COME TO MY HOUSE

"Come in, John,' said his master; "I have another message that I want to read to you," and he sat down and read these words—"'Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' Do you think after such a message from Christ that you can be wrong in going to Him?" The poor man saw it all at once, and believed, because he saw that he had good warrant and authority for believing. So have you, poor soul; you have good authority for coming to Christ, for the Lord Himself bids you trust Him.

If that does not settle you, think over what it is that you have to believe, that the Lord Jesus Christ suffered in the room and place and stead of men, and is able to save all who trust Him. Why, this is the most blessed fact that ever men were told to believe; the most suitable, the most comforting, the most divine truth that ever was set before men. I advise you to think much upon it, and search out the grace and love which it contains. Study the four Evangelists, study Paul's epistles, and then see if the message is not such a credible one that you are forced to believe it.

If that does not do, then think upon the person of Jesus Christ—think of who He is and what He did, and where He is now, and what He is now; think often and deeply. When He, even such an one as He, bids you trust Him, surely then your heart will be persuaded.

If none of these things avail, then there is something wrong about you altogether, and my last word is, submit yourself to God! May the Spirit of God take away your enmity and make you yield. You are a rebel, a proud rebel, and that is why you do not believe your God. Give up your rebellion; throw down your weapons; yield at discretion; surrender to your King. I believe that never did a soul throw up its hands in self-despair, and cry, "Lord, I yield," but what faith became easy to it before long. It is because you still have a quarrel with God, and intend to have your own will and your own way, that therefore you cannot believe. "How can ye believe," said Christ, "that have honor one of another?" Proud self creates unbelief. Submit, O man. Yield to your God, and, then shall you sweetly believe in your Saviour. God bless you, for Christ's sake, and bring you at this very moment to believe in the Lord Jesus. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Ephesians 2.]

NOTE BY REV. C. H. SPURGEON.—While revising this sermon I felt moved to ask the readers to circulate it. I tried to be very simple, and I think I succeeded. If you, dear reader, think the sermon likely to show the way of salvation to those around you, will you not get extra copies and give them away? The preacher of the sermon and the giver of it will rejoice together if, by their united effort, men are led to faith in Jesus.

Marian's Lover Indicted.

News of the Prodigal's Disgrace.

MARIAN'S INFATUATION.

"THERE is proof positive," said Mrs. Stanley, "do not trust your future, Marian, to a man who has deceived you already."

The words were spoken by a middle-aged lady, a widow, to her young friend, Marian Towers, as she handed her a letter during a morning walk through the park which surrounded Mrs. Stanley's home. Marian was engaged to be married to George Conyers, a young man with whom she had had but a very brief acquaintance. He was not a godly man, and Marian's friends were averse to the match. They loved the bright, vivacious girl and watched her lover with the keen scrutiny his aspirations to Marian's hand prompted. The result of the scrutiny was unsatisfactory, for it convinced them that he was shallow, capricious, and heartless. But Marian was captivated, and resolved to leave all for her brilliant lover. Partly to separate the young people for a time, and partly that Mrs. Stanley might have an opportunity of exerting her influence, Marian was induced to pay a brief visit to the widow, who with her brother, an officer in the British army, resided in the neighborhood.

Mrs. Stanley gave the infatuated girl a hearty welcome and her brother treated her with paternal tenderness. After a time they approached the subject which filled all their minds, and with much tact and kindness urged their visitor to withdraw from her engagement. But Marian was firm; she believed they were mistaken, and that George Conyers was a good and honorable man.

At last it so happened that documentary proof came into Mrs. Stanley's possession, which left no doubt whatever that he had grossly deceived Marian as to some property of which he declared himself the possessor. Marian was greatly shocked and startled as Mrs. Stanley showed her the paper which contained the evidence of his guilt, but still she was obstinate. "George may have been betrayed into a momentary breach of good faith," she said, "but no one who looks into his honest face, and knows him as well as I do, can doubt that he is a good-hearted fellow after all, and will outlive the effects of this mistake. Anyhow, I shall not give him up."

She stuck to her resolution, and was married to George. The couple went abroad, and nothing was heard of them by their English friends, until one day, six years afterward, a forlorn and wretched woman was picked up in a fainting condition in one of the principal streets of Madras by an officer who thought he recognized the voice and features of the hapless stranger. It was none other than Marian, and the officer was Mrs. Stanley's brother.

Ruined in health, penniless, broken-hearted, and despairing, poor Marian could scarcely have been in a sadder plight. "I know not," said the gallant officer in a letter to his sister, "how I could have lightened Marian's crushing burden if I had not been able to point her to Him who is the great burden-bearer, and who ever finds His gracious opportunity in our direst extremity. I visited her frequently during her long illness, and am satisfied that nothing in the world could have brought relief to her wounded spirit, but the story of Him who, as our great High Priest, is touched with the feeling of our infirmity. She died yesterday, calmly and peacefully relying on Jesus, but solemnly beseeching me to warn all the young people under my influence against tempting God by connecting themselves with the ungodly. 'Tell them,' she said, 'that the best of all mottoes is this, In all thy ways acknowledge Him and He shall direct thy paths'" (Prov. 3 : 6).

FRANK MORRIS AND HIS PRODIGAL SON.

FRANK MORRIS was a wealthy merchant, whose chief ambition it was that his family should be thoroughly well trained in all the acquirements and accomplishments that win the good word of society. Himself a man of refined taste, he had an almost morbid dread of everything that looked like ignorance of what a well-bred man of the world ought to know. "Nearly all the evils of life," he used to say, "proceed in one way or another from ignorance or want of taste. Lord Chesterfield was quite right on that head. What he wrote to his son, is pretty much what I say to mine."

Mr. Morris had many undoubted virtues. He loved his children, and since the death of their mother had made a point of spending as much time with them as possible. His fine ear for music and the force of long habit had made him an uncommonly skilled musician. Nothing pleased him better, when the business of the day was over, than to take up his fine old violin and awaken strains with which even the most exacting of critics could find little fault. But he knew nothing of that deeper harmony which dwells in a heart at peace with itself and with God.

That portion of his history which more especially concerns us at present reached a crisis one beautiful summer's evening which he was spending with his daughters. He had just been refreshing himself with a noble strain by one of the great masters, when a servant knocked at the drawing-room door, and delivered a letter which overwhelmed him in a moment. His only son, now nineteen years of age, of whom he had always been extremely proud, had fallen into terrible disgrace. In order to meet a number of debts incurred in a course of gambling, George had committed forgery, and was awaiting his trial in a French prison. With all his self-command, and almost stoical indifference under disasters, Mr. Morris seemed completely stunned by the blow.

With a deep groan, such as his children had never heard from him before, he buried his face in his hands, and it was some before he uttered a single word; but the children noticed that big tears fell from their father's eyes, and that he was indifferent even to the caresses of the little one whose prattle even in his most depressed moments had never until now seemed unwelcome.

He had, in truth, been wounded in his most sensitive part. Every one regarded George as a youth of great promise, and Mr. Morris had spared neither money nor personal trouble in his education. At school and college he had been thoroughly drilled in the subjects most important for one intended for the Bar, and had already displayed a persuasive eloquence and an interest in legal lore which experienced lawyers pronounced evidence of capacity far above mediocrity.

The blow was a crushing one, and as the merchant hastily gathered a few necessary things together for a journey to the city where his boy was imprisoned, he could think of nothing but the disgrace. But during his solitary journey other thoughts gradually obtained possession of his mind. He tried to trace out the steps George had taken to his deplorable position. "How had the boy first gone wrong?" the father asked himself. "Had his home training been of a character fitted to arm him against temptation?" His taste had been cultivated, but in those hours of solitary meditation the father saw that refined taste was a poor safeguard in the world. His moral nature had been neglected, and he resolved that if he could have the privilege of once more guiding his son's footsteps that defect should be remedied.

Arrived at George's prison, Mr. Morris carefully studied the evidence against his son. He found that George was guilty, but that legal proof of his guilt was lacking. He therefore went to the prosecutor, and on payment of the sum of money which had been lost in the transaction was able to effect his son's release.

It was indeed a bitter cup that Mr. Morris was thus called upon to drain, but its contents proved most healthful medicine. The complete breakdown of George's career led to a complete revolution in the principles of his paternal training. He determined that henceforth he would teach his family to regard a high-toned morality as more important beyond all comparison than any acquirement, however valuable, or any accomplishment, however graceful. Humanly speaking, he might have rested in this conviction until another serious breakdown revealed its insufficiency, but for the circumstance that his eldest daughter, now verging toward womanhood, had been converted under the teaching of a pious governess.

Mr. Morris's birthday was approaching, and his daughter, who loved him with all a daughter's affection, cast about in her mind as to the way in which she could both please and benefit her father on that day. Praying that she might be the means of leading him to Christ, she beautifully embroidered a card with his favorite flowers and wrote in the middle, words which she had found marked in a much-prized book of her mother's:

"Talk they of morals? O Thou bleeding Lamb,
Thou Maker of new morals for mankind,
The grand morality is love of Thee?"

Mr. Morris was greatly struck with the words, and when he learned that they had been underlined by the wife whose memory was so dear to him, it seemed the lines were a message from the eternal world. He was led, step by step, to clearer and clearer apprehension of their deep meaning, until at length he could rejoice in the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

For many years his prodigal son continued to be a source of the deepest anxiety, but ultimately the prayers of a converted father, a glorified mother, and God-fearing sisters were heard, and George, too, came to know "the love of Christ which passeth knowledge," and became the joy of his father's old age.

THE ADVENT PARABLES.

By Rev. Richard Chester, A.B.

II. The Talents—The Judgment of the Saints—When it will Take Place—The Place—Its Character.

II.—THE TALENTS.

In the preceding parable our blessed Lord has conveyed a solemn practical lesson to each of His disciples individually concerning personal watchfulness and individual readiness for His Advent for His saints, and has strikingly illustrated the attitude of mind and the character of conduct in which that watchfulness and readiness specially consist. He has also represented the rapture to the heavens of these watchful, ready saints, under the figure of the wise virgins going in with the bridegroom to the marriage.

In the immediately succeeding parable of the Talents He proceeds, in the same strain of practical personal application of the solemn truths connected with His coming, to illustrate that according to their works, which we so plainly learn from other Scriptures they shall undergo. In so doing He conveys most important instruction concerning—1. The relative time at which that judgment shall take place. 2. Inferentially but clearly concerning the place where it shall be carried on. 3. Concerning the character of that judgment, what it is, and what it is not, to be. 4. Concerning its result.

1. The relative time of this judgment.—It will be after the Lord shall have "received the kingdom and returned." This we learn from the closely corresponding and analogous parable of "the Pounds" (Luke 19: 11–27). It will be subsequent to that inauguration scene in heaven of the bestowal of the kingdoms of this world by "the ancient of days" upon the Son of Man, foreshown in vision to Daniel (7: 13. 14), as also to the first stage of His "return" to take possession of the kingdom, which will consist, as we learn from 1 Thessalonians 4: 16, 17, in a descent from the highest heaven—the place "far above all heavens" (Ephesians 4: 10)—where He is now at the right hand of God, to the lower heaven, or "air," or atmosphere which surrounds this earth, in order to gather there His dead and living saints. But it will be before "He shall have come in His glory to the earth, and shall have taken His seat upon the throne of His earthly glory, and shall have gathered before Him all the nations." This we are expressly taught by the passage immediately following this parable (verses 31 to the end).

The exact accordance between this, the direct teaching of our blessed Lord upon this subject, and the more inferential teaching of many other portions of the New Testament Scriptures, is especially worthy of notice.

2. THE PLACE

where this judgment shall be carried on.—If the wise virgins of the preceding parable represent the raptured saints, and the faithful servants of the parable of the talents represent these same saints being reckoned with before the Lord previous to His and their descent to the earth, when the judgment set before us in the subsequent parable of the sheep and the goats shall take place, then the place and scene of this judgment, or reckoning, must be, not the earth, but the heavens.

That it will be so seems to be the teaching of Revelation 19, 20, where we find the descent with the Lord of the previously raptured saints to the earth, the destruction of the Antichrist, and the false prophet, and the kings, the armies, and people confederate with them, the binding of Satan, the taking possession of the kingdom, and the reigning over it by the Lord and His saints. But where we do not find a word of any judgment or reckoning with these saints, or of any assignment to them of their several positions in the kingdom. All this, we therefore conclude, must previously have occurred above.

3. The character of that judgment, what it is not, and what it is, to be.—It is to be a judgment "according to works," its object being to "know how much every man has gained by trading" (see Luke 19: 15). It is not therefore a judgment having any reference to the entrance, or the non-entrance into eternal life. Eternal life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ received through faith, and without any reference whatsoever to the merits or demerits, the works good or bad, present or future, of those who enter into it. It is irreversibly theirs from the moment at which they have by faith taken hold upon the Lord Jesus Christ.

This judgment has for its object to determine the position in eternal life of those who shall have previously—many of them long previously—entered into it. Neither is it to be a judgment with respect to the sins which, either previous or subsequent to their conversion to Christ, the subjects of it have committed. All these have been blotted out in the atoning blood of their Redeemer. Concerning all these the promise stands secure, "Their sins and their inquities will I remember no more." It will be—so we are expressly taught—a reckoning with and a rewarding of each individual servant according to what he has done with the talents—the various gifts and graces, and the opportunities for turning such to account, which have been in this life afforded him.

As the individual members of the Church, which in her corporate capacity is "the bride, the Lamb's wife," have been, in the previous parable represented by "the Virgins" waiting and watching for the bridegroom's coming, to teach us that we are to wait and to watch, so in this parable these same individual members are represented by "the servants," working during their master's absence, to teach us that we are also to work, to "occupy till He comes."

Thus every believing child of God is also a servant of God, having work, wisely, lovingly adapted to his ability, appointed him to do. Thus all have gifts, some many, some few, to be used; all have talents, some more, some less, to be consecrated; influence, some much, some little, to be exercised; opportunities, some great and varied, others small and circumscribed, to be employed, to and for, and in, the Master's blessed service. Of each and all of such we are here impressively taught they will have to give account. While the corresponding parable of "the Pounds" (Luke 19), gives further the encouraging and stimulating assurance that he who of his two talents has gained but two talents more, he who of the one pound has gained but five pounds, no less than the gainers of the ten talents and the ten pounds—provided only that they have been earnest workers, faithful workers, equally with them—shall hear the inconceivably joyous utterance from that Master's loving lips: "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things; I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

THE FUTURE OF THE JEWS.

Notes of an Address Delivered at the Conference at Mildmay, London, on June 23.

By Rev. John Wilkinson.

The Earl of Cavan, who presided at the meeting, said: The condition of the Jews is little understood by the majority of Christian people; but though, to use the Apostle's language, "they were cut off for a time," God will speedily ingather them. Let us do what we can by earnest prayer and continual effort to lead them to Christ.

The Rev. John Wilkinson said: I wish to take for the basis of my remarks this afternoon the 11th chapter of the Romans—one of the deepest and most important chapters relating to Jews and Gentiles to be found in the New Testament. In the first four verses the Apostle carries backward the minds of the Jewish Christians to the time of Elijah, and forward to the Millennial reign of our Lord Jesus Christ. In a time of general apostacy then there was a "remnant" who did not bow the knee to the false god Baal, so even among the Jews to-day there is "a remnant according to the election of grace." Now, the teaching of the Word of God is that this "remnant" is to be gathered in during this present dispensation. The question, therefore, arises, By what means? By whose instrumentality? By Christians, most certainly. The Scripturally ordained means must be used by every individual Christian, and to overlook our responsibility, or neglect to use the means, is to delay the coming of Christ, and God does and will hold each one of us responsible in the matter.

Be it remembered—and the thought is a very solemn one—this is the only dispensation in which God will honor Gentile Christians for the spiritual enlightenment and help of the Jews; so that whatever we see necessary to be done, should be done with the utmost diligence. In the Millennium the Jews themselves will be the evangelists, and teachers, and pastors of the world. Other work of an important, but secondary character, will be assigned to us as Gentiles, but to the Jews will be delegated the honor of bringing the millennial inhabitants of the earth to the saving knowledge of Christ.

In what sense is it true, in verses 6 to 12, that "the Jews are fallen, and cast away; and in what manner is it true also that they are not fallen and cast away." The reason is that the ancient people were an elected people, elected nationally from among the nations of the earth; just so in a national sense, and in that only, has God "cast away Israel" for a time. They are not rejected by God from a personal and individual participation of the salvation which is by His Son Jesus Christ. And in this connection the apostle furnishes in his own person a demonstration that God has not cast off Israel. "For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin." So that we are justified in looking among the "cast away people" of God, for "a remnant according to the election of grace." And if the casting away of His people nationally, has been a means of large, but still limited blessing to the Gentile world, then their national ingathering will be the instrumental cause of universal blessing.

But some say, Is it not a practically hopeless undertaking, this business of converting the Jews? Now, as a matter of fact, it is really easier to convert Jews than Gentiles! Observe clearly what the Holy Ghost says in the 24th verse: "For if thou wert cut out of the olive-tree, which is wild by nature, and wert grafted, contrary to nature, into a good olive-tree, how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive-tree?"

The Jews are, after all, the "natural branches." They are not idolators as the Gentiles were. They know and worship God. They have the Scriptures—the oracles of God. The Jews are on the right road in following Moses and the prophets, for they spake of Christ. Peter had no New Testament on the Day of Pentecost, when he showed from the ancient Scriptures that Christ was the Messiah, and three thousand Jews were converted to the Redeemer. When Christ Himself appeared to and joined His disciples on their sorrowful way to Emmaus, did He not "begin at Moses and all the prophets, to expound unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself?"

"NO PLACE LIKE HOME."

BY HESBA STRETTON.

An Old Hovel.

THERE was not another home like it in all the parish of Broadmoor. It was a half-ruined hut, with walls bulging outward, and a ragged roof of old thatch, overgrown with moss and yellow stonecrop. A rusty iron pipe in one corner served as a chimney to the flat hearth, which was the only fireplace within; and a very small lattice-window of greenish glass, with a bull's eye in each pane, let in but little of the summer sunshine, and hardly a gleam of the winter's gloomy light.

Only a few yards off, the hut could not be distinguished from the ruins of an old limekiln, near which it had been built to shelter the lime-burners during their intervals of work. There was but one room downstairs, with an earthen floor trodden hard by the trampling of heavy feet, while under the thatch there was a little loft, reached by a steep ladder and a square hole in the ceiling, where the roof came down on each side to the rough flooring, and nowhere was there height enough for even a short person to stand upright.

The furniture was as rude and simple as the home itself. The good household chattels, on which Ruth Medway had prided herself when she lived in her pretty cottage in the village street, had never come to this poor hovel. There was a broken chair or two, a table-top propped upon an unbarked trunk of a young fir-tree from the woods behind the lime-kiln, a little cracked crockery, two or three old boxes, and the indispensable saucepan and kettle in which she did all her cooking.

Upstairs was a low pallet bedstead with a flock bed, and, on the floor beside it, a mattress stuffed with chaff, close under the roof, where the thatch must almost have touched the sleeper's face. There was no window into this loft; the only light came through the square hole in the floor.

"Home is home, be it never so homely;" and Ruth Medway had learned to love the quiet place where her youngest and her dearest child had been born. Behind the house lay the Lime-kiln Woods; once a busy place of quarries and kilns, but left long ago to the growth of trees and brushwood; the haunt of all kinds of wild woodland creatures, hollow with rabbit-burrows, and thickly peopled with singing birds, and with the game that the squire loved to preserve.

Excepting in the shooting season, when the sharp crack of guns was to be heard all day long, there was no noise to drown the buzz of the humble-bee, and the low whirring of the unseen grasshopper, and the hundred faint and delicate sounds which fill the stillness of an unfrequented greenwood. Day and night, summer and winter, had their special signs and sounds there, all well-known to Ishmael, the youngest son of old Humphrey Medway.

He was the youngest son, and the most unwelcome to his father. Humphrey had given but a scanty welcome to his first-born child, and each successor had been received with growing surliness. Ishmael came the last, when his mother's hair was already gray, and her back bent with hard toil at out-door labor. The eldest son was grown-up and married, and the little love he might have once felt for his mother had hardened into indifference; while the other children, those who were living, were scattered abroad, seldom caring to return home.

Humphrey never mentioned any of them; but sometimes of an evening, when Ruth rested for a little while, and sat watching the kettle boil on the crackling fire of sticks, she would count their names over on her fingers; eight names over which she sighed, but at the ninth her brown, wrinkled face wore a fleeting smile as she muttered, "Ishmael."

On the whole, Ruth was not given to brooding over the past; for she lived too hard a life to keep her memory green. She had grown fond of this lonely hut, where Ishmael had been born; and he had never known any other home. There was nothing in it to prevent him keeping pet dormice, and hedgehogs found in the hollows of the wood; though the gamekeeper would not let him have a rabbit, or allow Ruth to keep a cat; and a dog was not to be thought of. But a tame starling, and the white owl which had chosen its roost under their thatch, and answered his call in the dusk, swooping noiselessly through the air, made the place full of life and interest to him. All the woods behind had been his play-ground from his earliest childhood; and not the finest home in Broadmoor could have tempted Ishmael to exchange his home for it.

Ruth had taught herself to read after she was married; when Humphrey soon began to leave her alone in the evening, and kept her sitting up late for his return from the village inn. Her loneliness had led her to reading the Bible—the only book she possessed besides a prayer-book and an old collection of hymns.

She had learned to believe quite simply, with no doubt in her inmost heart, that "God so loved the world, that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life;" and that Jesus Christ had really "given His life as a ransom" for her. With these two thoughts firmly rooted in her mind she read the Bible eagerly; and it was from its old, well-worn pages she had chosen the name of her youngest and dearest child, "Ishmael; because the Lord hath heard thy affliction."

Ruth had never been a woman of many words; and she was very silent about those things which were deepest in her heart. Humphrey was accustomed to boast himself of her subjection to him, as not daring to "cheep" a word against him. In her young days she had been one of the village choir; and now Ishmael sat in the singing gallery in her old place. It was one of her greatest pleasures to creep just within the church door, where her poor clothing would be least noticed, and listen to the voices in the gallery overhead, and to join in singing "Glory be to the Father" at the close of each familiar Psalm. There her bent back seemed to ache less, and her wearied limbs felt rested.

Often in the week, as she picked stones or hoed thistles in the fields, her withered lips would murmur the words, "Glory be to the Father," and she would feel as a way-worn traveller feels in a hot and desert country, when he comes across a little fountain of fresh water springing up in his path. His journey is not over, but the living waters give him strength to go on with it.

So bad a name did Humphrey and his eldest son bear in the parish, as being idle and drunken vagabonds, that it overshadowed Ruth and Ishmael, and they found themselves banished by it from all intercourse with decent and friendly neighbors. Ishmael did not feel it until he went to the village school, where the other children were warned against Humphrey Medway's boy. The women who worked with Ruth in the fields kept aloof from her; not so much because they were better off than she was, but because she was so silent in her ways. Thus there was no companionship for them but in each other; and it was sufficient. It was enough for Ruth to think of her boy all day, and to hear his regular, healthful breathing beside her all night; and for Ishmael, the woods that lay all around his home gave him never-ending occupation and delight.

But though they were without friends, they were not without an enemy. The nearness of the low hovel to the woods was enough to arouse the suspicions of the squire's gamekeeper, even if he had had no reason to dislike Humphrey Medway and his family. But, before Ishmael was born, there had existed a bitter hatred between Nutkin, the gamekeeper, and young Humphrey, Ishmael's eldest brother.

Humphrey had succeeded in winning away from Nutkin the girl he had wished to make his wife; and though the keeper had himself married shortly afterward, he had never forgiven the offence, or ceased to hold him and all belonging to him in bitter enmity. The very name of Medway was hateful to his ears. Of late, too, Ishmael had won two or three prizes at the village school over the head of his own boy, who was about the same age, and who lamented loudly over his defeat by old Humphrey's despised son.

Yet in spite of all Nutkin's efforts he had been unable to dislodge old Humphrey from the miserable hut. The rent of a shilling a week was paid punctually by Ruth, who would rather have gone without food than omit its regular settlement, since nothing else could keep her drunken husband and herself from the parish workhouse. The farmer, who held a lease of the lime-kiln and the hut, found her work on his farmstead and showed her some little favor. So all the keeper could do was to suspect and to watch, ready to take advantage of any trespass that could be punished by the law.

For thirteen years now Ruth had worked upon the Willows Farm; and many a hot summer day had Ishmael, when a baby, lain all day long under the hedgerows, carefully swathed in an old shawl, while his mother toiled in the harvest fields. He had himself begun to earn a few pence as soon as he could scare crows from the springing corn, or could help to tend the sheep in the chilly days of spring during the lambing season.

For the last two years his father had been grumbling at his being an idle mouth to feed; though it was rarely Ruth saw a penny of his money and it had been with difficulty that she had been able to keep her boy at school. But now the time was come when Ishmael must cease to be a child, and must begin to get his own living by regular work. Mr. Chipchase, the farmer, had consented to try him as waggoners' boy; and had promised if he was a good and steady lad to "make a man of him."

"Mother," said Ishmael, as they sat together on their door-sill in the long, light June evening, listening to the cuckoo and the thrushes singing in the woods, "I told teacher I'm going to service on Monday; and she says I may take little Elsie into the woods to-morrow; and she'll give us dinner to eat there; for me as well as her, mother; because she says I've always been a good boy at school, and she's sorry to lose me."

"I'm glad she's sorry to lose thee," said Ruth; "and if thee weren't to sleep at home every night, I hardly know what I could do without thee, Ishmael. I almost wish thee were a tiny little lad once again."

"When I'm a man," he answered eagerly, "you shan't ever go out working in the fields, or tire yourself, mother. We'll never, never leave here, because there's no place like it; but I'll get the master to let me build a better house, that'll keep you warm and dry, and we'll live together till we die; won't we, mother?"

"Please God!" she said softly, with a smile on her brown face, as she thought how much earlier she must die than the young lad, little more than a child, who sat beside her.

"I should think it would please God," answered Ishmael, in a quiet voice. "He doesn't want us to be always very poor, poorer than other folks, mother?"

"Nay, I don't know," she replied; "His own Son was born in a stable, and died upon the cross, with folks mocking at Him. I don't know what thee and me have to go through, Ishmael. We can only say 'Please God!'"

It was late before Ishmael mounted the ladder to the close loft overhead, and crept into his bed on the floor under the low thatch. But it was after midnight when Ruth, with her wrinkled yet sinewy arms, helped her drunken husband from one rung to another, fearful every night lest her strength should fail her, and that he might fall, crippled or lifeless, on the floor below.

"Thank God!" she always cried in the depth of her soul, when his sluggish and leaden feet were safely planted on the floor above.

THE MANNA.

S. S. Lesson for August 21. Ex. 16:1-15. Golden Text, John 6. 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Lord had manifested Himself as the Deliverer and the Leader of His people, and He was about to reveal Himself as their Healer and as the Supplier of all their wants. Three days after they had sung the song of victory on the wilderness side of the Red Sea, their faith was tried, for they found no water. Would the wonderful experiences of the past lead them to exercise such faith in God as to endure quietly until deliverance was granted them? Alas no: they fell again under the power of "things which are seen" and "temporal" (2 Cor. 4:8). Arriving at Marah, and finding the waters bitter, they murmured against Moses, saying, "What shall we drink?" Moses did what they ought to have done, he cried unto the Lord, and the waters were soon made sweet for them.

There at Marah, by the healed waters, "He made for them a statute and an ordinance, and there He proved them, and said, If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in His sight, and wilt give ear to His commandments, and keep all His statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee which I have brought upon the Egyptians; for I am the Lord that healeth thee" (or the Lord thy Physician). The ordinance for Israel was obedience. God's pledge was to heal them. Accordingly we find it written of the people who came out of Egypt, "There was not one feeble [sick] person among their tribes" (Ps. 105:37); and again, "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years" (Deut. 8:4). In respect of all their needs the Lord made Himself responsible: for their safety, for their guidance, for their health, their clothing and their food, they might have said with David, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want" (Ps. 24:1).

And yet, again and again we find them murmuring. God tried them and proved them, to know what was in their heart (Deut. 8:2), and He found there a depth of unbelief only equalled by that of the majority of His people in our day. Looking upon outward circumstances, it was a very great trial of faith that they should find themselves in the wilderness where no corn grew, where no food could be obtained either by working for it or by paying for it, to all appearance the mothers must see their children die of hunger before their eyes, and the strong men who were ready to work, were incensed against Moses and Aaron when they looked upon their wives and saw no possibility of procuring them bread, and thus they vented their indignation, "Would to God we had died by the hand of the Lord in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the fleshpots, and when we did eat bread to the full; for ye have brought us into this wilderness, to kill this whole assembly with hunger."

There was nothing wrong in asking for bread: God says, "Call upon Me in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify Me" (Ps. 50:15). But in the spirit in which they acted, they reflected upon God and upon Moses, it was unbelief and not faith. They despised and made light of the glorious distinction which God had made between them and the Egyptians, and spoke as though the consequences of trusting God were more fatal than those of rebelling against Him. Yet God in His tender love passed over their sin, and supplied their need without so much as rebuking them. "The Lord said unto Moses, Behold I will rain bread from heaven for you." God's storehouses are not confined to earth, His resources are wider than the universe itself, for His power is creative; why then doubt Him?

And yet how many there are who suffer need, and when they pray, do so in a despairing, hopeless manner as though they took it for granted that God would not hear them, instead of praying in the confident expectation of those who count upon God as He who has made Himself responsible by His very name of Father for the real needs of all His children. Fancied needs, such as the keeping up of a certain position, or the travelling hither and thither in search of health, or poverty which results from an unwillingness to do some honest work which may be thought beneath one—of course God does not make Himself responsible for such; but for food and drink and clothing we have His promise, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6:33). And even if we were placed in circumstances in which supply is as impossible as it was in the wilderness, He who rained bread from heaven on His ancient people, and who fed Elijah by means of the raven, is our God, and we have nothing to fear.

The people were waiting for the answer to Moses' prayer. He came forth with Aaron from their communing with God and said unto all the children of Israel (for this was such a vital question that the whole people were assembled). "At even, then ye shall know that the Lord hath brought you out of the land of Egypt; and in the morning then ye shall see the glory of the Lord; for that He heareth your murmurings against the Lord." Against the Lord? The people had murmured against Moses and Aaron, but God looked upon it as murmuring against Him, because He had sent them. Let us beware when we give way to discontent; nothing happens which God does not permit, and in fretting against the circumstance we are fretting against God's permission, and therefore God Himself. The eye of faith sees God in everything, and therefore cannot look at circumstances independently of Him. The more impossible the situation, the greater the opportunity for God to manifest His power.

The command went forth to all the congregation of the children of Israel, "Come near before the Lord: for He hath heard your murmurings." Moses and Aaron did not dispute, nor did they attempt to justify God or to appease the people; they simply brought them into the presence of God. Had they not possessed confidence in God, they might have questioned the Lord as to the needful supplies for His people, but they had stood in the direct line of the exercise of His power, their hands had been lifted up over the river and over the sea, and they had become God's active instruments, whereas the people who had only received the benefit by their means, and had not come personally into contact with God, fell an easier prey to the sin of unbelief. Let a man come near unto the Lord, then unbelief and distrust cease.

When the people came near unto the Lord, "they looked toward the wilderness, and, behold, the glory of the Lord appeared in the clouds." The glory of the Lord instead of their sad forebodings of death by hunger! And he spoke, recognizing their sin, their murmurings, but it was a message of deliverance. "I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel; speak unto them, saying, "At even ye shall eat flesh, and in the morning ye shall be filled with bread, and ye shall know that I am the Lord your God." O how much more blessed would it have been could the Lord have said, "I know the trust of the children of Israel."

The first gift of food was that of quails, which came up and covered the camp, this however, was only a temporary succor.

"In the morning (at the very time the Lord had promised, for God is punctual to his engagements) the dew lay round about the host. And when the dew that lay was gone up, behold, upon the face of the wilderness a small round thing, as small as the hoar frost upon the ground. And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, It is manna; for they wist not what it was." Moses knew what it was, there is no speculation about those who are on the lookout for God's working, there can be no chance: how is it that it did not immediately strike the people, "this is the fulfilment of God's promise to us?" Alas they walked by sight and not by faith."

God commanded the people by Moses to gather of it each according to his eating: nothing was to be left until the morning. God is an ever present God, and His supplies are infallible and inexhaustible; there was no need to get in a supply of the manna in case God should fail or forget to give the morrow's food Some of the people were disobedient and left of it till the morning, and "it bred worms and stank." This made Moses angry. But on the sixth day they were to gather the food of two days' to prepare it beforehand, and they found that although it bred worms when kept any other day, yet on the Sabbath it remained sweet. Some of the people who had gathered it every day, disregarding the word of God, went out to gather it on the Sabbath; but none was to be found, and Moses reminded them, "The Lord hath given you the Sabbath, therefore He giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days." The Sabbath was a gift before it became a commandment.

"My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven," "I am the bread which came down from heaven" (John 6:32, 41); so spake our blessed Lord. Just as miraculous as the manna, just as applicable to all our needs, just as fresh day by day is Jesus our Lord to our souls. When the sun waxed hot, the manna melted. O how often is it the case that when we fail to seek our supply of communion with the Lord in the early morning, the possibility is gone for the day, and the time and opportunity are melted away in the necessary occupations and claims which are made upon us. And how often we find that our communion for one day is not the supply for the morrow. God can make it so, as He did always on the sixth day, but we have no right to make it so, and it is only as we enter into the holy Sabbath of rest from our own works as God did from His (Heb. 4:10), that He keeps the manna fresh for us. The manna fell upon the dew, which is a type of the Holy Spirit, and which falls when there is no wind, no agitation. Under the still unction of the Holy Spirit we are prepared for the unfailing supply of Christ the Bread of Life. God teach us to be still.

A Convent Secret has been Disclosed—During the progress of alterations to the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul at Gorlitz, in Silesia, one of the most splendid specimens of mediæval architecture in Eastern Germany, the workmen, in examining the foundations of the tower, came upon the skeleton of a nun, who at some remote time had been doomed to undergo a terrible form of punishment, that of being placed alive in the niche of a wall, and then being built in and left to die of suffocation or exhaustion. The bones of the victim were in perfect preservation, and the sleeves of her garments, ornamented with splendidly executed embroidery, had kept their original whiteness. The discovery reminds us of the time foretold in the Word of God, when every hidden thing shall be brought to light, and when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The British House of Lords Concluded its work on the Irish Land bill on August 5th. The alterations made in the measure are chiefly in the interest of the landlords, and in some cases affect the vital principle of the bill. It is expected that the Government will not accept such alterations, and that a sharp struggle between the two chambers will ensue. The London Times, in a leading article on the subject, says: "Some of the ground which the opponents of the Bill in the House of Lords too readily won will have to be surrendered hereafter, because the majority in the House of Commons will doubtless sustain Mr. Gladstone in refusing to adopt changes that touch the principle of the bill."

That the measure was unpalatable to the Peers was evident from the tone in which the debate opened. The Marquis of Salisbury, the leader of the Conservative party, denounced the bill in strong terms; declaring that it had been won, not from the sense of justice of the government, but from their fears. Even he, however, recognized the necessity for some such concession by saying that he would not advise the Lords to reject the measure, but to amend it in committee.

The Duke of Argyll, an ex-colleague and intimate personal friend of Mr. Gladstone, directed the most formidable attack on the bill, to which, however, he said, the government appears to be driven, as the Lords are, by circumstances. He compared the government to a jelly-fish. He advised the government "to tell the Irish that they will henceforth support the decisions of the courts, and that poverty is no excuse for wrong." He said that there was "a feeling of bitterness and humiliation, which was not confined to that House, in being obliged to accept a bill to which so many had strong fundamental objections." "Universal power," he said, "is given to three men of valuing rents all over Ireland." This was "eminently ridiculous." Giving absolute right of sale to everybody was "eminently unjust."

Mr. Parnell was Suspended from one Sitting of the House of Commons on August 1st for defying the authority of the Speaker and for using unbecoming language. He denounced the conduct of the Ministry in continuing to hold in prison men, whom with amusing inconsistency he described as "the true authors of the Land bill." This conduct, Mr. Parnell declared, proved the Ministry and the Parliament to be "tyrants and oppressors." Mr. Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote rose simultaneously to call the Speaker's attention to this language; but Mr. Parnell went on vehemently, paying no heed to the Speaker. He declared that "he cared nothing for the House of Commons." Mr. Gladstone moved his suspension, but before the question could be put Mr. Parnell said that he would not wait to see the farce played out, and then withdrew before his formal suspension, which was voted immediately afterward by an overwhelming majority. It is supposed that this ebullition of temper was an effort to maintain his popularity with the ignorant class of his constituents, which is impaired by the progress of the Land bill.

An Exciting Physical Struggle Occurred at the British House of Commons on August 3d, when Mr. Bradlaugh, the infidel member for Northampton, attempted to force his way into the House. The cable report states that he made the attempt soon after the business of the House commenced. He informed Mr. Erskine, Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms, that he was there by the mandate of his constituents and would not yield to anything illegal. Upon Mr. Erskine putting out his hand to prevent his passage Mr. Bradlaugh pushed him and was immediately seized by an usher, with whom he grappled fiercely, shouting, "If any one dares to hinder me!" He was hustled down the members' staircase, grappling with the police and ushers, but no blows were struck. He was ghastly pale when he appeared in the Palace yard, and was still struggling with the police and almost fainting. A glass of water was brought and his face was bathed. He threatened to come to the House again with such a force that the police would be compelled to arrest him.

The scene was a most exciting one. Mr. John Bright, who addressed the House, was deeply moved, and although he has no sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh's atheism, believes he should be allowed to take the seat to which his constituents elected him. He described how Mr. Bradlaugh was brought down to the Palace yard in a fainting condition. He thought such a scene was unprecedented. He appealed to the House to reconsider their former decision so as to extricate themselves from the present difficulties.

Another Plot of the Nihilists to Assassinate the Czar of Russia has been discovered. The St. Petersburg correspondent of the National Gazette, of Copenhagen, says: "The Russian Court made the recent journey to Moscow because of the discovery of an extensive conspiracy to assassinate the imperial family. During the night, at Peterhof, the police on the 27th of July stopped a boat which had succeeded in passing the guard ships and arrested the occupant. It was subsequently discovered that sixty persons, some of them of high rank, were involved in the plot."

Ayoob Khan, the Victor in the Recent Battle in Afghanistan, is reported to be pressing forward to Cabul, the capital of the country. The defeated Ameer Abdurrahman has appealed to the British Government for assistance. He has despatched an envoy to Simla, who bears a message wherein the Ameer reminds the Viceroy that he had earnestly and repeatedly begged the Indian government to hold Candahar for a year in order to enable him to make his position secure. It is clear from the Envoy's account that the Ameer began to lose heart when he heard the news of the British evacuation of Candahar. It will be remembered that Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues were warned of the danger of their precipitate action.

Affairs in the East of Europe Present many elements of uneasiness which at any moment may develop into an outbreak of war. In Bulgaria there is a fierce agitation respecting the recent election, which is declared to have been carried at the sword's point, and which sets aside the constitution that was settled at the time of the prince's appointment, and invests the prince with autocratic power independent of the nominal Parliament. General Ernroth, upon whom devolved the conduct of the elections, has been condemned to death by a secret society; but the Prince of Bulgaria nevertheless persists in his high-handed conduct. The state of siege has been proclaimed in various districts.

The two Skirmishers, McGrath and McKevitt who attempted to blow up the Liverpool Town Hall with dynamite were placed on trial on August 2d. The jury, after a short deliberation, found both of the prisoners guilty of causing an explosion with intent to endanger life and with intent to damage the Town Hall. A fresh jury was then sworn, who found McGrath guilty as accessory before the fact in connection with the explosion at the police office in May last. McGrath was sentenced to penal servitude for life and McKevitt for fifteen years.

The International Congress of the Young Men's Christian Association continued its sessions last week at Exeter Hall, London. The telegrams state that it comprised 500 delegates—80 being from America—and altogether represented 3000 associations. On the International Committee were Messrs. Russell Sturgis, Jr., of Boston, and McBurney, of New York. The American delegates were received with great cordiality, and took a prominent part in the proceedings. On Monday evening, August 1st, at the reception given to the delegates at the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor entered in state with Mrs. William E. Dodge, of New York, the Earl of Shaftesbury and the Lady Mayoress following. On Wednesday evening Rev. Mr. Cuyler spoke. During the week many pleasant excursions were made in and about London. On August 5th the mansion of Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P, at Tunbridge, was visited. The hospitality of London was unbounded. It was stated at luncheon at Mr. Morley's, by way of compliment to Americans, that a young minister who had conducted them over the grounds and whose name was Washington traced a direct connection with General Washington. At the farewell meeting on August 6th addresses were made by Sir John Kennaway, member of Parliament; Professor Gladstone; Rev. John Hall, of New York; Mr. Russell Sturgis, of Boston, and others. The Convention has been a great success. The sum of $4000 was pledged to inaugurate a work in Great Britain similar to that of the International Committee in America.

The Persistent Refusal of Irish Juries to Convict persons arrested for rioting and other agrarian crimes impedes the administration of justice. In the Cork Assizes on July 22d, the trial of the criminal agrarian cases was stopped by the judge at the request of the counsel for the crown, on the ground that the juries declined to return verdicts of guilty, despite the plainest evidence. The remaining fourteen cases, comprising fifty defendants, were postponed until the next assizes, and the prisoners will consequently have to remain in jail for three months before they can be tried. The judge said that the condition of the country, as displayed by the crimes committed, could not be regarded by any right-minded man without alarm and almost despair.

A Remarkable Feat of Journalistic Enterprise has been performed by one of the correspondents of the London Daily News in penetrating to Merv, the famous stronghold of Tekke Turcomans, and called in the figurative language of Asia, "The Queen of the World." Attention has been directed to this place for some time past, because it is believed to be the key of India; and that attention has been recently strengthened by the advance of Russian troops. The correspondent had to start by night to avoid the brigands, who are always on the lookout for any chance of plunder. He was attended by only four Turcomans whom he describes as unblushing thieves, liars, and cowards. The darkness of the desert was awful. His path was haunted by jackals, hyenas, and leopards. And when he had succeeded in reaching the object of his quest he was taken for a Russian spy and was hourly in danger of his life. He was placed in custody and subjected to all sorts of inquiries, and surrounded with all sorts of suspicions and perils. But though narrowly watched and jealously guarded he has managed to forward to Europe an account of his journey and of his impressions of Merv. The last accounts of the position of this intrepid correspondent represent him as safe, and as likely to be soon restored to freedom.

The Blessing on the Printed Word.—On Monday evening, July 18th, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, presiding at the usual Monday's meeting at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, said that while he was glad to know that many had been brought to the right path through hearing his sermons in the Tabernacle, a great many had also been similarly privileged though reading his printed discourses. It was but the day before that he had the pleasure of clasping the hand of an American gentleman who, nine years ago, was quite a careless, indifferent sort of person, but who had been led to Christ through reading his sermons, and is to-day the pastor of a large church in America.

A MEMORABLE SHIPWRECK.

Heroic Rescue of a Young Lady.

THE two portraits which appear on our frontispiece are those of a young sailor and a lady who were the sole survivors of all on board a vessel wrecked on the Australian coast on June 1, 1878. The circumstances of the wreck and the heroic rescue of the lady caused a considerable sensation in the locality at the time, but they will probably be new to most of our readers.

The Loch Ard was an iron ship of 1623 tons register, and commanded by Captain George Gibbs. She was on a voyage from London to Melbourne, and was only within a day's sail of port, when the fatal catastrophe of her total loss occurred, near the mouth of the Sherbrooke Creek, about 27 miles west of Cape Otway. The ship had 3,275 tons of cargo on board, valued at $270,000, very little of which could be saved.

That the ship became a total wreck is not to be wondered at, considering the exceedingly rocky character of the coast. The only matter of surprise is that even two lives should have been so providentially saved to tell the thrilling story of their peril and deliverance.

THE SCENE OF THE WRECK.

The Australian coast for miles to the eastward and westward of the Gellibrand River, near which the Loch Ard was lost, shows nothing but precipitous rocks rising perpendicularly from the water to heights varying from 120 feet to 300 feet, and it is only at intervals of many miles that there is an inlet or gorge through the rocks where there is a small beach on which a landing may be effected. This is the case at the spot where the wreck took place, for at that particular locality there is a small inlet about a quarter of a mile deep and about 50 yards wide at the entrance, opening out at the upper end to a large semicircular bay with a fine sandy beach.

This is known as the Caves, and is about one mile east of Sherbrooke Creek, and about six miles west of Gellibrand River, or 14 miles from Moonlight Head. For several miles along the coast the frontage belongs to the Glenample station, owned by Mr. Gibson, who with his wife rendered the two shipwrecked people prompt aid and assistance, which probably saved them from perishing of cold and hunger.

The spot where the devoted ship was lost is one that would please an artist. The cliff rises straight out of the sea to a height of about 150 feet, without a single ledge on which a bird could rest, while at the top, and for perhaps five feet or six feet downward, the rocks are clothed thickly with ferns and heath. The sea, even on the quietest summer day, when it is quite calm outside, rushes in with a sullen heavy roar, and the waves, curling up against the sides of the gorge, finally expend their strength on the sandy beach.

At the end of this gorge there are two caves, which give the place the name by which it is known. Coming in from the entrance, the principal cave is on the left, quite sheltered from the weather, and is perfectly dry and warm, with a soft sandy floor. It is about 75 yards long, 10 yards wide, and fully 10 feet high. At the upper end of the gorge is another smaller and more irregular cave. It is only in one particular spot that it is possible for human beings to descend to the caves, and then it has to be done at the risk of the adventurer's neck, holding on by his hands and feet, and relying upon Providence that he may safely reach the bottom.

PEARCE'S ACCOUNT OF THE CATASTROPHE.

The only male survivor was Thomas Richard Pearce. He is a son of Captain Pearce, who lost his life when the steamer Gothenburg was wrecked, in Australian waters, some years ago, on her voyage from the Northern Territory. His age is now twenty-two, and although comparatively young, he had before this had some experience at a wreck, as he was one of the crew of the bark Eliza Ramsden when she was lost at the Heads, also off the Australian coast. After that he had been serving his apprenticeship in the unfortunate ship Loch Ard, which came to so untimely an end. It may, however, be mentioned incidentally, as a curious fact showing the misfortune that attended this ship from the very day of her launch, that, in addition to having been twice dismasted, nearly lost in the Calcutta River, and at last finally wrecked, during the very few years she was in existence she had five captains, four of whom are dead.

THE MIDSHIPMAN'S ACCOUNT OF THE WRECK.

Pearce gave his account of the sad occurrence in a plain and straightforward way, and, as he appeared to be a young man of much sound sense and knowledge of his profession, his statement may be taken as accurate. According to his account, then, the ship had fine weather and fresh breezes from the Cape of Good Hope, and the easting was run down with the full anticipation of making a tolerably good passage. Everything went well until the reckoning was worked up on May 29, after the meridian signs had been taken, and the ship was then discovered to be 150 miles southwest of Cape Otway.

The wind at the time was to the southward to S.E., and the course was altered to E.N.E., by compass, which it was expected, with the wind then blowing, would carry her clear of Cape Otway, and perhaps give them a sight of the light at Moonlight Head. Captain Gibbs was apparently, however, in some doubt as to the correctness of his compasses, as in the first dog-watch (from 4 to 6 P.M.) he shortened sail until the ship was only left with her three lower topsails and fore-topmast staysail, to make all secure for the night.

The captain remained on deck all night, Mr. Baxter, the second officer, having the middle watch from midnight until 4 A.M. The night had been very dark and hazy, and there was a heavy swell on, but the wind was not blowing very hard. Just as the watch was being relieved, at 4 A.M., and before the men had left the deck, the haze suddenly lifted, and the captain saw land right ahead, and at no great distance, and, almost at the same moment, some one on deck heard so that it was estimated that the distance was not more than a mile from shore.

Captain Gibbs at once gave orders to set the spanker, mizzen, and maintopmast staysail, and the helm was at once put down, with a view of bringing the ship round on the other tack and standing off the land. In order to give her still further way, and also to bring her to her round quicker, the order was given to hoist the upper mizzen-topsail, but as she would not come to the wind the order was given to let go both anchors. The port anchor was let go first, with fifty fathoms of cable, and was quickly followed by the starboard anchor, with about sixty fathoms of chain. In anticipation that the anchors would hold, the sails were clewed up, and a man was sent into the chains with the lead to see if she were holding, but it was at once seen that the anchors were not holding, as the ship was getting close into the cliffs.

THE SHIP STRIKES ON A ROCK.

Captain Gibbs's next order was to slip both anchors, and get sail on the ship, which was now head to wind, with a view of standing on the port tack. An attempt was made to sheet home the topsails, but this appears to have always been a difficult thing to do on the Loch Ard, and after some time had been wasted in an endeavor to do so, the buntlines of the mainsail were let go, and the port main tack got on board and the sheet hauled aft. Just as this had been done the ship struck on a rock, which appeared to catch her just under the starboard mizzen chains.

As the morning had now cleared somewhat, the cliffs were seen close to the ship, and the captain gave orders to have the boats cleared away and the passengers placed in them. By this time the seas were breaking clean over the ship, and she was bumping very heavily, so much so that the top hamper was falling about the deck. As often happens in such cases, the boats were not in the davits, but were on the skids, and of course some time would elapse before they could be launched. Pearce, with five others, including the engineer, were clearing away the port life-boat, and the gripes having been cut and the chocks knocked out, they were just about hooking the tackles on when a heavy sea struck her, and knocked the boat over the side, and all with her. In doing so the boat capsized, and Pearce states that when he came to the surface

HE FOUND HIMSELF UNDER THE BOAT.

Here, he says, he remained for some time, as there was plenty of air. At last he dived down and came up outside the boat, holding on to the life-lines. He saw nothing about him but wreckage, but he also noticed that he had drifted into a gorge and at the same moment the boat struck against the rocks at the side, and he then left her and struck out for the beach, where, as he was a sturdy swimmer, he arrived safely. He was then very much exhausted, and finding plenty of spirits stranded on the beach he helped himself to them, and also got something to eat.

After being about an hour on the beach he heard somebody screaming out, and looking seawards he saw a young lady holding on to some wreckage and drifting through the gorge. He swam at once out to her, and getting hold of some of her clothing in his teeth, he brought her safely to land, and managed to drag her into the cave, where he cut some grass for a bed. She was then in an insensible state, and he tried to restore animation by pouring brandy down her throat, and also by rubbing her body with the same spirit. She recovered somewhat, but appeared to have lost her senses, and was raving.

PEARCE FINDS A FRIEND.

Being exhausted, he lay down, and when he awakened he found the young lady asleep, and left her to try and get assistance. He managed to climb up the side of the gorge, and at once coming upon horse-tracks, he followed them, and at last came upon George Ford, an employé of Mr. Gibson. Pearce told him that there was a lady in the caves wanting assistance, and at once went back to her, and Ford shortly after met Mr. Gibson, who sent him to the station for blankets, a lantern, and other articles he thought might be wanted, while he himself galloped off to the caves, overtaking Pearce on the way.

Having scrambled down to the cliff, they went straight to the cave where Pearce had left Miss Carmichael, but she could not be found. There was the grass that Pearce had cut for her bed, but she had vanished. They searched every nook and corner of the cave, but could find no trace of her, and by this time it was dark. Ford had arrived with blankets and a vessel for boiling water, together with some coffee and a lantern. Having lit the lantern, another and closer search was made in the cave for the young lady, but without success.

Mr. Gibson then proceeded to the second cave, which is about 100 yards distant, and this was also closely searched, but again without success. Fears were now beginning to be entertained for the young lady's safety, as it was thought that in her distracted state she might have destroyed herself, as they were quite certain that unaided she could not have climbed the cliff. They shouted continually to attract her attention. As after events proved, this was the cause of the delay in finding her. Never having heard the Australian "cooey" (shout) before, she fancied that it was the cry of some of the natives, and in mortal fear and trembling she concealed herself within a few yards of the search party.

As a last resource they tried to track her footsteps in the loose sand. They could see that she had left the cave, but her steps were so light, and they had crossed and re-crossed the sand so often, that the tracks were quite confused, and at last they were almost tempted to give up the search. There is in the gorge a single clump of dense tea-tree scrub, and as they were passing this, talking somewhat loudly, a voice was heard among the bushes.

THE MISSING YOUNG LADY FOUND.

Ir. Gibson at once rushed in, and found the ng lady, almost perished with cold and exhaus-. He took off his own coat and covered her, put on her his own warm stockings and boots. re was made from the wreckage, and in a short hot coffee was in readiness, and a pannikin of this was given her, and helped to revive her. was wrapped in blankets and placed before a e fire until she regained some little natural mth, but Mr. Gibson plainly saw that by some ns she must be taken to the station, and not wed to remain in the gorge all night.

he was, however, incapable of helping herself the almost perpendicular cliffs, and at last, n the buggy arrived, the men succeeded in ly carrying her and partly dragging her to the and she was then driven to the home station put to bed by Mrs. Gibson, by whom she was rously attended until recovery.

me people will perhaps think that a young of 19 is no judge of what the captain of a ship ld be. Miss Carmichael can, however, ex- more lucidly the working of a ship and the she was under at different times than many a ho has been two or three years at sea. Miss Carmichael, whose body was subsequently ered and buried, had also studied navigation g the voyage, and was in the habit of taking vations for both latitude and longitude with ister, and working them out so as to check nother, but in no case was there more than a of difference between them. On May 29, two before the wreck, they both worked up the ning, with the chief officer, and although the s obtained were bad ones, they all came to the result, and it was then that the course was d for Cape Otway, and although the ship was nder very short canvas during the first dog- , the wind was blowing so fresh that, going t or two free, she was making good headway gh the water.

THE NIGHT BEFORE THE WRECK.

ring the afternoon the passengers had been engaged in packing up their luggage in an ticipation of their arrival shortly at Melbourne. Miss Carmichael and her sister, together with a Mr. Jones, were on deck that night until midnight, and when the watch was called she heard the captain give orders to take a cast of the deepsea lead. This was done, and she was subsequently told that the depth of water was 64 fathoms, or 384 feet. Both she and her sister slept soundly until about 4 o'clock, when they were called, as she thought, to go up and look at the land.

She slipped on her dressing-gown and went on deck, but there was then a good deal of confusion, this being the time when Captain Gibbs was trying to get the ship's head off the land, and she returned to her cabin, where Miss Raby Carmichael was dressing, and who laughed at her for her eagerness to see the land, at the same time recommending her to finish dressing. She did so, and had just put on her hat and veil when the ship struck. In a very short time the cabin was full of water, but she could not say how long elapsed. Dr. Carmichael, with the assistance of the steward, opened the lazarette hatch and got up the life-belts, six in number. These were fastened to Mrs. Carmichael, Miss Raby Carmichael, Miss Evelyn Carmichael, Mrs. Stuckey, Dr. Carmichael, and Mr. Stuckey. These were, however, in such a bad and practically useless condition that the strings broke several times while they were being tied on, and at last they had to be fastened anyhow.

DYING LIKE A BRAVE SAILOR.

Miss Carmichael and her sister then ran up the companion-ladder on to the poop; but on the top step, and just before getting on deck, Captain Gibbs, with whom they were great favorites, and who had then evidently given up all hope of saving the ship, took her in his arms and kissed her, saying, "If you are saved, Eva, let my dear wife know that I died like a brave sailor—at my post." It should have been said that Captain Gibbs was only married six weeks before the ship left London. Miss Carmichael kissed him and stepped on deck.

Almost immediately a sea swept the decks and washed her overboard. Of course, for a few minutes all was a blank; but the first thing she recollects after that was getting hold of a hencoop. A Mr. Jones and a Mr. Mitchell soon afterward got hold of the same article, and it speaks much for the coolness and courage of Miss Carmichael that she should then say, pleasantly, "So the despised hencoops have proved useful at last." This was referring to the fact that during the passage the hencoops had been a source of annoyance to the passengers.

They were then floating so near to the vessel that they could hear the screams of some of those on board, but by that time the ship was sinking fast. Here another blank occurs in her recollection: but she states that the last she saw of those in the cabin before running on deck was her two little sisters clinging to her mother's dress and crying, while Mr. and Mrs. Stuckey were sitting down on one of the seats, the lady crying and clinging to her husband.

DELIVERANCE FROM DEATH.

Miss Carmichael and her two companions, finding the hencoop very awkward to hold on to, as it was continually throwing over, left it for a spar which came near them, and on this they floated into the entrance of the gorge, and then her two companions, fancying they could reach a rocky point near the entrance, left the spar and struck out for it, but the under-current carried them out to the sea. She still clung to the spar, and was gradually drifted until a portion of her clothing caught a projecting point of the rocky side, and where fragments of it were seen after her rescue.

It was then that, looking shoreward, she saw Pearce walking on the wreckage, and screamed out to him, and then lost consciousness, only recovering her senses when he was half carrying, half dragging her to the cave for warmth and shelter.

The thrilling narrative of the unexpected loss of the noble ship Loch Ard, and the rescue of Miss Eva Carmichael by Midshipman Pearce, himself barely saved from an untimely death, reminds us of the terrible peril of those who are sailing over the sea of life without Christ in the vessel, or chart or compass of Divine truth on board, and who are therefore drifting rapidly onward to inevitable and eternal shipwreck.

But He who heard the despairing cry of His affrighted disciples on the stormy Sea of Galilee, and bade the raging elements to cease their strife, bringing a great calm upon the water, and peace and safety to the fishermen, can even now hear the anguished cry of those who, conscious of their peril, cry, "Lord, save me, I perish!" He delights to save, and "saves even to the uttermost."

The bravery of young Mr. Pearce also furnishes an apt illustration of the duty of those who have themselves been saved from moral and everlasting wreck. It is for such to remember the perishing; the earliest and the latest breath and effort of their new life should be spent for others.

SOULS ARE PERISHING; WHO WILL SAVE?

During a heavy storm off the coast of Spain, a dismasted merchantman was observed by a British frigate drifting before the gale. Every eye and glass were on her, and a canvas shelter on a deck almost level with the sea suggested the idea that there yet might be life on board. With all their faults no men are more alive to humanity than rough and hardy mariners, and so the order instantly sounds to put the ship about, and presently a boat puts off with instructions to BEAR DOWN UPON THE WRECK.

Away after that drifting hulk go these gallant men through the swell of a roaring sea; they reach it; they shout; and now a strange object rolls from that canvas screen against the lee shroud of a broken mast. Hauled into the boat it proves to be the trunk of a man, bent head and knees together, so dried and shrivelled as to be hardly felt within the ample clothes, so light that a mere boy lifted it on board. It is laid on the deck; in horror and pity the crew gather round it. These feelings suddenly changed into astonishment: it shows signs of life; they draw nearer; it moves, and then mutters—mutters in a deep sepulchral voice:

"THERE IS ANOTHER MAN!"

Saved himself, the first use the saved man made of speech was to seek to save another. Let us learn that blessed lesson and be daily practising it. And so long as in our homes, among our friends, in this wreck of a world, which is drifting down to ruin, there lives an unconverted person, there is "another man." Let us go to that man and plead for Christ; go to Christ and plead for that man; the cry, "Lord, save me, I perish," changed into one as welcome to a Saviour's ear, "Lord, save them, they perish."

A Discharged Prisoner had been Helped by some Christian people to good employment, and was frequently urged by them to give himself to Christ. "No," he said, "not yet; the world must see that I am a reformed man before I can be a good Christian." But the fascinations of the city and the influences of pleasure proved too mighty for him, and he not only ceased attending the House of God, but in every way possible sought for a long time to avoid meeting his Christian friends and benefactors. One Saturday evening he went to the young people's prayer-meeting. The Spirit of God touched many hearts, and the young man's among the rest. After the meeting a gentleman, who relates the incident, said to him: "God calls you to-night, my brother. Will you give up now and wait no longer?" His lips trembled as he said, "The time hasn't quite come yet," and walked away. On the following Tuesday he was dying. The gentleman who had previously spoken to him being hastily summoned, he found the young man pale and gasping for breath. He asked him: "The soul, Armstrong—the soul, is it safe?" He could only shake his head and look imploringly into his friend's face, who said, "It is not too late now; remember the dying thief; put your whole trust in Jesus now." He shook his head and then his lips moved. He whispered hoarsely, "Do you think I would give Him the dregs of my life!" They were his last words. In a moment more his soul had gone to the judgment. There was no hope in his death.

THE SYRO-PHŒNICIAN WOMAN.

A Sermon by the Rev. Dr. Talmage.

"Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour."—Matt. 15 : 28.

It was Sabbath afternoon in the Belleville parsonage. I had been trying to preach the Gospel for two years, but the Christian life was to me nothing but a struggle. That Sabbath afternoon I took up the Bible and asked the Lord for a special illumination. I opened the Scriptures, and having asked the Lord that my eyes might fall upon just the passage best suited to my distressed case, I met the verses of the text; from which time the Christian life, instead of being a struggle, has been to me a great satisfaction, a great joy, and a great rapture. And I pray the Lord that this passage of Scripture which was of so much practical use to my soul, may be the means of eternal joy and deliverance to thousands here assembled.

You see that

had an invalid daughter, a child afflicted with a convulsive and exasperating disease described as possession of the devil. All medicament had failed; the mother was a Gentile and hated by all the Jews; the Jews considered it their religion to hate these Gentiles, and they called them dogs—miserable dogs. This afflicted mother came to Christ soliciting His interference for the recovery of her daughter. She said, "My daughter is sick, I would like to have Thee make her well; Thou canst do it. Lord, help me!" Christ, to her surprise, and contrary, or seemingly contrary, to all His past reputation in such cases, turned to her and said, in seeming roughness and harshness of manner, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to you Gentile dogs. You know the Jews all call the Gentiles dogs, and how can you think of coming to Me and asking a cure for your daughter or expecting any of My grace?"

She was not to be thrust back. She understood, perhaps, something from the glance of Christ's eye; but I think that the woman understood that Christ was only rallying her faith and earnestness, and He was going to give a more grand and glorious demonstration of His grace. She was not to be put back or discouraged. She comes to Christ still pressing her case and saying practically, "I am willing to admit myself a dog; I am only a Gentile dog, but the dogs have some privileges, and when the door is left ajar the dog will come in and crawl under the table, and if there have sifted through the cracks of the table some crumbs of bread, the dog goes and gets those crumbs and eats them, and the owner of the household is not affronted. I do not ask a loaf of bread, I do not even ask a large slice of bread; I am a dog and I want to crawl to Thy feet and I want to get some of the crumbs of Thy mercy. Oh, save my daughter; save her from the convulsive disease and make her well!"

That was too much for Christ. He turned round to her and said, "Oh woman, thou hast conquered. Your daughter is well. Now go home, and before you get to your house, your daughter will come out carousing in health and skipping with glee." The moth r started for home. She felt twenty years younger. I think she went on the half run. When the twain met it was in the mingling of hysterical laughter and tears. The mother broke down every time she tried to tell her story; and there stood the daughter, her cheeks as rosy with health as before her sickness began. There may have been some doctors in the village who prophesied the cure would not hold out, but I read in the oldest medical journal in the world this statement, "The daughter was made whole from that very hour."

I. In the presence of this subject to-night I have first to learn from the suggestion of the text, that sin is disposed to treat us

AS IF WE WERE DOGS.

Not as dogs are treated in this world and in this age. Landseer has made princes of the canine tribe. You know that the dog is admired for his sagacity and faithfulness all the world over. Saint Bernard has one of them on whose collar you will find the inscription of twenty-seven names, the names of men that this one dog rescued from the snow drift. The most suggestive picture to me in Dr. John Brown's study in Edinburgh, Scotland, was the picture of his dog Ralph which he has made immortal in his writings. You know also that Walter Scott sang the praises of the dog. The old mastiff lying on the mat is now the pet of the whole household.

But it was not so in these old Bible times, and it was not so in the East. It was a loathsome creature, a snarling creature; and when the Jews compared the Gentile to a dog they used the utmost term of contempt and indignation. My friend, when the Jews held this contempt for the Gentiles they were guilty of a great sin, and when I read the story and get the suggestion of the text, it makes me think of the fact that Satan always treats men like dogs. It may begin perhaps at first by flattering them, but sin is a beast that bruises us finally if it gets a chance at us. The way of the transgressor is hard.

I heard a man say that in a Philadelphia prison as he came up to the wicket and I was trying to comfort him and help him. He stood on the stumps of his limbs, for his feet had been frozen off on one of his criminal expeditions, and his jaw had been fractured, and he had on his forehead the mark of the officer's club with which he had been pelted in the hour of arrest, the most forlorn creature I ever saw. He looked up into my face, and said, "Oh, Mr. Talmage, the way of the transgressor is hard."

Sin comes to a young man and says, Now take your chance at a game of hazard. That is the way men make fortunes, that is the way rapid fortunes are accumulated, it won't hurt you, a game of chance. And the young man takes the suggestion of sin, and he goes into the game of chance, and he wins horses, he wins a carriage, he wins a house, he wins a fortune. There, says sin, don't you see that the man who sticks to his salary is clear down at the foot of the ladder while you are at the top?

After a while the tide turns. Crack goes the sheriff's mallet on the last household valuable. He has gambled away his equipage, gambled away his house, gambled away his fortune. Now he seeks a penny for a drink, and he grapples with devils who trample him in delirium. The way of the transgressor is hard. Sin flatters him at the start, but it treats him at the last like a dog.

Sin comes to a young man and says, Take wine, take plenty of wine, it will give color to the cheek, it will give sparkle to the eye, it will give spring to the step. Take some in the morning, it will be an appetizer, take some at noon, it will help digestion; take some at night, it will produce sleep. The young man takes it; a few months pass along, or a few years, and you meet that young man about nine or ten o'clock in the morning on the street, and you say, Why, I always thought you were busy at this hour. Oh, he says, I have lost my place. God have mercy on that young man, who through evil habit has lost his place! All the powers of darkness are after him. Save that young man on that express train that will not stop until it goes over the embankment of perdition. The way of the transgressor is hard. Sin flattered him at the start, but treated him at the last like a dog.

Sin comes to a young man and says, Take a little money out of the desk of your employer. He won't miss it, and he will be just as well off, and you can add hundreds of dollars to your salary. The young man surrenders to the temptation, he takes the money, he takes more and more, a some day there is a knock at his door and the o cer of the law enters, and he says, "I want you "What?" says the young man. "I want you Exposure has come. Discovery has come; he lost his reputation, he has lost his soul. The w of the transgressor is hard. Sin flatters him at start, but at the last it treats him like a dog. I we need not go into such a case as that to find illustration of this text. You and I have found in our own experience that when we go into a kind of sin we find it a scarification and a ma ing, and a hurt to our immortal souls.

Sin chains us like a dog; sin throws refuse to like a dog; sin whips us like a dog; sin sa Here are robes of royalty, but it covers you w rags; sin says here is a luxurious banquet to y soul, but fills it with wormwood; sin offers freedom, but drives you into a kennel. It flatt you at the first but treats you at the last lik dog.

II. But carrying out the suggestion of my t we find Christ standing with HIS BACK TO THE HUMAN SOUL.

This Syro-Phœnician woman came to Him said, Cure my daughter of her sickness. Ch turned away; He seemed only to throw disco agement on her application. You find Christ g erally with His face toward the people. He st with His face toward blind Bartimeus; He st with His face toward the foaming demoniac; stood with His face toward the limping paraly He stood with His face toward the sea when hushed it; He stood with His face toward grave when He broke it. But behold Christ in text with His back turned to the human soul.

I said to an artist some time ago, Did you see a picture of Christ with His back tu toward a human soul? He said, I never saw a picture. And you may go all through the ture galleries of London, and Dresden, and Be and Florence, and Rome, and you will find the tures of Christ full face and in profile, but not picture of Christ with His back turned on a hu soul. And yet here is a picture of it in my This Syro-Phœnician woman comes asking a b ing; Christ turns away. And so He has for reason turned away from your soul, although only for a little while. There are hundreds of ple here who want to be Christians. You pra Lord, cure my soul of this sin. I want to sta heaven. Lord Jesus, help me. Christ seem turn around to you and say, You are a sinner are a vile sinner, you are a lost sinner, and can you expect to have any of the glories of he given your soul?

Ah! Take the suggestion of the Syro-Phœn woman, and keep on the plea, put down all burdens at Christ's feet. If Christ's back is t to you, put down all your burdens at His heel He will turn and have mercy on you. M man from whom the grace of God has been poned a great while has at last become illus in Christian life. Do you know that mercy poned is mercy augmented? The waters c soul coming to a full tide break away the dan arrow pulls back against the string of the only to be projected further. And if Christ few moments to-night seems to turn away Hi from you, it is only that it may be more ra when He looks at you to pronounce pardo peace, and life, and heaven.

Oh, be not discouraged. Keep on with plea, remember the example of the Syro-Phœ woman. I hear horses coming down the s drawing a chariot. I see a man in the chario his mouth bandaged and there are folds his head. Who is it? Naaman the leper. come on down, and they drive up in front prophet's house, and shout, "Whoa!" and w that fuss and demonstration they expect to g prophet to come out and help this leper. prophet does not come out. Naaman ca with too much pomp, and the prophet, inst coming out, just sent word to him, You go in the Jordan and you will get well.

My friend, if we come to the door of me night with great pomp we will be turned awa we get mercy it matters not by whose ha it, or at what moment we get it, if we only get Oh! remember the Syro-Phœnician woman in text, and be importunate in your plea, for I tell whole audience to-night that though Christ for a moment seem to turn His face away n you, the next moment He will turn his face ard you, and this night will be a time of joy in- cribable to your immortal soul!

II. But there is another thought in the subject. nd another picture, and that is, Jesus is en this Syro-Phœnician woman came and asked the cure of her daughter Christ turned away, n with a wit and a brightness and a positive ius that hardly any poet or sculptor or orator or ıter ever indulged in, she came to Him and l, Yea, even the dogs eat of the crumbs that from their master's table. What did Christ He surrendered. I have often spoken to you Christ the conqueror on a white horse, all ven following Him on white horses, the moon ler His feet, the stars of heaven His tiara, the the rocket shot up in the signal service of the t, burning worlds the bonfires of His victory, rist the conqueror. But behold to-night Christ conquered. There are some things Christ can- do. He cannot break His promise, He cannot nple on a humble soul, He cannot refuse an nest prayer. While He was ready in His power overthrow His enemies, when the Syro-Phœni- n woman presented her humble prayer Christ rendered.

History tells us that

ıe to Westminster Abbey to attend the corona- n of King George IV., her offended husband. : came with six shining bays and in a carriage state. Getting to the door she was not admitted: went to another door, then to another, and an- er. No admittance anywhere. They guarded door and said, "We have no right to admit ." In derision and indignation she got into carriage of state and rode off. Now if we ne to God in our pomp and pride—no admittance. we come in humility and self-abnegation, our ls will be received. Queen Caroline could not in to the coronation of the king, but the Syro- ænician woman took all the castles of earth and ven.

suppose there were some people trying to dis- rage the Syro-Phœnician woman of the text. ey said to her, Now you see Christ don't care you, Christ turns His back on you. Besides, if physicians of the village cannot cure your ighter, Christ cannot. He has no medicine. t she was not to be dissuaded, she followed on, pressed her case the best way she could until rist surrendered; and let me say that the hum- st person in this house to-night coming before Lord with a prayer of faith shall have God's nediate recognition. There is not a child in all s house who kneeling before the Lord to-night l not get His gracious audience. The Lord e you and bring you this night to Him who be- ds the Syro-Phœnician woman.

There are a great many perhaps in this house it suppose that it demands unreasonable perse- ance. No; you do not get discouraged in thly search. If you want to get money, if you nt to get a fortune, you will follow it for one ır, or five years, or ten years, or twenty years, or rty years, and you never stop until you get the tune; although you know that when the money gotten it is uncertain in possession. In 1861 00,000,000 of failure; in 1857, $297,000,000 of lure. Whom did that discourage? Nobody. ! if men had only the same importunity and the ne perseverance in gaining eternal treasure that y show in seeking worldly honor!

William the Conqueror was honored of all the rld, and yet when he came to die they stole the rments out of his room, they stole the woollens at covered his corpse; and when they were out to take him into the chancel a man stood ere protesting against putting his miserable car- se into the chancel. Oh! how little are the nors of earth! Of how little worth when you ve got them!

If you had had the ame perseverance for the honors that come from God's right hand that you have had for the honors of this world, long ago you would have been Christians.

I CONFRONT HUNDREDS

and thousands of you with the feeling that I have every Sabbath morning and every Sabbath night that I shall never meet you again. You come from the four winds of heaven. You once worshipped in a Scotch kirk. You once worshipped in an English chapel. You come from the prairies of the West, or from the savannahs of the South. All the cities of this land, and perhaps of all Christen- dom represented in this audience to-night, and I feel I must say a word for your eternal salvation.

Turn into the kingdom of God this hour. "Es- cape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain. Escape to the mountain lest thou be consumed" (Gen. 19:17). Oh! eternity, eternity! Where shall I spend it? Where will you spend it? Oh! joys that never fade! Oh! sorrows that never end! Which will be mine? Which will be yours? An hour ago I bent over a dying pillow, and after having offered a prayer, I said to that Christian soul, who per- haps has already passed through the gate, for I do not think she will survive the night, "I am going to my pulpit, have you any word to send to my congregation?" She thought for a few mo- ments and then she said, "Well, I can wish for them nothing better than that they may be as happy as I am."

When I quoted to her that passage in Psalm 23d, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death," she interrupted me at that point and said, "I do not see any shadow." This glad, this blessed, this triumphant religion I recommend to all this audience. Her ways are ways of pleas- antness and her paths are peace. Come and get this religion to-night. All these scenes will soon have passed away, and just as I close this book, just so after a while the book of all our earthly op- portunities will be closed; the volumes of all our opportunities for doing good and getting good, two great volumes, volume placed on the top of vol- ume, closed forever. What then will be our con- dition? What then will be our history?

In contrast with the scene through which I have passed the last two hours—a scene of sickness, be- reavement, and sorrow in that household of our congregation—in contrast with that how insignifi- cant are all other considerations! How small is time compared with eternity!

Eternity! stupendous theme!
Compared therewith our life's a dream:
Eternity, an awful sound,
A deep where all our thoughts are drowned.

What countless millions of mankind,
Have left this fleeting world behind,
Then gone. But where? Ah pause and see—
Gone to a long eternity.

In this hour of glorious mercy yield your heart to the Lord Jesus Christ and make sure work for eternity. This is the last address I shall give to many before the holy communion which will be celebrated to-morrow afternoon after the close of the morning service, and I invite any that are now prepared to sit at the Lord's table, and I invite many who are not yet prepared, to seek after God and on that glorious festal occasion to be associat- ed with us.

Ye wretched, hungry, starving poor,
Behold a royal feast;
Where mercy spreads her bounteous store
For every humble guest.

See Jesus stands with open arms:
He calls, He bids you come.
Grief holds you back and sin alarms;
But see, there yet is room.

INCIDENTS OF MISSION WORK IN LONDON.

THERE are few quarters on the habitable globe in which it is possible to see crowded into a small space so much vice and misery as in the east of London. About three years ago Miss Stewart, a Christian young lady, felt called to make an effort to spread the knowledge of Jesus in one of the worst parts of this district. She opened a hall at her own expense for Gospel Temperance work, and it has been the spiritual birthplace of many souls.

Among the interesting narratives of good effect- ed through the work of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of those attracted to the hall Miss Stewart relates the following:

A SHIP CAPTAIN'S CONVERSION

took place not many weeks ago. Miss Stewart says, "The captain came to our meetings many times, till at last the Lord broke his hard and stub- born heart. One night he said, 'I have been serv- ing the devil for fifty years, but I never found any happiness. I spent all my earnings in drink, go- ing to the play, and such like. Many times I narrowly escaped with my life at sea. In all my voyages I never gave God a thought, only to curse and swear. For twenty-two years I have not been nigh a place of worship. Sundays especially I de- lighted to be in the public-house. At last one Sunday came I shall never forget. I had spent all my savings, even my last halfpenny, so I could not go to the tap-room; and sitting very wretched in my little room, in a narrow back alley, I thought 'I'll go and hear those open-air preachers at Market Street, just to see what they really are after.' I came to Market Street, listened, thought to myself, "It's all humbug;" but as they went to the Mission Hall, I felt a hand on my shoulder, and Mr. Hopkins kindly said, "Come inside, friend." I was led and put into a seat. During the service I felt, "It's all me they mean. What an awful sinner I am!" At the end I got on my knees, and as Mr. Hopkins said to me, "Him that cometh to me I will in nowise cast out," I gave myself to Jesus, and found, oh, such a great load off me, and I've been a different creature ever since. No more public house, no cursing, the Lord has taken it all away. My mates say I'm mad, but I tell them I've found a happiness in religion I never could find anywhere else, bless the Lord.'"

SIX BLACK SAILORS

were walking in company down Ratcliff Highway one evening recently, when they were induced by a Christian friend to enter the Mission Hall, in Ca- ble Street. While the Gospel was being faithfully and lovingly preached, the Holy Spirit wrought powerfully on them, convincing them of sin, and of their need of a Saviour. At the close of the service they all approached the penitent form, seeking the pardon of their sins. One of them, who seemed to have been the wickedest, prayed aloud with groans and tears for nearly half an hour; the weight of his sins seemed too great for the Lord to have mercy on him. He was spoken and prayed with. At last he jumped on his feet, "Oh, I've seen Jesus, He does save me! oh, glory to God, my load of guilt is gone." His very countenance was altered, so great was his joy; and warmly he grasped and shook hands with every one present, so that all rose up and sang with full hearts, "Praise God from whom all bless- ings flow."

SAVED FROM A WATERY GRAVE.

A young man given to drink ran away from his family who were living in the country, while he led a most dissolute and reprobate life in and around London. One night he was attracted by singing in Market Street, Shadwell, and drawn to our Open-air Meeting, followed us into the Mission Hall, in Cable Street, where he was convinced of sin, and in great agony of mind fell upon his knees, crying, 'Lord, be merciful to me.' The Lord heard his earnest prayers, and he left the hall rejoicing—a sinner saved by grace. He has since told us that on the evening of his conversion he fully intended to destroy his life, and was mak- ing his way to the river with that intent, when God in great mercy directed his steps to listen to His Word in our Open-air meeting. He is now in the police force in another part of the country. Before he went away he bid us good-bye, saying, 'I shall never forget you, nor the hall at Shadwell, and every time I am tempted to drink I will lift my heart in prayer to Him, my God and Saviour, for grace and assistance to keep firm the pledge of abstinence.'"

JAMES GRAHAM'S BUSH LIFE IN AUSTRALIA.

Self-Upbraiding—Jackey's Horse Goes Mad—Duncan's Death—Water Found—Graham's Personal Account of Perils and Deliverance.

THEY remounted and went on, feeling that every moment was subtracting from the energy that should bring them to safety. Though speaking was difficult, yet Duncan and Graham often spoke. Poor Duncan was full of self-upbraiding for the adventure, which his companion now endeavored to excuse. He spoke in words of resignation concerning his own anticipated death, and repeatedly said—"Christ, none but Christ can be the refuge of the soul from sin and eternal death."

Hour after hour passed away, and still the noble horses held on with an ambling pace through the sand, at about five miles an hour. Sometimes the riders felt sleep creeping over them for a moment, till awakened by the imaginary rush of cascades, or rivers, or by the real motion of the horses through the burning sand. "Hungry and thirsty, their souls fainted in them;" but still they held on, and ere sunset they came in sight of the Sugar-loaf Bulgar and the scrub.

Poor Duncan was sinking apace. "Graham," he said, "how magnificent is that sunset; I have seen many a sunset; I have loved sunsets; but I shall see the sunset no more. He shall rise but not find me on earth. I have nearly done with life. Oh, how much have I hoped and how little have I done! It is a vain show." His companion tried to encourage him, but the horses were fast breaking down. Oh, could they hold out but twenty miles more, they might bear their riders to water.

But it is impossible. When they reached the scrub the horses staggered. Their strength appeared to fail; they twisted and reeled and their riders alighted. Jackey's horse was mad, and rushing at Graham caught him by the breast and gave him a fearful bite. Graham writhed with pain, but instantly shot the horse, and from his blood allayed their thirst a little. The other horses were evidently dying, all but the Arab mare's colt, who had borne the pack. All were shot except her, and she, it was afterward thought, escaped.

They now took to walking through the scrub; and, as it grew dark, they were fearfully torn, and often their feeble limbs gave way over a log or in a hollow, and they fell prostrate in weakness. Poor Duncan felt his strength utterly gone. He was torn by the thorns of the scrub. Graham took off his glossy jean jacket and put it on him; but he said, "It is all in vain, I shall never take it off. My day is done. The first symptom of this death is madness. Graham, I feel getting mad. Tell my brother to write to my mother, and tell her I perished in the desert; but by no dishonor. Tell my brother to send her my watch and jewelry. Let us pray."

They knelt in prayer; and he commended his soul to God in terms the most awful and pathetic Graham had ever heard. He prayed for his companions, and especially for Graham, that he might reach home and be restored to his wife. He did not appear to desire or pray for safety for himself; but by the agony and bloody sweat of the Son of God, he appealed to God to forgive his sins and have mercy on his soul. Graham lived to tell that scene; but recurrence to that prayer always made the knot to rise in his throat and the tears to fill his eyes.

When he rose he asked Graham's forgiveness for bringing him into this peril. Forgiveness was freely accorded; and leaning on Graham's arm, they staggered farther through the bush. Gordon had also given up hope, and wished that on a beautiful rising ground they should all die together, where friends might find their remains. Graham's heart was the only one where hope still lingered. For nearly five miles he partly supported, partly carried Duncan, though his own servant never offered him an arm. Duncan complained of spikes in his boots; Graham took them off, but nothing was there to hurt him. When put on, he again complained of sharp stones in them, and asked to be left to sleep and die.

They continued to struggle on till they came to a large currant bush, at which Duncan stood still; and, as if leaning his back against it, he sank back to rise no more. It was a fearful thing for Graham to look by the bright star-light into the agonized face of that dying man; his moustache clotted with the horse's blood, and his tongue protruding, while his frame wrought in the last struggles. They drew him forward, till his head so rested that the scrub would give it shade by day, if perchance they might return with water to him. Of this there was little hope; and he had, while he could, urged them to leave him and save their own lives. They now could do nothing but leave him, except die with him.

They staggered on; and by the evening of that day they emerged from the scrub and crawled to Merule Creek. Graham steered for the hill under which they last drank water; but he staggered past the water hole some hundreds of yards; he was returning, however, by a detour when he met the faithful black coming with all his might, with some water in the tin vessel. Though he had spilt it all to a glassfull, even that gave Graham a little strength and he soon drank abundantly. A hard effort brought them to the oozing water, and they drank sandy water as fast as they could get it.

The calmest hours of after-life but confirmed Graham that if there be a God without whom a sparrow cannot fall to the ground, the hand of that God was in his deliverance, which we now narrate in his own words.

"My tongue was swelled in my head, my eyesight nearly failed. It was God that led me to the well of water. After I had drunk, I found myself so weak that only with difficulty could I raise myself from the ground. I think I never felt so hot a sun as at that time. Having even then sixty miles to go before I could get any food I began to despair. My only earthly hope then was my gun and ammunition and tin quart pot, which I had the presence of mind to carry with me through every difficulty.

"We were so exhausted and weak that my surviving companions threw away everything, even to their knives. When we discovered the water I found all the ammunition gone but that in the gun, and one round besides. My every hope was then gone, and I was praying and resigning myself to the will of God, when I thought I felt the touch of a hand, accompanied by a voice, audible and distinct, which said, 'Arise, now's your time.'

"I looked round, but could see nothing but my companions, who were both fast asleep, and I thought it might be imagination. At that moment a carrion crow perched on the limb of a tree above my head. I tried to raise the gun to shoot it, but weakness prevented me. Again I heard the same voice as before, in sweet accents saying again, 'Now's your time; now! now! now!' Indeed, I seemed to hear a choir of voices then, some of them shrill and low; but all appeared to speak of hope.

"I cannot now tell what it was, but then I did not doubt it was from God. Might it not have been the spirit of my mother who then was dead, sainted guardian of my youth, permitted to act as guardian angel of her son, then near a death of despair? God knows; but I then did not doubt, and plucked up hope. I gained strength at the moment and shot the crow. We managed to boil it in the quart pot. We ate the flesh and drank the soup, from which, by courage, and the assistance of God, we reached my place in about forty-eight hours afterwards.

"I was confined to my bed for three weeks after that before I could recover strength, and it was only through God's blessing, and the tender exertions of my wife I ever recovered. This is one of many dangers that nothing but the matchless mercy of Providence could ever have carried through."

On beginning to recover, three weeks aft wards, he complained of pain and roughness his palate, and more than an inch of the pen bla of his pocket-knife was drawn out by his wif fingers, it having been broken off and forgott when, in the madness of thirst, he strove scarify the roof of his mouth for moisture. F years that broken knife, brought home in his be was kept by his wife, as a memento of peril a deliverance.

Graham subsequently returned to the bush, a made a search for the remains of poor Dunc but found only a few scattered bones, which t birds and the beasts had forsaken. They were terred in a shady hollow on Mow Poke Creek. mother's tears did not water their lowly bed; l thither often did Graham retire with his Bible the Sabbath evenings, and renew his reme brance of the mercy which, while it took one whc work was done, left another who had much mc work to do. Having enjoyed for some time a cc siderable measure of material prosperity, Jam Graham died a few years ago, trusting alone a cheerfully in the all-sufficient merits of Jes Christ for acceptance with God, and a home heaven.

THE END.

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT I RELATION TO PROPHECY.

By Rev. William Maude.

HAVING in our former papers * drawn attenti to various prophetic passages, taken indiscrin nately from the books of the New Testament, t true meaning of which have, in the Revised Ve sion, been elucidated by the more correct readi or rendering of the original text; we propose, the present occasion, to confine our attention that which is pre-eminently the prophetic book the New Testament—the Book of Revelation—i dicating, in the first place, some of the passages which errors and blemishes have been removec and, secondly, pointing out a few cases in whic the revisers have not given us some called-f emendations.

It so happens, as shown by Dr. Roberts (himse one of the revisers) in his very useful and compe dious "Companion to the Revised Version of t New Testament" (London: Cassell & Co.) th the Greek text of the Book of Revelation on whic the Authorized Version rests, was of a most u satisfactory character. Accordingly, rather nume ous corrections of the original text, as well as in proved renderings where that text has not calle for correction, find a place in the Revised Versio And some of these changes, although not of t same doctrinal importance as certain others mac in the Gospels and Epistles, are of special intere to the student of prophecy.

Among the first passages in the Book of Revel tion which attract our attention as having unde gone somewhat important alteration in the Revise Version, is the sublime apostrophe contained in th seventh verse of the first chapter: "Behold, H cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see Hin and they also which pierced Him; and all the kir dreds of the earth shall wail because of Him. This now reads as follows: "Behold, He comet with the clouds; and every eye shall see Him, an they which pierced Him; and all the tribes of th earth shall mourn over Him."

The reading of the Authorized Version, "A the kindreds of the earth shall wail because c him," has very generally suggested the idea tha the emotion spoken of is one of terror and despair as when, in chapter 6, the various classes of man kind are represented as saying to the mountain and rocks, "Fall on us, and hide us from the fac of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from th wrath of the Lamb." This, however, is

AN ERRONEOUS INTERPRETATION.

The reference to Zechariah 12: 10–14, is unmis takable, and teaches us that the sorrow depicted i that of repentant Israel after their deliverance from the Antichrist; and the true sense is, therefore much better conveyed by the new reading, "All the tribes of the earth shall mourn over Him." Perhaps it would have been a still further improvement to have substituted the word "land" for "earth," as showing more distinctly the Jewish character of the passage.

This sorrow of Jewish hearts for their nation's sin, in the rejection and crucifixion of Messiah, may indeed be said to have been experienced ever since the Day of Pentecost, when so many Jews were pricked to the heart and made partakers of this deep penitential grief. And those tears of godly sorrow for the sin which caused the death of the Redeemer have never from that day onward ceased to flow. Thousands and thousands of Jews have wept for their sins, as they have beheld by faith the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. But the great general mourning of the nation will take place only when in the last days the Lord shall "pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications; and they shall look upon Him whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for Him, as one is in bitterness for his first-born" (Zechariah 12 : 10).

The next passage to which we would call attention is the gracious promise addressed to the Church in Philadelphia, which, in the Revised Version, reads thus: "Because thou didst keep the word of My patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of trial, that hour which is to come upon the whole world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." A reading which, in its emphatic repetition, indicates much more distinctly than the reading of the Authorized Version, the future unparalleled season of judgment referred to, namely, "the tribulation, the great one," spoken of in the seventh chapter. That this is undoubtedly the correct reference is admitted by Dean Alford, who says, in his Greek Testament, "The time imported is that prophesied of in Matthew 24 : 21, viz., the great time of trouble which shall be before the Lord's second coming. As such it is immediately connected with 'Behold, I come quickly,' following. The expositors have in many cases gone away from this broad and obvious meaning here, and have sought to identify 'the hour of trial' with various periods of trial and persecution of the Church; a line of interpretation carrying its own refutation with it in the very terms used in the text."

In the fourth verse of the fourth chapter, again, we note in the translation of the Greek word thronos, which occurs in that one verse three times, uniformly "throne," instead of once "throne" and twice "seats" as in the Authorized Version. The verse now reads: "And round about the throne were four-and-twenty thrones: and upon the thrones I saw four-and-twenty elders sitting." This removes the arbitrary and incorrect distinction between the throne of God and the thrones of the representative "elders." The same alteration is also very properly made in chapter 2 : 13 : "I know where thou dwellest, even where Satan's throne is;" in 13 : 2 : "The dragon gave him his power and his throne, and authority; and also in 16 : 10 : "And the fifth poured out his bowl upon the throne of the beast."

A CALLED-FOR CORRECTION

A much more glaring blemish—we may truly say one of the most glaring of those which disfigures the Authorized Version—is removed, in the Revised Version by the substitution of for "beast," as the designation of the cherubic attendants on the Divine throne, in chapter 4 : 6-9, and elsewhere in this book. Familiarity alone can have reconciled us—if it has reconciled us—to the latter rendering, which not only introduces a really grotesque feature into one of the most sublime visions in the whole compass of revelation, but tends to confound these cherubic life-forms with the "wild beasts" subsequently spoken of in the thirteenth chapter.

Indeed, in view of some of the unfair and fastidious objections which are taken to the wording of the Revised Version in certain places, it may safely be said that had our present revisers ventured on such a rendering as that of the Authorized Version in chapter 5 : 14, "And the four beasts said, Amen," it would have met with a universal expression of astonishment and derision. Even "living creatures," though infinitely preferable to "beasts," is not an altogether satisfactory translation of the Greek zoon, inasmuch as they are not actual living animals, but rather symbolic "life-forms," which latter expression we should, with Lange, have been disposed to adopt.

(To be concluded.)

AN INFIDEL BLACKSMITH'S CONVERSION.

Scene I. The Pastor's Study—Scene II. The Christian's Closet—Scene III. The Prayer Meeting—The Infidel Blacksmith Tells the Story how he was led to Christ.

SCENE I.—THE PASTOR'S STUDY.

"HAVE you conversed with our infidel and scoffing parishioner, Mr. Rogers, on the subject of religion?" said the venerable pastor to Mr. Bowers, an aged neighbor, and a devoted follower of Christ.

"I have, and at great length, but was unable to make the least impression upon his mind. You know that he is a man of extensive reading, and is master of all the ablest infidel writers. He regards the fortress in which he has entrenched himself as impregnable. You know his ready wit, and when he finds he cannot talk you down, he will laugh you down. I can say no more to him. He made my errand the butt of ridicule for the whole company."

"Then you consider his case hopeless?" "I do, indeed. I believe him to be given over of God to believe a lie; and I expect to see him fill up his cup of iniquity to the very, very brim." "Shall nothing, and can nothing more be done for him?" And the pastor arose and walked the floor of his study under the influence of deep agitation.

It was now a solemn time in the congregation. The preaching of the pastor for many sabbaths had been full of earnestness and power. The Church was greatly quickened. The spirit of prayer prevailed. Many were inquiring what they should do to be saved. Many, too, were rejoicing in hope, and the whole community was moved as with one silent but mighty impulse, for the Holy Spirit was striving mightily.

But unmoved, unconcerned, stood the infidel, amid the many changes of heart and mind in those around him, proud of his position and confident in his strength, and able, as he believed himself to be, to resist every influence, human and Divine, which might be brought to bear upon him. The pastor had often approached him and had as often been repulsed. As a last resort, he had requested his able and skilful neighbor, a lawyer of piety and talents, to visit Mr. Rogers, and endeavor to convince him. But it was like attempting to reason with the tempest or soothe the volcano.

SCENE II.—THE CHRISTIAN'S CLOSET.

There was a fire blazing upon the hearth in that little room. The wind was howling without; the snow was whirled in eddies and was swept with violence against the casement. It was a cold night in January. In that secret and retired chamber, where none but God could hear, was poured out a voice from a burdened soul. The aged Christian was upon his knees. His bosom heaved with emotion. His soul was in agony. That voice of prayer was continued at intervals through the livelong night. In that room was a wrestling like that of Jacob. There was a prevailing like that of Israel. It was a pleading with the Most High for an unwonted display of His power and grace, with the confidence that nothing was too hard for the Almighty. It was a night of prayer, of entreaty, of importunity. It was prayer as a man would pray for the life of a friend who was on the eve of execution.

SCENE III.—THE PRAYER-MEETING.

The meeting was still and deeply solemn. The vestry of the chapel was crowded to its utmost capacity. It was a cheerful evening, and the stars threw their mellow light over the dense assembly. Now the song of praise resounds from all parts of the room, and there is a heart in the utterance which belongs not to other tunes. Now the voice of one and another ascends in prayer, and such prayer is seldom heard except in the time of genuine revivals of religion. The silent tear steals down many a cheek. The almost inaudible sigh escapes from many a bosom. An intense interest rests on every countenance, and the voice of prayer is the voice of all.

One after another arises, and tells the listening company "what the Lord has done for his soul." There stands Mr. Rogers, once the infidel—now the humble believer in Jesus. He is clothed in a new spirit. His face shines as did the face of Moses when he had seen God face to face. He is a new creature in Christ Jesus.

"I stand," said Mr. Rogers, "to tell you the story of my conversion." His lips trembled slightly as he spoke, and his bosom heaved with suppressed emotion. "I am as a brand plucked out of the burning. The change in me is an astonishment to myself, and all brought about by the grace of God, and that unanswerable argument.

"It was a cold morning in January, and I had just begun my labor at the anvil in my shop, when I looked out and saw Mr. Bowers approaching. He dismounted quickly and entered. As he drew near I saw he was agitated. His eyes were bedimmed with tears. He took me by the hand, and with indescribable tenderness said, 'Mr. Rogers, I am greatly concerned for your salvation—greatly concerned for your salvation,' and he burst into tears. He could say no more, but went out of the shop, got on his horse, and rode away.

"'Greatly concerned for my salvation,' said I, audibly, and I stood and forgot to bring my hammer down. There I stood with it upraised—'greatly concerned for my salvation!' Here is a new argument for the truth of religion, which I have never heard before, and which I know not how to answer. Had the aged man reasoned with me I could have confounded him; but here is no threadbare argument for the truth of religion. Religion must be true, or this man would not feel as he does. 'Greatly concerned for my salvation'—it rang through my ear like a thunderclap in a clear sky. 'Greatly concerned I ought to be for my own salvation,' I said—'what shall I do?'

"I went to my house. My poor pious wife, whom I had always ridiculed for her religion, exclaimed, 'Why, husband, what is the matter with you?' 'Matter enough,' I replied, filled with agony and overwhelmed with a sense of sin. 'Old Mr. Bowers has ridden two miles this cold morning to tell me he was greatly concerned for my salvation. What shall I do? what shall I do?'

"I do not know what you can do,' said my astonished wife; 'I do not know what better you can do than to get on your horse and go and see Mr. Bowers himself. He can give you better counsel than I, and tell you what you must do to be saved.'

"I mounted my horse, and followed after him. I found him alone in that same little room where I afterward learned he had spent the night in prayer for my poor soul, where he had shed many tears over such a reprobate as I was, and had besought God to have mercy upon me. 'I am come,' said I to him, 'to tell you that I am greatly concerned for my own salvation.'

"'Praised be God,' said the aged man. 'This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners,' even the chief, and he began at that same Scripture, and preached to me Jesus. On that same floor we knelt, and together we prayed, and we did not separate that day till God spoke peace to my soul.

"And now permit me to say, if you wish to reach the heart of such a poor sinner as I, you must get your qualifications where he did—in your closet and on your knees. So it shall be with me. I will endeavor to reach the hearts of my infidel friends through the closet and by prayer."

He sat down overcome with emotion, amid the tears and the suppressed sobs of the assembly. All were deeply affected; for all knew what he once was, all saw what through the grace of God he had become.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Condition Occasioned much anxiety during the past week. The operation of Monday, August 8th, afforded him great relief, but left him feeble, and he suffered from nausea, as the result of the etherization. The new wound was also exceedingly sore, but is reported by the physicians to be answering the purpose for which it was made. The drainage tube used before the operation was performed has not been inserted since, as it prevented the President resting comfortably. The pus now flows spontaneously through the naked channel and is said to be liberal in quantity and of a healthy character. Public concern has been caused by the mention in the bulletins of the daily recurrence of fever with high pulse and temperature and of the excessive weakness of the patient. The physicians, however, still speak cheerfully, and encourage the hope that unless unexpected complications occur he will recover.

In connection with the President's debility a Cabinet officer relates an interesting circumstance. He says the continued high temperature of the past week could have been reduced in part if the President would have taken brandy to help his strength. He asked if it was absolutely necessary he should, and being answered in the negative, declined to take it.

As an evidence that the President is really making progress, although not rapidly, it is mentioned that he is now able to adjust his spectacles himself and to read the newspapers for a few minutes at a time. He also was able to affix his signature to a State paper on August 10th, and those who saw it say that it was no burlesque on his usual bold free hand.

The United States steamer Tallapoosa, which has been undergoing repairs and fitting out for sea, has a suite of rooms specially prepared for the occupation of the President in the event of the doctors deeming it safe for him to take a trip on the river when he is sufficiently strong to leave his bed. The suite consists of four rooms, including a bedchamber, reception and ante-room, and a bathroom. If it is determined to take the President on the vessel a swinging bed will be hung in his chamber for the purpose of preventing his being annoyed by the motion of the vessel. A steam heating apparatus has also been set up whereby the four rooms can be kept perfectly dry and warm. This precaution is said to be principally for use during the continuance of foggy or damp weather.

The Statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, read at the Bankers' Convention at Niagara Falls on Thursday last, covered the history of the refunding operations since the 4th of March. Mr. Windom said that of the six per cent bonds there had been presented for continuance at 3½ per cent interest the amount of $178,055,150, leaving to be paid off from the surplus revenue $24,211,400, for which the Treasury had ample resources. Having succeeded in disposing of the six per cents the same principle was applied to the fives, and of these Mr. Windom thinks "there will be continued in all about $400,000,000 of this loan, leaving to be paid $39,708,050, the remainder of the loan having already been paid from the surplus revenues under calls previously made."

Mr. Windom concluded his statement with the following summary, which shows how rapidly this perplexing and momentous problem is being solved: "Meanwhile, from March 1st to October 1st, 1881, when these operations will have been completed, there will be paid of 6 per cents $24,211,400, and of 5 per cents $69,320,650, making an additional annual saving in interest of $4,918,716.50—a total reduction of the interest charge in seven months of $15,370,095.25. In other words, the annual interest charge, which was on March 1st, 1881, $76,845,937.50, will be on October 1st, 1881, as nearly as can now be stated, $61,475,842.25. This saving in interest can hereafter be applied to the reduction of the debt, thus reducing it more rapidly than heretofore."

The Civil Service Reform Association Assembled at Newport, R. I., on Thursday, August 11th. Mr. George William Curtis, the persistent and uncompromising leader of the movement, presided. In opening the proceedings he said that was the first national conference ever called on the subject. Civil Service reform associations had existed as local organizations, and it has been thought best to call the conference for the purpose of interchanging ideas from different parts of the country on the subject. Among the resolutions passed was one indorsing the bill introduced in the Senate by Mr. Pendleton of Ohio, and that introduced in the House by Mr. Willis of Kentucky. The practical outcome of the conference was the formation of "The National Civil Service Reform League," to serve as a centre of correspondence and to facilitate united action. The several Civil Service Reform Associations were requested to designate one person each to be a member of the provisional central committee. We may hope that this concentration of effort may lead to practical result. The present system of Civil Service appointments is a gigantic evil, recognized to be so alike by Democrats and Republicans, and is the source of more corruption and abuse than is generally believed.

The Remark of Mrs. Hayes, that the Issue in Ohio this fall, lay between indorsing Garfield or Guiteau, has caused no little resentment among respectable Democrats who naturally objected to be classed with an assassin. It is now explained that Mrs. Hayes did not intend that her words should convey that meaning. She thought that the President's own State ought, in the circumstances, to record its abhorrence of Guiteau's crime by a substantial majority for the President's friends, and therefore deprecated the nomination of a prohibition ticket as being calculated to reduce that majority.

The Opinions of Ex-President Woolsey of Yale College have always been received with respect as those of a patriotic and thoughtful citizen. It is therefore significant that at this juncture he has placed himself on record in the matter of Civil Service Reform. In an interview with a reporter last week he said: "The present is the meanest kind of political system in the world. It brings the motive of self-interest in its meanest form into politics. It is onerous for the President and Congressmen, and it is hurtful to the interests of the people. If the present opportunity for its destruction is neglected, it may be long before another as favorable will occur.

"The appointing power, as far as the nomination of the President and the confirmation of the Senate are concerned, cannot be shaken, being fixed by the Constitution. The essential difficulty of the present system is that the President nominates persons of whom he knows nothing. It is natural that under the present system Congressmen should expect to have a voice in deciding what nominations shall be made in their districts; but the system is radically wrong in that it permits the distribution of patronage as the reward of personal or party services. The reform needed is a provision that the tenure of office shall be permanent during good behavior, and the establishment of competitive examinations for admissions to the Civil Service. Wherever such examinations have been properly conducted the result has been most satisfactory. England would consider any other mode of regulating admissions to the Civil Service absurd, and the public business of this country can never be as well performed as that of England until our offices are as carefully filled by persons fitted by training for positions in the Civil Service."

The Year of Storms, Tornadoes, and Sunstrokes.—The phenomenal weather of this year has not, according to a statement in the Memphis Avalanche been equalled in the past fifty years. That journal says that for half a century there has not been so long a duration of extremely hot weather as has been felt in most parts of the country, but especially, perhaps, in the South, since about the middle of June. The year 1881 will long be remembered as the scorching year, when the North was visited by more sunstrokes and more storms and whirlwinds than in any previous year during the past fifty, when more houses were blown down and more lives destroyed by tornadoes than ever before, and when the South was more generally burnt up in her corn crops.

The Progress Socialism is making among the people ought never to be lost sight of by those who have the welfare of their country at heart. An indication of the stage it has now attained may be recognized in the speeches delivered at a meeting of Socialists in Irving Hall, New York, on Saturday last. The chairman, in the course of his opening remarks, said, in allusion to Hartmann's flight from the city, that this country had once been a place of refuge for downtrodden people. It was such a home no longer. This country was really worse than Europe, because instead of one tyrant there were millions. Every cotton king, banker, monopolist was a petty tyrant. The time would soon come when people here would have to band together like the Nihilists in Russia to free themselves from this tyranny.

The Death of Mr. Matthew Vassar on Wednesday, August 10th, removes from the world one of the best known philanthropists of the State. He had suffered for many years from kidney disease, and on August 3d he had a severe attack. The surgeons in attendance performed two serious operations, but were unable to save his life. During the past twenty years Mr. Vassar has devoted the bulk of his time to the affairs of Vassar College, which he served as treasurer, and for which service he received no remuneration. Last year Mr. Vassar with his brother, Mr. John Guy Vassar, presented to the trustees the title-deeds of the Vassar Home for Aged Men in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. It will accommodate fifty inmates, and the founders showed their liberal spirit by selecting the board of managers without regard to religious denominations, and endowing it with $30,000 invested in the best securities. The property itself was valued at more than $45,000. In making the presentation Mr. Vassar took occasion to say that, as Providence had blessed him and his brother John with some of this world's goods, they had deemed it proper to do something for their fellow-men; that they had come to the conclusion that old men who had no one to care for them were especially deserving, and that was the reason of their presentation of the Vassar Home to the trustees that day. A local journal says: "At the time of Mr. Vassar's death negotiations were pending for the purchase of property for buildings for another charity.

Mr. Vassar gave away much money in secret charity. It is understood that a great part of his estate is devised to benevolent purposes. He was twice married, but leaves no children. Since 1841 he has been an active member of the Baptist Church.

A New Serial Story entitled "Sylph Somers: A Story of the Last Century," will be commenced in the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is written by Henry Martin, author of "Felicia Cuffe," etc.

A Lady Advocate of Civil Service Reform a prayer-meeting.—At a recent prayer-meeting a Connecticut town, the venerable mother of -Gov. Andrews said: "I hear the young men aying for the recovery of the President. I hope will recover. I believe he will. But I hope ese young men will learn the lesson, and vote so at such a sad crime will never be attempted ain. I hear that the President has been worried nost to death by office-seekers. God ordained at man should earn his bread by the sweat of his ow. I believe that many of these office-seekers nt office because they are unwilling to submit to od's law. I am a poor, ignorant woman, but I ink I could improve the present system of giving fice. I would have the applicants for office exined and no man appointed that was not willing earn his bread by the sweat of his brow."

A Farewell Meeting was held in New York August 5th, to listen to an address by Mr. Fran- Murphy, the temperance orator, who sailed the llowing day on the City of Berlin for Great Brit-n. Mr. Murphy's most recent work was in the regions at Oil City, Pa. He stayed for three eeks, during which time he secured two thou-nd signatures to the pledge, organized a branch the national Christian temperance movement, d established a reading room and a coffee-house. nence he went to Franklin by invitation signed 600 citizens, including the mayor and ministers the gospel of all denominations. There, too, he d a great work. Three thousand persons signed e pledge, the mayor himself heading the list, and society was organized with the mayor as presint.

Mr. Murphy said, "I have labored ten years for e cause of temperance, from Maine to San Fran-sco, and I am thankful to say that in that time ree million persons have signed what is known the Murphy Gospel Temperance Pledge." Mr. urphy will attend the Methodist Ecumenical Conrence in London, and afterward will proceed on lecturing tour through England and Scotland.

A Drunken Infidel Converted at a Meeting the Salvation Army at Newark, N. J., related e story of his life at a subsequent meeting. He id he was an Englishman, who having failed in usiness in his native country, decided on emigra-ng to America. He said: "I landed in New ork, and went from there to Philadelphia; on e third day after my arrival I got a situation in ne of the best business houses on Chestnut Street a salary of fifteen hundred dollars per year. I pt that position for some time, when, most unrtunately, two young men whom I knew came om England and called to see me, and I asked rmission to leave business and go show my iends the city. Off we went, and got to drink-g, and the consequence was, I lost my position." fter this he sank lower in the ways of dissipation, d becoming connected with a society of Infidels denied the existence of God. He was rescued the blessing of God on the work of the Salva-on Army, and is now rejoicing in Jesus.

The Revival at Indianapolis Continues with- t perceptible diminution of intensity. A brief spatch from that city says that the additions to e various churches since Mr. Harrison, the boy eacher, commenced his labors, now number over ve thousand. A portrait and life of Mr. Harri-n appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of ne 24th, 1880.

A Thrilling Narrative of an Escape from iagara Falls appeared in the daily journals on ugust 2d. Three men, two in one boat and one in nother, set out from the American side to return their homes at Chippewa on the Canadian shore the evening of August 1st. The place where ey attempted to cross was little more than a mile ove the falls. It was an exceedingly venture-me thing to do, but they were familiar with the er and thought they could play with the rapids a tle without being hurt. They were not more an half-way across when the river became cov-ed with a thick fog, and the men lost each her. It was impossible for them to guide them-lves in the darkness and mist, and they began to out for help. Their cries were heard on shore, t nobody dared venture into the stream to run the chance of finding them or being hurried over the falls. Their cries, however, were answered, and the whole town turned out to try to rescue them. The church bells were rung to direct the imperilled men which way to head their little crafts, but the roar of the falls drowned every other sound, and the boats were meanwhile drifting rapidly toward the edge. One of the men named Greenwood had a small anchor attached to a long line in his boat, and he threw it out. The anchor providentially took hold of a rock, and his progress was stopped. The two men in the other boat drifted down to within half a mile of the falls, their course being easily traced from the shore by their cries. Their lives were saved by their boat striking a counter-current, which carried them against a projecting point on the Canadian side, near the burning spring. Greenwood was heard shouting for help at intervals during the night, but when day broke he was seen still riding safely at anchor, and was soon rescued. This narrow escape from death is a warning not only to those who are reckless enough to brave material danger, but to those who encounter risks in which their souls are imperilled.

The Proprietor of a Notorious Dance House in Chicago converted.—It was recently announced at a prayer-meeting in Chicago that Minnie Brooks, whose house bore a bad reputation in the city, had been turned from the error of her ways by the power of the Holy Spirit and desired that her establishment might be devoted to religious services. The surprise produced by the announcement could not be estimated, the change being regarded as miraculous. Devotional services are, nevertheless, being held in the house, and are an evidence that if the age of material miracles is past the day of spiritual miracles is present with us.

A Strange Abduction Story is Related by a boy thirteen years of age, at Decatur, Mich. He states that on August 4th he was engaged in splitting wood in the yard of his father's house, and just after his mother left to go down town he got upon the fence to rest. After sitting there a few moments he was seized from behind, blindfolded, gagged, and his hands tied. In this way he was hurried off and compelled to walk a long distance by being pulled along, and was finally taken into the woods, where he was tied, hands, feet, and body, to a tree, when the perpetrator of the outrage left. The boy says he was very tired and could not move, and remained in that position all night. Toward morning he commenced to twist his body as best he could, and finally succeeded in getting slack rope enough to allow him to move around the tree, which he did until he wore off the rope and freed his hands. He then took the bandage from his eyes and removed the fetters from his feet. After wandering about for some time he heard the whistle of a train, and found his way to the railroad and thence home. The deed is supposed to have been the work of tramps. Those who in a moment of spiritual unwatchfulness are similarly blindfolded and carried captive by Satan cannot by their own efforts liberate themselves; their only resource is to cry to God for deliverance.

A Magnificent Stone is being Prepared in Nevada as a contribution from that State to the Washington Monument. The last of the silver letters in the name of the State is let into the panel. These letters are of solid silver, are about as thick as a silver dollar, some six inches in height and of proportionate width. They are so neatly fitted into the solid granite that the joint is almost invisible. Above the word "Nevada" is deeply cut in the granite the motto of the State—"All For Our Country"—and below the date 1881. The figures of the date will be plated with gold. The granite composing it is the hardest ever seen. That part which is polished is almost blue in color, while the remainder presents a somewhat gray appearance. The stone thus being prepared for presentation is of immense value, but no one feels that it is too good for the monument to "the Father of his Country." While we thus admit our obligations to the national hero, how comparatively few remember the sacrifice required of us by Him to whom we owe eternal life (Rom. 12: 1, 2).

A MINIATURE PORTRAIT OF JOSEPH.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"The Lord was with Joseph."—GEN. 39: 2.

Brief Scripture Biographies—A Quaker's Salutation at Mentone—God With Joseph—I. The Fact—With Him as a Child—As a Slave—In Temptation—As a Prisoner—As a Ruler—II. The Evidence of the Fact—Always Under the Influence of the Divine Presence—Pure in Heart—Always Diligent—The Ways of Place-Hunters—He was Tender and Sympathetic—His Wisdom—Kept Faithful to the Covenant—Professors Who Become Eygptians—III. The Result—He was Prosperous—Not Screened from Hatred—Nor Temptation—Nor Slander—Saved from Sin—Enabled to Fulfil a Glorious Destiny—Gave Him a Happy Life—A Double Inheritance.

SCRIPTURE frequently sums up a man's life in a single sentence. Here is the biography of Joseph sketched by inspiration: "God was with him," so Stephen testified in his famous speech recorded in Acts 7: 9. Here is the life-story of Abraham: "Abraham believed God." Of Moses we read, "The man Moses was very meek." Take a New Testament life, such as that of John the Baptist, and you have it in a line: "John did no miracle: but all things that he spake concerning Jesus were true." The mere name of John—"that disciple whom Jesus loved"—would serve for an epitaph of him; it pictures both the man and his history. Holy Scripture excels in this kind of full-length miniature painting. As Michael Angelo is said to have drawn a portrait with a single stroke of his crayon, so the Spirit of God sketches a man to the life in a single sentence. "The Lord was with Joseph."

Observe, however, that the portraits of Scripture give us not only the outer, but the inner life of the man. Man looketh at the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh upon the heart; and so the Scriptural descriptions of men are not of their visible life alone, but of their spiritual life. Here we have Joseph as God saw him, the real Joseph. Externally it did not always appear that God was with him, for he did not always seem to be a prosperous man; but when you come to look into the inmost soul of this servant of God, you see his true likeness—he lived in communion with the Most High, and God blessed him: "The Lord was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man."

Dear friends, how would you like to have your inner biography sketched? How would your soul appear if set out in detail before all the world as to its desires, affections, and thoughts? Many lives have looked well on paper, but beneath their surface the biographer never dared to dive, or, perhaps, could not have dived had he been anxious to do so. It is often thought wise in writing a man's life to suppress certain matters; this may be prudent if the design be to guard a reputation, but it is scarcely truthful. The Spirit of God does not suppress the faults even of those whom we most admire, but writes them fully, like the Spirit of truth as He is.

This striking likeness of Joseph strongly reminds us of our Master and Lord, that greater Joseph, who is Lord over all the world for the sake of Israel. Peter, in his sermon to the household of Cornelius, said of our Lord that He "went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for GOD WAS WITH HIM."

Exactly what has been said of Joseph. It is wonderful that the same words should describe both Jesus and Joseph, the perfect Saviour and the imperfect patriarch. When you and I are perfected in grace we shall wear the image of Christ and that which will describe Christ will also describe us.

How better could I salute you this morning than in the words of Boaz to the reapers, "The Lord be with you?" What kinder answer could you give me than "The Lord bless thee?" High up upon the mountains which form the back wall of Mentone I happened one day to meet a Quaker, in the usual costume, a warm-hearted lover of all who love Jesus. He saluted me and we found great unity of spirit. On parting I said, "Friend, the Lord be with thee;" and he answered, "And with thy spirit," adding, "It is the first bit of the liturgy that I have ever used." Truly, the oftener we can use it with our hearts the better, for none can object to it. Thus do I say to all of you this day, "The Lord be with you," and I know that you are responding, "And with thy spirit." May you find that your desire is granted, by the Holy Spirit's being with my spirit that I may speak words which shall refresh your hearts.

Now let us think of Joseph, and see what we can learn from him. "The Lord was with Joseph;" let us consider, first, the fact; secondly, the evidence of that fact; and thirdly, the result of that fact.

I. First, we will run over Joseph's life, and note

THE FACT;

"The Lord was with Joseph." God was gracious to Joseph as a child. His father loved him because he was the son of his old age, and also because of the qualities which he saw in him. Before he was seventeen years of age God had spoken with him in dreams and visions of the night, of which we read that "his brethren envied him; but his father observed the saying." Dear young people, it may be that God will not appear to you in dreams, but He has other ways of speaking to His young Samuels. You remember He said "Samuel, Samuel," and the beloved child answered, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." May you answer in the same manner to the call of God by His word.

"The Lord was with Joseph" when Joseph was at home, and He did not desert him when he was sent away from his dear father and his beloved home and was sold for a slave. Bitter is the lot of a slave in any country, and it was worst of all in those early days. We are told by Stephen that the patriarchs, moved with envy, sold Joseph into Egypt, but the Lord was with him; even when he was being sold the Lord was with Joseph. This delicate child of an indulgent father, who had been clothed with a princely garment of many colors, must now wear the garb of a slave, and march in the hot sun across the burning sand; but never was captive more submissive under cruel treatment, he endured as seeing Him who is invisible; his heart was sustained by a deep confidence in the God of his father Jacob, for "Jehovah was with him."

I think I see him in the slave market exposed for sale. We have heard with what trembling anxiety the slave peers into the faces of those who are about to buy. Will he get a good master? Will one purchase him who will treat him like a man, or one who will use him worse than a brute? "The Lord was with Joseph" as he stood there to be sold, and he fell into good hands. When he was taken away to his master's house, and the various duties of his service were allotted to him, the Lord was with Joseph. The house of the Egyptian had never been so pure, so honest, so honored before. Beneath Joseph's charge it was secretly the temple of his devotions, and manifestly the abode of comfort and confidence.

That Hebrew slave had a glory of character about him, which all perceived, and especially his master, for we read, 'His master saw that the Lord was with him, and that the Lord made all that he did to prosper in his hand. And Joseph found grace in his sight, and he served him; and he made him overseer over his house, and all that he had he put into his hand. And it came to pass from the time that he had made him overseer in his house, and over all that he had, that the Lord blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; and the blessing of the Lord was upon all that he had in the house and in the field." Joseph's diligence, integrity, and gentleness won upon his master, as well they might. O that all of you who are Christian servants would imitate Joseph in this, and so behave yourselves that all around you may see that the Lord is with you.

Then came a crisis in his history, the time of testing. We see Jeoseph in which, alas, so many perish. He was attacked in a point at which youth is peculiarly vulnerable. His comely person made him the object of unholy solicitations from one upon whose goodwill his comfort greatly depended, and had it not been that the Lord was with him he must have fallen. The mass of mankind would scarcely have blamed him had he sinned: they would have cast the crime upon the tempter, and excused the frailty of youth. I say not so; God forbid. I should; for in acts of uncleanness neither of the transgressors may be excused; but God was with Joseph, and he did not slide when set in slippery places. Thus he escaped that deep pit into which the abhorred of the Lord do fall.

He was rescued from the snare of the strange woman, of whom Solomon has said, "She hath cast down many wounded; yea, many strong men have been slain by her. Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death." Slavery itself was a small calamity compared with that which would have happened to young Joseph had he been enslaved by wicked passions. Happily, the Lord was with him, and enabled him to overcome the tempter with the question, "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" He fled. That flight was the truest display of courage. It is the only way of victory in sins of the flesh. The apostle says, "Flee youthful lusts which war against the soul." When Telemachus was in the isle of Calypso his mentor cried, "Fly, Telemachus, fly; there remains no hope of a victory but by flight." Wisely Joseph left his garment and fled, for God was with him.

The scene shifts again, and he who had been first a favored child at home, and then a slave, and then a tempted one, now becomes

A PRISONER.

The prisons of Egypt were, doubtless, as horrible as all such places were in the olden times, and here is Joseph in the noisome dungeon. He evidently felt his imprisonment very much, for we are told in the Psalms that "the iron entered into his soul." He felt it a cruel thing to be under such a slander, and to suffer for his innocence. A young man so pure, so chaste, must have felt it to be sharper than a whip of scorpions to be accused as he was; yet as he sat down in the gloom of his cell, the Lord was with him. The degradation of a prison had not deprived him of his divine Companion.

Blessed be the name of the Lord, He does not forsake His people when they are in disgrace: nay He is more pleasant with them when they are falsely accused than at any other time, and He cheers them in their low estate. God was with him, and very soon the kindly manners, the gentleness, the activity, the truthfulness, the industry of Joseph had won upon the keeper of the prison, so that Joseph rose again to the top, and was the overseer of the prison. Like a cork, which you may push down, but it is sure to come up again, so was Joseph; he must swim, he could not drown, the Lord was with him. The Lord's presence made him a king and a priest wherever he went, and men tacitly owned his influence. In the little kingdom of the prison Joseph reigned, for "God was with him."

He will rise higher than that, however, when opportunity arises for a display of prophetic power. Two of those under his charge appeared to be despondent one morning, and with his usual gentleness he asked, "Wherefore look ye so sadly today?" He was always kindly and sympathetic, and so they told him their dreams, and he interpreted them as the events actually fell out. But why did he interpret dreams? It was because God was with him. He tells them there and then that "interpretations belong unto God." It was not that he had knowledge of an occult art, or was clever at guessing, but the Spirit of God rested upon him, and so he understood the secrets vailed beneath the dreams.

This led to further steps, for after having been tried from seventeen to thirty, after having served thirteen years' apprenticeship to sorrow, he came to stand before Pharaoh, and God is with him there. You can see that he is inwardly upheld, for the Hebrew youth stands boldly forth and talks of God in an idolatrous court. Pharaoh believed in multitudes of gods; he worshipped the crocodile, the ibis, the bull, and all manner of things, even down to leeks and onions, so that one says of the Egyptians, "Happy people, whose gods grow in their own gardens;" but Joseph was not ashamed to speak of his God as the only living and true God. He said, "What God is about to do He showeth unto Pharaoh." Calmly, and in a dignified manner, he unravels the dream, and explains it all to Pharaoh, disclaiming, however, all credit for wisdom. He says, "It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace." God was with him indeed.

Joseph was made ruler over all Egypt, and God was with him. Well did the king say, "Can we find such a man as this is, in whom the Spirit of God is?" His policy in storing up corn in the plenteous years succeeded admirably, for God was evidently working by him to preserve the human race from extinction by famine. His whole system, if looked at as executed in the interest of Pharaoh, his master, was beyond measure sensible and successful. He was not the servant of the Egyptians, Pharaoh had promoted him, and Pharaoh he enriched, and at the same time saved a nation from hunger.

II. We shall next review

THE EVIDENCE OF THE FACT

that God was with him. What is the evidence that the Lord was with Joseph? The first evidence of it is this: he was always under the influence of the Divine presence, and lived in the enjoyment of it. I shall not need to quote the instances—all of them, at any rate—for everywhere, wherever Joseph's heart speaks, he lets you know that he is conscious that God is with him.

Take him under temptation especially. Oh what a mercy it was for him that he was a God fearing man! "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against Potiphar?" No. Yet he would have sinned against Potiphar, who had been a kindly master to him. Does he say, "How shall I do this great wickedness, and sin against this woman?" for it would have been a sin against her. No; but just as David said, 'Against Thee Thee only, have I sinned and done this evil in Thy sight," making the main point and consideration to be sin against God, so did Joseph, as he fled from the seducer, argue thus, "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" Oh, you and I always felt that God was near, looking steadily upon us, we should not dare to sin.

The presence of God was everything to Christ as it was to Joseph. Now, if you and I set the Lord always before us, if our souls dwell in God, depending upon it God is with us. There is no mistake about it. If you are under the influence of that text "Thou God seest me," you may be sure that His presence will go with you, and He will give you rest. No man ever perceived God to be present and therefore walked before Him in holiness, and afterward discovered that he had been under a delusion. Grace in the life proves that the God of grace is with us.

The next evidence is this: God was certainly with Joseph because he was pure in heart. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God;" no other can do so. God will not manifest Himself to those whose hearts are unclean. He that hath clean hands and a pure heart, he shall dwell on high. Our Lord Jesus said, "If a man love Me, he will keep My words: and My Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him." When the heart is shocked at sin, and enamored of holiness, then it can enter into communion with God, and not till then.

The next evidence in Joseph's case was the diligence with which he exercised himself wherever he was. God was with Joseph, and therefore the man of God hardly cared as to the outward circumstances of his position, but began at once to work that which is good. When he came to be a slave in Potiphar's house, the Lord was with him, and he was a prosperous man; the change of scene was not a change of his dearest companion. He did not strike an attitude, and make a display of his grand intentions, but he went to work where he was, and performed ordinary duties with great heartiness, for the Lord was with him. Many would have said, "I have been unrighteously sold for a slave. I ought not to be here, and I am not bound to perform any duties to Potiphar; rightfully I am a free man, as free as Potiphar, and shall not work for him for nothing." No, the Lord was with him, and therefore he applied himself to that which lay next to hand, and went to work with a will. No doubt he performed menial service in the house at first, and then, by degrees, he rose to be the manager of the establishment. The truly godly man is ready for anything :

HE DOES NOT SIGH FOR PLACE,

but accepts the state in which he is found, and does good in it, for the Lord's sake.

The Lord was with Joseph none the less when he was cast into the prison. He knew God was with him in prison, and therefore he did not sit down sullenly in his sorrow, but he bestirred himself to make the best of his afflicted condition. Since the Lord was with him there he was comforted ; it would be infinitely better to be there with God than on the throne of Pharaoh without God. He did not mourn and moan, and spend his time in writing petitions to Potiphar, or making appeals to Potiphar. He set himself to be of service to his fellow-prisoners and the warders, and very soon he was to the front again, for "The Lord was with him."

When he came to be exalted, and Pharaoh made him to be ruler over Egypt, notice what he did. He did not strut about, or take his ease at court ; he did not stop to enjoy his honors in peace, and leave others to do the business, but he set to his work personally and at once. Read chapter 41 : 45 : "And Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt." Then read the next verse : "And Joseph went out from the presence of Pharaoh, and went throughout all the land of Egypt." No sooner did he get the office than he gave himself to the execution of it, personally inspecting the whole country. Many are so worn out by their toils in getting a place that they have no strength left for performing its duties. When they get a new situation their first consideration is how they shall spend the profits of it. Place-hunters seldom try to make themselves fit for the situation, but crave the position whether they are fit for it or not.

Many when they get an office are exceedingly skilful in showing how not to do it ; they get into the circumlocution office, and pass on everything to the next clerk, and he to the next, so that nothing is done. With them procrastination is the very hinge of business, and punctuality the thief of time. They do as little as they can for the money, upon the theory that if you are too energetic your labors will be too cheap. Joseph, however, was not of that sort, for no sooner was he made commissioner-general of Egypt, than he was up to his eyes in the task of building storehouses, and gathering up grain to fill them.

But notice again, God was with Joseph, and that made him tender and sympathetic. Some men who are prompt enough in business are rough, coarse, hard ; but not so Joseph. His tenderness distinguishes him ; he is full of loving consideration. When he had prisoners in his charge he did not treat them roughly, but with much consideration. He watched their countenances, inquired into their troubles, and was willing to do all in his power for them. This was one he was everybody's friend. He who is willing to be the servant of all, the same shall be the chief of all. God was with Joseph, and taught him compassion, for God Himself is very pitiful, and full of sympathy for the suffering.

He loved with all his soul, and so will every man who has God with him, for "God is love." If you do not love, God is not with you. If you go through the world selfish and morose, bitter, suspicious, bigoted, hard, the devil is with you, God is not ; for where God is He expands the spirit, He causes us to love all mankind with the love of benevolence, and He makes us take a sweet complacency in the chosen brotherhood of Israel, so that we specially delight to do good to all those who are of the household of faith. This was a mark that God was with him.

Another mark of God's presence with Joseph is his great wisdom. He did everything as it ought to be done. You can scarcely alter anything in Joseph's life to improve it, and I think if I admire his wisdom in one thing more than another it is in his wonderful silence. It is easy to talk, comparatively easy to talk well, but to be quiet is the difficulty. He never said a word, that I can learn, about Potiphar's wife. It seemed necessary to his own defence, but he would not accuse the woman ; he let judgment go by default, and left her to her own conscience and her husband's cooler consideration. This showed great power ; it is hard for a man to compress his lips, saying nothing when his character is at stake. So eloquent was Joseph in his silence that there is not a word of complaint throughout the whole record of his life.

How different from the spirit of those people who pry about, seeking to discover faults, and when an imperfection is marked, they cry, "Look ! Do you see that ? I told you so. These good men are no better than they should be." Yes, it may be true that there are spots in the sun, but there are greater spots in your eyes or you would see more of the light. Those who see faults so readily have plenty of their own. Like the man who stole the goods and ran away, they try to turn the scent by calling, "Thief, thief," after others. May God make us blind to the faults of His people, sooner than allow us to have a lynx eye for their flaws and an inventive faculty to ascribe ill motives to them. I wish we were as wisely silent as Joseph was.

"God was with him," and this is the last evidence I give of it, that he was kept faithful to the covenant, faithful to Israel and to Israel's God right through. Pharaoh gave him in marriage the daughter of a priest ; and the priests were the highest class throughout Egypt, and Joseph was thus promoted to be of the nobility by marriage, as well as to be at the head of all the nobility by office. They cried before him, "Bow the knee," and every one honored him throughout Egypt. Yet he was an Israelite still, and his good old father, when he came down into Egypt, found him one of the family in heart and soul. His father's blessing was greatly prized by him, and he obtained it for himself and for his sons.

HE WOULD NOT BE AN EGYPTIAN :

I notice with much pain that many professors who prosper in this world have not God with them, for they turn into Egyptians ; they do not now care for the simple worship of God's people, but they sigh for something more showy and more respectable. They want society, and so they seek out a fashionable church, and swallow their principles. They lay it all upon their children, for who can expect young ladies and gentlemen to attend an ordinary meeting-house, where such low people go ? For the sake of the young people they are bound to mix with society, and so they leave their principles, their people, and their God. They become Egyptians ; indeed, some of them would become devil-worshippers to gain rank and status. Off they go to Egypt, shoals of them, I have seen it, and shall see it again. If some of you get rich I dare say you will do the same ; it seems to be the way of men. As soon as a professor prospers in the world he is ashamed of the truth he once loved. Such apostates will find it heavy work to die.

Joseph stuck to his people and to their God ; though he must live in Egypt, he will not be an Egyptian ; he will not even leave his dead body to lie in an Egyptian pyramid. The Egyptians built a costly tomb for Joseph : it stands to this day, but his body is not there. "I charge you," says he, "take my bones with you ; for I do not belong to Egypt, my place is in the land of promise." "He gave commandment concerning his bones." Let others do as they will ; as for me, my lot is cast with those who follow the Lord fully. Yes, my Lord, where Thou dwellest I will dwell; Thy people shall be my people, and Thy God my God, and may my children be Thy children to the last generation.

III. Thirdly, let us observe,

of God's being with Joseph. The result was that "he was a prosperous man ;" but notice that, although the Lord was with Joseph, it did not screen him from hatred. "The Lord was with him, but his brethren hated him. Ay, and if the Lord loves a man, the world will spite him. We know that we are God's children, because the adversaries of God are our adversaries. Furthermore, "The Lord was with Joseph ; but it did not screen him from temptation of the worst kind : it did not prevent his mistress casting her wicked eyes upon him. The best of men may be tempted to the worst of crimes.

The presence of God did not screen him from slander ; the base woman accused him of outrageous wickedness, and God permitted Potiphar to believe her. You and I would have said, "If the Lord be with us how can this evil happen to us ?" Ah, but the Lord was with him, and yet he was a slandered man.

Now, what did God's being with Joseph do for him ? First, it saved him from gross sin. He flees, he shuts his ears : he flees and conquers ; for God is with him. O young friend, if God is with you in the hour of temptation, you will want no better, no grander result than to remain perfectly pure, with garments unspotted by the flesh.

God was with him, and the next result was it enabled him to act grandly. Wherever he is he does the right thing, does it splendidly. If he is a slave his master finds that he never had such a servant before ; if he is in prison, those dungeons were never charmed by the presence of such a ministering angel before ; if he is exalted to be with Pharaoh, Pharaoh never had such a Chancellor of the Exchequer in Egypt before, never was Egyptian finance so prosperous.

In such a manner did God help Joseph that he was enabled to fulfil a glorious destiny, for if Noah be the world's second father, what shall we say of Joseph, but that he was its foster nurse ? The human race had died of famine if Joseph's foresight had not laid by in store the produce of the seven plenteous years, for there was a famine over all lands. The breasts of Joseph nourished all mankind. It was no mean position for the young Hebrew to occupy, to be manager of the commissariat of the whole known world. If God be with us we shall fulfil a noble destiny too. It may not be so widely known, so visible to human eye, but life is always ennobled by the presence of God.

Also it gave him a very happy life, for taking the life of Joseph all through it is an enviable one. Nobody would think of putting him down among the miserable. If we had to make a selection of unhappy men, we certainly should not think of Joseph. No, it was a great life and a happy life ; and such will yours be if God be with you.

And, to finish, God gave Joseph and his family in Israel, which never happened to any other of the twelve sons of Jacob. There are two Josephs in Israel but only one Judah. Joseph has a double portion of the kingdom. Those who begin early with God, and stand fast to the end, and hold to God both in trouble and prosperity, shall see their children brought to the Lord, and in their children they shall possess the double, yea, the Lord shall render unto them double for all they may lose in honor for His name's sake. It may be they shall live to see the hand of the Lord upon their children and their children's children, and to them shall be fulfilled the word, "In thee shall Israel bless, saying, God make thee as Ephraim and as Manasseh."

Let us seek after a double part with God's people by keeping heartily with them. Who is willing to suffer with them that he may reign with them ? Who is willing to cast the riches of Egypt behind his back that he may have a double portion in the promised land, the land flowing with milk and honey ? I think I hear some of you say, "Here I am, sir. I shall be glad enough to share with God's people, be it what it may." Carry Christ's cross and you shall wear Christ's crown. Go with Him through the mire and through the slough, and you shall be with Him in the palaces of glory ; you shall share a double portion with Him in the day of His appearing. This can only be because the Lord is with you ; that must be the beginning and end of it. "The Lord was with Joseph :" O Lord, be with us. O Thou, whose name is Immanuel, God with us, be with us, henceforth and forever. Amen and Amen.

Frederick Shaw's Remorse.

The Last Days of Lucy Foster.

FREDERICK SHAW'S TROUBLE.

Frederick Shaw was a land surveyor and a man of some culture and education, whose hearty genial disposition won for him many friends and made him a welcome guest in scores of hospitable houses. Few men were better known in the North of England town where he resided than Fred Shaw, and his hearty laugh and ready joke enlivened many a dull prosy party.

But a change came over the light-hearted man, which his friends noticed with regret. He became gloomy, dispirited, and melancholy. Once or twice those who met him averred they had seen traces of tears on his cheeks, and all agreed that Shaw had experienced some heavy trouble. The change in his manner dated from a certain night when an accident had occurred to a carriage in which Fred Shaw and two companions were riding to their homes after an excursion of pleasure. They had reached a part of the road where several piles of small sharp flint stones were laid at regular intervals ready for repairing the roadway. The horse, a spirited animal, shied at one of the heaps and rushed madly along the road. In a few minutes the three friends were lying amid the ruin of the overturned carriage by the roadside. One of the party was dead, his neck broken by the fall; another had his arm broken, and the third, our light-hearted friend Fred Shaw, was badly bruised and shaken. He was, however, a strong robust man, and soon recovered the physical injury he had received. But the events of that night seemed to have left a weight on his spirits he could not shake off.

The real cause of the trouble no one knew. That it was in some way caused by the tragic death of his friend was generally suspected, but all agreed that it was silly to allow an accident so to disturb a man's equanimity. But Shaw could not be cheered; his friends said "he moped." One day he was seen to start out on a solitary walk in the fields, and, fancying himself unobserved, he cast himself at full length on the grass and burying his face in his hands gave way to a fit of uncontrollable grief. His watcher came to his side and regarded him silently. He was no sympathizing friend; his attitude, as seen in our illustration, and expression of his face showed that plainly. He looked at the weeping man much as he would have looked at the antics of some inferior animal, and as if he thought Shaw had lost his reason. He had, however, sufficient delicacy not to intrude on the sufferer in his agony, and walked back to the town without letting Shaw know he had been observed. On his way he met a man named Myers, with whom he had a slight acquaintance, and who, like Shaw, had once been a gay worldly man, but who had lately become in the phraseology of society "a saint." Instinctively he realized that such a man might be useful in Shaw's case, and he told him of the prostrate man and where he lay.

Myers found him still in the same position, and still apparently overwhelmed with trouble. Kneeling by his side he gently inquired what was the matter. He could get no answer, but only a look pitiable enough to melt a heart of stone. A few words of heartfelt sympathy, however, soon elicited the cause of Shaw's grief. His conscience accused him, Shaw said, as to the young man who was killed in the carriage accident, and he reproached himself for having led him astray. Shaw had known him in early life as a pious, God-fearing youth, but coming to the city and renewing Shaw's acquaintance, he had cast off the restraints of home life, and following Shaw's example had become an habitué of billiard rooms and the theatre. "He is lost," the self-accuser cried, "and his blood is on my hands."

It was for some time in vain that Myers directed the attention of his friend to Him whose blood cleanseth from all sin. He went with him to his home and prayed with him, but the self-accuser believed himself a soul-murderer and beyond the reach of pardon. At length, after several interviews and frequent prayer, light dawned on the troubled soul. Humbly and with a profound consciousness of unworthiness he was led by the Holy Spirit to trust in Christ and found peace. But the recollection of that fatal night never left him. He sought by every means in his power to win souls for Jesus, and he never saw a young man drifting from the religious beliefs and habits of his youth without making it his special aim to gain his friendship, and by entreaties and solemn warnings to arrest the wandering steps. So, out of Frederick Shaw's trouble came, by God's providence, help and rescue for many a young man in danger of eternal shipwreck.

LUCY FORSTER, THE LAWYER'S DAUGHTER.

Lucy Forster was the only daughter of a Canadian lawyer, who, though regarded as one of the hardest and most unscrupulous members of his profession, manifested towards her a tenderness and affection of which most people would have thought him wholly incapable. He had an indomitable will and an energy that scorned to be daunted by difficulty or fear of failure. He admired nothing so much as the resistless force of character that sweeps every obstacle from its path, and makes each new achievement "a stepping-stone to higher things." But by "higher things" Andrew Forster meant, not things moral and spiritual, but things which concern the position and progress of a man in worldly affairs.

Mr. Forster's daughter also had several of her father's characteristics, but in a different way. Her activity was mainly mental, but it was of a kind to make itself felt and acknowledged. The range of her interests was altogether beyond what usually engrosses the attention even of highly educated ladies. Without neglecting the lighter accomplishments which lend an æsthetic grace and adornment to social life, she had taken an interest in questions of metaphysics and philosophy which are always the appanage of the few. Better still, she had come to know Christ as her Saviour, and reposed with absolute trust in His unchanging love. Poor child of weakness, as she seemed, "Goliath of Gath stood not in half her strength."

Mr. Forster, hard, worldly, and unspiritual as he was, could not help being moved by the tender and loving appeals which his daughter frequently made to him as her failing health indicated her approaching demise. He could not treat her as a weak-minded girl, whose ideas deserved no consideration. With all his legal acuteness, he felt himself no match for one who had drunk in, from its primal source, that highest wisdom, the wisdom of love, and who spoke with the authority of one who had seen and known that whereof she testified. Many a witness had Mr. Forster baffled and confused in his time, but this witness could not be baffled.

When it became apparent that a few hours only remained to her in this world, Miss Forster summoned all her energies for one more appeal to her father. Clasping her hands together and looking up from the Bible she spent most of her time now in reading, to her father's face, as he stood lovingly regarding her, she said "Father, I know you love me, but you can do nothing for me now. I am fast gliding down the river, and shall soon reach the ocean of untried existence. In all its awful vastness it lies before me, but I do not fear it. The familiar scenes of life are passing away from me, but I go not forth as a stranger. He who fills the boundless void is with me, and I feel the pressure of His supporting hand at this moment."

The words were scarcely uttered, when a change, inexpressibly beautiful, passed over the features of the loved one, and in a few moments more her spirit had taken its flight.

Though in her last interview with her father Miss Forster had confined herself solely to the utterance of her own experience, in those supreme moments an indelible impression was made. He left the room where he had learnt the greatest lesson of his life, and, an hour afterwards, when one of his servants went up with a letter to his study, and knocked at the door, she received no answer. Fearing that he might be ill, she ventured, gently and noiselessly, to open it a little, when she saw the white head of her master bowed in prayer. With a fine instinctive reverence, as if she had caught a glimpse of the Holy of Holies, she instantly closed the door, and simply said to the messenger waiting below, "Master must not be disturbed at present."

After several hours thus spent in the presence of God, Mr. Forster came out from his study to attend to the arrangements for the funeral. But it was evident to all that he was a changed man. Character speaks in tones as well as in looks and words, and Mr. Forster's tone had now lost all its usual harshness. It conveyed, too, a certain feeling of repose in strength, which only those faces show which are turned Zionwards.

THE ADVENT PARABLES.

By Rev. Richard Chester, A.B.

The Principle of Reward—An Apparent Inconsistency—III. The Sheep and the Goats—Is it a Parable?—The Judgment Distinct from the Talents—Of the Gentiles—The Subject of the Kingdom—The Jews His Brethren.

THE results of the judgment for the proper use of the Talents, previously referred to (page 509), will be, as the two parables of Matthew 25 and Luke 19 expressly teach us, positions of kingly power and administrative authority in and over the numerous provinces, the different departments and offices which shall exist in the glorious universal kingdom of the "Kings of kings and Lord of lords." The latter parable, moreover, adds the all-important information that these positions will, in each individual instance, be assigned in exact proportion to the ability exercised, the fidelity exhibited, and the consequent fitness for such positions thereby acquired in their work for their Lord and Master during this present life.

What incalculable importance does this teaching assign to everything, from "the giving of the cup of cold water" to one, to the being instrumental in the conversion, or the restoration, of another disciple in the Master's blessed name!

Against such application of this parable, however, the introduction into it of the wicked, slothful, has been urged as a strong objection. Are we not, it is asked, if we put this construction upon it, required by the parable to believe that unbelievers, as well as believers, will be caught up to the Lord together, at the time of His Advent, and will stand and be reckoned with together before His judgment seat? The answer is, By no means; no more than we are required to believe from the parable of "The Marriage Feast and Wedding Garment" (Matthew 22: 1-14), that unbelievers, unclothed as they are in the wedding garment of the Redeemer's righteousness, will be admitted in the first instance to "the marriage supper of the Lamb," to be subsequently expelled when detected.

The main object of a parable is rather to inculcate great and important practical lessons or principles than to set forth the actual details or the consecutive ordering of events. It is a natural or earthly illustration of spiritual or heavenly things; and we are not in every instance to expect from such that all its parts shall exactly conform with the eternal realities which it is designed to put before our minds.

The instances above referred to are manifestly adduced to render the teaching of each parable all the more solemn and impressive. They are introduced for the purpose of heightening the representation of the blessedness and the glory which shall be the everlasting portion of the believing, working, faithful people of the Lord, by solemn contrast with the doom of the mere nominal professor.

III.—THE SHEEP AND THE GOATS.

Is this passage to be regarded as a parable, or as no more than a direct prophecy of what is to take place upon the Second Advent of our blessed Lord to the earth? The question has been often asked, and it is not easy—nor does it seem to be very needful—to give a decisive answer. Archbishop Trench seems to have given his decisive verdict against regarding it as a parable by omitting all mention of it in his exhaustive work upon the parables. In either case there is scarcely any passage in the New Testament which has been so generally misinterpreted and misunderstood.

It has been all but universally regarded as giving the emphatic sanction of our Lord Himself to the popular idea of what is called a "general judgment," that is, a judgment at the same time (the Second Advent) and in the same place (this earth) of every individual of the human species (good or bad, believing or unbelieving), from Adam down to the last who shall be born into the world: all of whom are to be together assembled before Christ's judgment throne, to hear from His lips their final award of everlasting life or everlasting punishment. It may therefore be regarded by not a few as rash and presumptuous to affirm that such is in no wise the teaching of the passage. Regard for the truth of God's Holy Word, however, renders it imperative so to regard between "sheep" and "goats." In the first place, the judgment here is unquestionably most distinct from the previous one of the parable of the talents. All individuals are therefore not included in it. Again, the word here employed to denote the subjects of this judgment—"the nations"—may with equal or greater propriety be translated "the Gentiles." It is so translated no less than ninety-three times in the New Testament. These "Gentiles," or "nations," being thus assembled before the Son of Man, subsequent to His Advent in glory, are at once, and previous to any reason being assigned for so doing, separated by Him into two distinct classes—"as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats"—and are placed, without any as yet assigned reason, "the sheep on His right hand, the goats on the left."

Then the reason for such distinction is assigned. Those on the right are bidden to "inherit the kingdom," those on the left to "depart into everlasting fire"—these widely different sentences being expressly stated to be the direct result of the widely different treatment by these two classes of a third, perfectly distinct class or party, whom the Lord specially designates as His "brethren," and which treatment He affirms that in each instance He has regarded as "done unto Himself." Then follows a direct denial upon the part of each of these two classes of their having had any knowledge whatsoever that in their respective treatment of this third class they were well-treating or ill-treating Him.

THE JUDGMENT OF GENTILE NATIONS.

Surely no professing Christian, whether real or nominal—no one who shall have ever read or heard the statement here made, and many a similar statement of our blessed Lord's made elsewhere in the New Testament, that what is done to His people He regards as done unto Himself—could, with any shadow of truth or of sincerity, plead the ignorance in this respect which is represented as pleaded by both parties here. Christians, nominal and real, are thus alike excluded from any share in this judgment. It is a judgment of Gentile nations, as distinguished alike from the Jews and from the Christian Church.

In what light, then, are we to regard this passage? For my part I can conceive of no other than the following:

The Lord having previously given direct instruction concerning the judgment of His raptured Church, and also incidental instruction (in the instance of the wicked and slothful servant) concerning the judgment of those who while professedly in the Church shall really be not of it, here proceeds to give further instruction concerning the judgment whereby He will determine who of the heathen or Gentile nations shall, and who of the same shall not, inherit His earthly kingdom as its subjects. In the previous judgment—that of the talents—He represents Himself as having provided for that kingdom its viceroys or governors, who shall rule over it conjointly with Him.

THE SUBJECTS OF CHRIST'S KINGDOM.

This subsequent determination as to who shall be its subjects is, He teaches us, to be made upon the ground of the previous conduct of these nations toward a third party, whom He designates as "His brethren." Who are these? Not, as some have suggested, Christian missionaries who have gone among these nations. Had they ever heard the Gospel from any Christian missionaries they should either have received or rejected it, and their having done either would have put their judgment upon a totally different footing from that which is here represented. Had they heard and received the Gospel their place would have been in the previous judgment of the talents. Had they heard and rejected it the condemnation of those who had so done should have been on account of such rejection.

This third party I can only regard as Jews—"His brethren" after the flesh. And the treatment of such being made the test of acceptance or rejection of the nations as the subjects of His kingdom, seems to be in exact accordance with the principle long before laid down, and ever acted upon in God's previous dealings with such nations. "Blessed ('Come, ye blessed,' etc.) is every one that blesseth thee; and cursed ('Depart ye cursed,' etc.) is every one that curseth thee."

If we remember moreover that, as is foreshown in many portions of the Prophetic Word, the time immediately preceding the coming in judgment of the Son of Man is "the time of Jacob's trouble," when the then living of the Jewish people shall receive specially cruel treatment at the hands of Gentile nations; and further, that these Gentile nations shall act in so treating them as the special agents and instruments of the last great Anti-Christian confederacy "against the Lord and against His anointed;" we get, it seems to me, strong confirmation of this view of the passage before us, and there is further no difficulty, as there otherwise might be, in the severity of the sentence thus passed upon those who shall thus be excluded from the kingdom.

Whether the interpretation of this most important discourse of our blessed Lord, suggested in this artifice, be or be not correct, it is assuredly well that our attention be directed to it, and that we endeavor to meditate upon and to realize it as the leading one of the New Testament predictions concerning His Second Advent. We do not assign to it its rightful position in the Word of God unless we regard and use it as the one which in proportion as it is rightly understood must furnish us with a key to the true interpretation of all Second Advent prophecy. Especially should we regard and use it as the most solemnly practical of all—as that to order by the teaching of which the details of our daily conduct and conversation will ensure our being "found of Him when He appears without spot, and blameless."

IN THE WOODS.

THE village schoolmistress, Mrs. Clift, knew Ruth well, for she had employed her as her laundress from the time she had taken charge of the school; and no linen could be sweeter and whiter than that which Ruth washed, and dried in the sun on the gorse-bushes growing about the old lime-kiln. Ishmael had been one of the most constant and least troublesome of her scholars; and she was willing to mark her approbation of him by entrusting her little girl to his care for a long day in the Lime-kiln Woods.

The spring had come slowly on during May, and though it was already June the trees were not yet in full leaf. The delicate network of boughs overhead still kept many an open space for the sunshine to stream through; and the half-transparent eaves glistened with a green light. There was no thick tangle of burdock and thistle at present to catch their feet and hinder them as they strolled along under the hazel-bushes. Here and there patches of bluebells covered the dusky earth; and in a few rare spots, known to Ishmael, white lilies of the valley were growing amid their broad green leaves.

No very tall or massive forest trees grew in the thin soil; but now and then an elm or an oak, somewhat stunted, spread out its crooked branches, and there were clumps of larches, tall and thin, growing in close companionship, with their pointed tops piercing the sky. And what a sky it was! A deeper blue than the bluebells under the hazels, with little clouds scattered over it whiter than the lilies, some of gleaming brightness, and others of a pearly gray, floating lazily along before the soft fresh westerly wind. Ishmael felt a pride in it all, as if the woods, and the flowers, and the sky belonged to himself.

"Sit down and listen, Elsie," he said, throwing himself under an elm tree, and holding his breath for very pleasure, as he strained his ear to catch the different notes of the birds, singing in these early hours of the sunny day. There was the merry whistle of the starling—did Elsie hear that?—and the deep, soft cooing of the wood-pigeons from their great clumsy nests in the fir-trees; and the harsh cry of the jay, as he flitted across the open space between some trees, displaying his bright blue wing-feathers. Oftener than any other note, except the chirp of the sparrows, came the deep, grave caw of the rooks, as they sailed by high in the air. Or was not the clear merry song of the thrushes and blackbirds in the bushes all about them the most frequent sound of them all?

But Ishmael knew also the note of the kingfisher and the woodpecker, and the plaintive cry of the lapwing, and the call of the little moor-hen in the swampy ground, overgrown with water weeds and tall bullrushes. Every sound, loud and low, of the busy woodlands was known to him; but they had never been so sweet to him as now, when, for the first time, he had a companion gazing admiringly into his face as he displayed his knowledge. Elsie was far before him in school; but here she sat with wide-open wondering eyes, drinking in every word he spoke.

"Oh, Ishmael!" she exclaimed, with a sigh of happiness and admiration, "I should think nobody in the world knows as much as you!"

Never before had Ishmael had such words spoken to him, and he felt almost dizzy. He began to think what other wonders he could show or tell to her. Yes, there were more wonderful things to disclose to her admiring eyes. The woods were beautiful; but he knew what was hidden underground as well as what lay open to the eye of day. For underneath their feet the earth was honeycombed with long, deserted galleries, and roadways, and tunnels, where ages ago the limestone had been dug, and brought to the surface by level shafts opening on the hill slopes. Far away from the light of the sun, these subterranean paths ran in many windings and twistings. Even on the surface there were indications of them in basin-like hollows of varying depths and sizes, where the treacherous ground had sunk in. Some of these hollows were filled with water, forming little pools, which glistened up to the sun, while others were dry basins green with turf and coltsfoot, among which wild strawberries grew.

Ishmael and Elsie had busily gathered the small red fruit, and strung it upon long bents of grass, to keep it as a dessert to the dinner they were going to eat in the woods. Ishmael hastily formed a surprise for Elsie. When the right minute came, when she was tired and hungry, and the sun beat hotly upon them, he would take her to the cool shelter of a cave near at hand, where he could show to her the entrance into the old limestone quarry.

They came at length to a broad open glade, stretching far away between two rows of trees, which was the famous spot for shooting-bouts in the autumn, when the squire's visitors spent whole days in sport. Here in the long, untrodden grass lay the old cartridge cases thrown hastily away last year. Ishmael told Elsie how the cracking of the guns rang all day long, and how the smell of the gunpowder and its thick smoke tainted the sweet air; and how, at night, when all was over, there seemed a sorrowful silence in the wood, as if its timorous inhabitants had been scared into utter terror.

"And the rabbits keep in their burrows," said Ishamel; "and don't come out to play after sunset, like they do other nights, ay, by hundreds and thousands, running after one another, and tumbling about like us on the green, when we've a holiday; and you can see their little white pads tossing about in the dusk. If you sit very still they'll come a'most to your feet. And the bats fly about, and the cockchafers, and big white owls, that make no noise when they fly. I'll show you our big owl at home before you go home to-night."

They were sauntering along the glade slowly, when suddenly, from under their very feet, as it seemed to Elsie, there sprang up, with a loud whirr and a great fluttering of wings, a pheasant which had been sitting close on her nest among the long grass, till their feet nearly touched her. Elsie uttered a little scream of fright; but Ishmael went down on his knees in a moment, parting the tangled grass which hid the nest. There lay a cluster of brown eggs, ten of them, packed closely together, and warm with the brooding-heat of the mother-hen.

"Oh!" cried Elsie, eagerly, "can't we have some of them for dinner? Only we can't cook them, you know, without a fire and a saucepan."

"Ay, but we can!" answered Ishmael, proud of doing what seemed impossible to his companion; "we can make a fire, and roast 'em in the ashes. We won't take more than four, two apiece; and I can tell which are the newest laid. See, I've got a match in my pocket, and we'll pick some sticks, and light a fire in a place I know of, where nobody can ever find us."

Gathering up the sticks as they went along, he led Elsie to his cave. It was situated about halfway down a steep slope which was overgrown with hazel-bushes and brambles. The low archway of the entrance was little more than a yard high, and was quite concealed by the brushwood. Within, the roof rose to a good height, and the floor of limestone was dry, forming altogether a pleasant retreat, large enough to hold from twenty to thirty persons. A green twilight reached them through the closely-interwoven network of underwood; and a delicious coolness made it the pleasantest place possible now the sun was so high in the blue sky.

"Look, Elsie," said Ishmael, leading her to the back of the cave, where a small hole, not unlike a large rabbit-burrow, led darkly into some space beyond, "I've crawled through there many a time; and if it wasn't for your frock we'd go now—you and me. Oh, it goes for miles and miles under the wood; and sometimes there's a little bit o' light coming through cracks in the ground; and there are pools all black and still, with just a tiny sparkle on them to show where they are; and there are glistening stones hanging down from the roof, and drops o' water always falling, falling from them. Oh, I wish you were a boy, and could creep in along with me!"

"Oh, couldn't I?" cried Elsie.

"No, it 'ud never do," he said, decisively. "Never mind; I'll light the fire now, and we'll have our dinner."

The fire was quickly kindled, and after it had died down a little, the four eggs were covered over with hot embers, and left to roast. Ishmael had brought a can of sparkling water from a little spring trickling down the rock, while Elsie had laid out their dinner. Now she was sitting beside it on a big stone, with her hands lying idly on her lap in simple enjoyment, and her blue eyes gazing out happily on the waving branches outside, whose shadows flickered up to her feet in a constant dance.

"Oh, Ishmael," she cried, "I must say the song mother taught me about, 'That's the way for Billy and me.' It seems as if it was made for us; and I'll say them while the eggs are roasting.

"Where the pools are bright and deep,
Where the gray trout lies asleep,
Up the river and over the lea,
That's the way for Billy and me.

"Where the blackbird sings the latest,
Where the hawthorn blooms the sweetest,
Where the nestlings chirp and flee,
That's the way for Billy and me.

"Where the mowers mow the cleanest.
Where the hay lies thickest and greenest,
There to trace the homeward bee,
That's the way for Billy and me.

"Where the hazel-bank is steepest,
Where the shadow falls the deepest,
Where the clustering nuts fall free,
That's the way for Billy and me.

"Why the boys should drive away,
Little maidens in their play,
Or love to banter and fight so well,
"That's a thing I never could tell.

"But this I know, I love to play,
Through the meadow, among the hay,
Up the water, and over the lea,
That's the way for Billy and me." *

But Elsie had scarcely finished the last line, when she saw the branches before her slowly parted, and a man's head bent down, and looking into their cave. It was a brown, sun-burned, rugged face; she knew it well enough, but she had never liked it, and at this moment it filled her with vague terror. Ishmael was kneeling by the red and smouldering fire, and touching the eggs with the tips of his fingers. So absorbed was he that he did not notice the darkening of the green twilight as the game-keeper came stooping under the archway; and he laughed a low, quiet laugh of delight as he took one of the eggs from its hot bed.

"That one's done, Elsie!" he exclaimed, gaily.

"What's done?" asked Nutkin's harsh voice close beside him. "I saw the smoke from your fire, you young rascal, and I came to see what mischief you are up to. What, pheasants' eggs, pheasants' eggs! Would nothing else serve you for your dinner?"

Ishmael knelt unable to stir, and gazing up aghast into the gamekeeper's angry, yet triumphant face. What could he say? There were the eggs in the ashes between them; he could not even drop the one he was holding in his outstretched hand. He felt as if he could neither move nor speak. He had no right to those eggs; they were stolen; but he had not thought of that when Elsie had uttered her childish wish.

"I suppose you know," said Nutkin, very slowly, as if he meant every word to strike home, "that I shall take you to jail for this?"

"Oh, no, no!" cried Elsie, in an agony of fright; "we didn't know it was any harm, did we, Ishmael? The eggs were on the ground, and we might have trodden on them. Don't send us to jail!"

"It's not you, only this young scoundrel," continued Nutkin; "you may have to go before the justices, but it's him as'll go to jail for poaching and stealing. I've told the squire scores of times, and now he'll believe me. Get up, you rascal, and come along with me."

* This lovely little song is by James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, and is not as well known as it deserves to be.

suddenly Ishmael broke into a loud and bitter
, which rang through the cave:
'Oh, what will mother say when she hears of
' he cried.
'And what will father say?" jeered the game-
:per, "and brother Humphrey? We'll take e you don't grow up a drunkard, and a dis-ace to the parish, like them, my fine fellow.
me along! Elsie, you run home to your ther, and tell her to be more careful who you p company with another time. The squire 'll ieve me now."
So saying, he dragged Ishmael out of the cave, l taking a strong rope from his pocket, he otted it into a sort of handcuff, by which he nd the lad fast to him. Elsie followed them, bing, to the white dusty road leading to Up-n, where there was a police-station; and then ly watching them out of sight, she went home, ost heartbroken, to her mother.

THE COMMANDMENTS.

3. Lesson for August 28. Ex. 20:1-11. Gold-n Text, Matt., 22:37. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

VE read in the first Epistle of Timothy, 1:5, low the end of the commandment is charity (or ) out of a pure heart, and of a good con-nce, and of faith unfeigned." Thus in our len text, Jesus, quoting from Deut. 5:5, says the great commandment is, "Thou shalt love Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all soul, and with all thy mind." "Love is the lling of the law" (Rom. 13:10), and therefore nst "love there is no law." "The fruit of the
it is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentle-
, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance:
nst such there is no law" (Gal. 5:22, 23).
he end of the law is love," and "Christ is the of the law," i.e., love, to every one that believ-(Rom. 10:4). The tone of the old law is hou shalt," it expresses constraint, it is against e who are subject to it, but not against love.
he law is not made for a righteous man, but he lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly for sinners, for the unholy and profane" (1
. 1:9).
Then God gave the law from Mount Sinai, ything in the surroundings was calculated to ire terror. "There were thunders and lights, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the e of the trumpet exceeding loud; so that all people that was in the camp trembled" (Ex.
16). Then the people were brought near, but t not come up into the mount, they were ed to keep at a distance from God "lest the break forth upon them" (19:22-24). When s recounted to the people after their forty wandering in the wilderness the circum-es of God's giving of the law, he said, "The talked with you face to face, out of the midst e fire, (I stood between the Lord and you at time, to show you the word of the Lord; for ere afraid by reason of the fire, and went not to the mount)" (Deut. 5:4, 5).
ie commandments of the first table, which we considering to-day, contain God's just claim man in his relations to Himself. "I am the thy God, which brought thee out of the land gypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou have no other gods before Me." Fact and ience were God's warrant in asserting His
As thy God, I have a right to thy adorand thy love, but still more, I have redeemed from bondage, I have been true to thee; now ou true to Me; give Me the true place of God y affections, in thy desires, in thy service, in ery thoughts; let neither person nor thing be e Me. Let thy God be first. Now have we are believers kept this law? We too have delivered (have we not?) from slavery; we are we not?) free from sin. If not, we have eally given God the place of our God, and we utting self in some form before Him. It is ssible to do our duty toward God until we ap-iate personally His great redemption, and bein very deed free from the condemnation and ower of sin. Then the very fact that He has us free endears Him to us, our hearts are drawn out to Him, and the law of love which is written there sees Him as its first object.

The second commandment is directed against the strong tendency to idolatry which exists in every human heart. All the heathen have made likenesses or images after their own conception of their gods, and have worshipped them, even the work of their own hands. It is strange that the utter senselessness of idolatry has not struck its votaries. Isaiah represents a man cutting down a tree, using part of it for fuel, that he may gain warmth and prepare his food, and then, when his natural wants are satisfied, he makes of the remainder a God, a graven image, bows down to it, and says, "Deliver me, for thou art my God." How can that deliver us which we have formed? Thus we see that all the gods of the heathen are inferior to them in strength, in wisdom, in everything. But is there not among professing Christians in the present day something very much akin to this idolatry? There are many who say, "I believe God is merciful, and He is too good to let any of His creatures perish," and thus ignoring the holiness of God they make His goodness a reason for continuing to disobey Him, and transgress His laws. These have made a god after their own imaginings, for certainly this is not the God of the Bible, who says, "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity" (2 Tim. 2:19).

The curse which follows the breaking of this and other commandments has only to be traced in the families of the openly ungodly. For instance, where do we see the families of publicans living honorably and respectably generation after generation? There is a publican in the Black Forest of Germany who, in common with several others, has set up in his tap framed and glazed a parody on the ten commandments, placing his name in the place of God throughout. What is the result? The hand of God has been against that man. His wife is raving mad, one of his sons committed suicide, another of his children has gone altogether wrong, and the man cannot succeed in anything. "God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (Gal. 6:7).

The third commandment is directed against the lightly using the name of God. This is a commoner sin than is often supposed. Surely every one who prays with the lips while the thoughts are wandering far away, is indeed taking God's name in vain. God says of such, "This people draw near Me with their mouth, and with their lips do honor Me, but have removed their heart far from Me." Real prayer is calling God, the great Almighty God, to an interview; saying a few words learned from some one else, without much thought as to what they mean, and without expectation of any tangible result, is surely not prayer; but it is the sin of taking God's name in vain. And is not every unbelieving prayer of God's children a commission of this sin? If we pray, and then from looking to past experiences think it unlikely that God will answer our prayer, even in the name of Jesus, are we not taking His name in vain? When we pray for complete deliverance from any sin or infirmity, and then, because of our own weakness or because of unfavorable circumstances, we only half expect deliverance, or perhaps think it most likely that deliverance will not come, are we not limiting the Holy One of Israel (Ps. 78:41) and taking God's name in vain? False swearing is not the only way of violating this command.

The fourth and last commandment which contains God's claim upon us with regard to Himself, concerns the keeping of the Sabbath. Truly "the Sabbath was made for man" (Mark 2:27); but it was made for God too, not only that man might rest, but that God might be adored. The day of rest was a gift from God, before it became a commandment. "God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it" (Gen. 2:3), and He reminded the children of Israel when He gave them the manna, i.e., before the law was given from Mount Sinai, "the Lord hath given you the Sabbath." God commands us to remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," i.e., a day set apart unto Him. It is blessedly true that in the life of a true Christian every day is a Sabbath, every day is rest and every labor is rest, because the Lord doeth all our works in us, and there is no strain or compulsion in our service. But for God's honor He calls for an external observance of His own day, in which the ungodly may see our joy in His service, and in which they shall see that we honor Him, not doing our own ways, nor finding our own pleasure, nor speaking our own words (Isa. 58:13).

The Lord gives three reasons for the observance of the Sabbath; the first is as a remembrance of creation and of His rest: "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it." Again He would have them to observe it as a remembrance of redemption: "Remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence . . . therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day" (Deut. 5:15). Yet again, the Sabbath was a sign that God sanctified His people: "Verily My sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign between Me and you throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you. Ye shall keep the Sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you. Every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people" (Ex. 31:13, 14). In face of such passages, how can we regard without sorrow the growing desecration of the Sabbath day in our lands, the doing away with God's sign to the world that His people are holy.

A Rescued Life Consecrated to Christian Service. A London clergyman recently related the following incident with which he became acquainted during his residence as a missionary in India. A man had climbed a palm-tree for the purpose of fixing a receptacle for juice, when he beheld beneath him a sight which filled him with alarm. A woman placed beneath the tree a child, which she was evidently about to trample to death. Quick as thought the man in the tree raised a loud and piercing outcry, which so startled the woman that she instantly fled, leaving the child behind her. The local authorities investigated the case, but as the woman could nowhere be found the infant was handed over to the wife of a missionary, who accepted the little waif as a gift of Providence, and taught her, while yet a child, to know and love the Saviour. As she grew up, the girl so strangely rescued gave evidence of having been truly converted, and was greatly blessed to the spiritual good of many native girls and women. She is now about twenty-two years of age, and as the wife of a missionary gives herself up entirely to Christian work, in which God continues to honor her in the conversion of sinners.

A Momentous Sunday-Evening Walk.—At a recent meeting in the East End of London, the Earl of Shaftesbury related the following incident, illustrating the value of Sunday-schools and the influence of little children. "A gentleman visited a man whom he had known as a very godless, bad fellow, but who had recently displayed a blessed change of mind, and had with his wife, also notorious as a reckless, wicked character, appeared at religious services. He asked how this had happened, and the man replied, 'I will tell you; my wife and I were out walking one Sunday evening, and were passing by Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle.' They turned in out of curiosity, and Mr. Spurgeon, who was preaching, spoke forcibly of the consequences of a careless, sinful life, and entreated the unconverted to pray to God for pardon. The man and his wife went home very much affected. He said to his wife, 'Sukie, did you like what the preacher said?' 'No, Jack,' she replied, 'I didn't like it at all.' 'Do you remember what he told us to do?' 'Yes, he told us to pray, but I hardly know what it is. I have never prayed, have you?' 'Never, at all,' said the man, 'but I'll tell you what we'll do; there's our little Mary upstairs, she knows.' They awakened the little girl, a scholar in a Sunday School only nine years old, and she prayed with much fervor, and the father says, 'From that time I was a new man.'"

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Deadlock has Arisen in the British Parliament on the question of the Irish Land Bill. The bill as amended by the House of Lords was sent to the House of Commons on August 10th, when the latter house took into consideration the alterations made by the Peers. In one or two cases the amendments were accepted, others were modified, and those which affected the vital principle of the bill were rejected. Among the last named was an amendment providing that the compensation a landlord should be required to pay for the eviction of a tenant should in no case exceed $1250. Another rejected amendment was to the effect that the arbitration court should not have the power to quash a lease in which the tenant had consented to unfair terms under threat of eviction. When the amendments had been rejected, the bill was sent back to the Lords, who promptly restored them by decisive majorities. According to ancient usage both houses then nominated committees to draw up reasons for ther respective action, and prepare for a conference between the two houses.

The Contest between the Houses of Lords and Commons, both parties admit, is fraught with serious danger to the constitution. The disagreement has stirred the country from end to end. The correspondent of the New York World telegraphs as follows: "Men see that the battle between the democracy and the plutocracy is at hand, and there is an uncomfortable feeling abroad that grave political and perhaps constitutional changes are imminent. Mr. Gladstone says that he will not yield a hair's breadth in this struggle, and that he will seize the opportunity of calling the attention of the country to the fact that the work of an entire session of a vast majority of the people's representatives can be destroyed in a few hours by the upper house."

This means that he will appeal to the people in the dispute and propose some constitutional change, limiting the power of the House of Lords. It is notorious that for some time one article in the programme of radical politicians has been the abolition of the hereditary chamber, and it would appear that this crisis has induced Mr. Gladstone to seriously consider the propriety of proposing it in some modified form. Lord Salisbury is the leader who is responsible for the uncompromising attitude of the peers. Lord Cairns and the Duke of Richmond, two prominent lords belonging to the same party, counselled submission.

The Unexpected Release of Mr. Dillon, the Land League leader, who was arrested for making seditious speeches, caused unusual excitement in Ireland on Monday, August 8th. He was liberated late the previous night, and drove quietly to his home without any of his friends being aware of his release. On Monday the news spread, and Mr. Dillon was overwhelmed with congratulations. The government released him unconditionally, and it is expected that he will resume his place in the League and continue the agitation. When questioned on the subject in the House of Commons, Mr. Forster, the Irish Secretary, said that Mr. John Dillon had been released because a report had been received that further confinement would endanger his life. This report, upon investigation, was confirmed by other physicians. Under the circumstances it was not thought necessary to ask Mr. Dillon to sign any conditions. The London Times and other journals approve of the government's action. Mr. Dillon has been imprisoned since May 3d.

A Remarkable Financial Phenomenon has attracted attention in Egypt. There is a surplus in the national treasury equivalent to five million dollars. It is so unusual for any country under Turkish control to show anything but a deficit that the event is worth recording. Egypt has for a long time been upon the verge of bankruptcy, the viceroy being extravagant in his expenses, spending large sums on the erection of new palaces and on his harem. Since his deposition these expenses have been cut down, and his successor has followed the advice of England and France, to which nations his creditors chiefly belong. The result has been that the national income has more than sufficed to cover the expenditure, and the army and civil servants have been punctually paid. Another gratifying result of foreign intervention has been the partial suppression of the slave-trade with the interior. It is still carried on to a grievous extent, but it is done with difficulty, and only by purchasing the connivance of corrupt pashas.

The Pope is Said to be Seriously Considering the advisability of quitting Rome and residing either in America or in Malta. Rumors of a similar character have been in circulation before now, during the pontificate of the present pope and his predecessor, and they are probably without foundation. The palace of the Vatican, which the Pope occupies, is so rich in treasures of art and its library is filled with books of such priceless value, that Leo is not likely to remove voluntarily from the place. A more significant fact in this connection, however, is the agitation in Italy in favor of revoking the law known as the papal guarantees, by which the Pope is in the enjoyment of certain privileges, and by which a large income is set apart for his use. The present administration advocated the revocation when its members were in opposition.

M. Gambetta, the French Statesman, whose name has been, since Sedan, more prominent than any other in France, delivered a campaign speech on Friday at the Parisian suburb of Ménilmontant. The meeting was somewhat turbulent, and some hostility was manifested toward M. Gambetta. His policy during the past few months has inspired a growing distrust of him in the minds of extreme republicans. They suspect that he is intriguing to grasp supreme power in France, and in some quarters he is openly denounced as a traitor to the republic. He directed his observations on Friday to the removal of this apprehension and defended his public career, claiming that he had been throughout a sincere republican. "I am," he said, "like yourselves, a mere citizen, a servant of the democracy." The result of the elections to the legislature now taking place in France is anticipated on all hands with painful anxiety.

The Difficulties in the Negotiation between the Boers and Great Britain for the cession of the Transvaal have been arranged. A dispatch from Pretoria, dated August 8th, says: "The retrocession of the Transvaal to the Boers has been formally effected, and the Boer government has issued a proclamation announcing the establishment of the South African Republic. Mynheer Bok, Secretary of State, and several other officials have been sworn in. The proceedings were perfectly orderly. A dispatch from Durban announces that Secocoeni, the famous South African chief, who surrendered in December, 1879, and was sent by Sir Garnet Wolseley to Cape Town, has been released."

Mr. Bradlaugh has Applied for a New Trial of the action brought against him by Mr. Clarke for sitting in the House of Commons and voting, not having taken the oath. The application was granted, but the cable does not say on what grounds the privilege was accorded him. He received an injury to his arm during his attempt to force an entrance into the House on August 3d, and erysipelas has set in; he is confined to his room, but is not thought to be in danger of his life. The police showed marked forbearance on the occasion, and did not use unnecessary violence, but Mr. Bradlaugh is a strong, stalwart man, and considerable force was required to prevent his effecting his purpose.

The Wesleyan Methodist Connection Entered on Tuesday, July 19th, upon their one hundred and thirty-eighth Annual Conference at Liverpool, England. That the Connection has survived, keeping its distinct religious character and extending its influence and jurisdiction through so many years, is sufficient proof of the vitality of its principles. Of all religious bodies in England which are separated from the Established Church, that of the Wesleyan Methodists is the most interesting and unique. The Annual Conference is no unmeaning ceremony; eight hundred Wesleyan ministers were assembled, not for the purpose alone of communing with each other, and bringing into prominence their internal dissensions, but for the transaction of real, legitimate business. On the first acts of the Conference was to elect a President, and the lot fell upon Dr. Osborn. election on this occasion derived unusual imp ance from the fact that a Methodist Œcumen Conference will be held in London in Septem and it was felt that the Wesleyan Metho ought to be represented by a President worth his dignified office. The choice really lay betv Dr. Osborn and the Rev. W. M. Arthur, bot whom were eminently qualified for the posi Mr. Arthur, however, declined to be a candi and Dr. Osborn was elected with compar unanimity. It is not the first time that Dr. born has occupied the president's chair, and Wesley he is the oldest minister who has pre over the conference.

THE LATE DEAN STANLEY.

Character of the Dean—Birth and Early Life—At Rugby School—The Deanery at Westminster—Literary Work—Visit to America—Illness and Death—Royal Friendship—His Last Sermon—A Significant Text.

A SENSE of bereavement, so close as to be almost personal in its intensity, was experienced throughout the English-speaking world when, on Monday, July 18th, the news spread that Dean Stanley was dead. He had made many personal friends in America during his recent visit, who now mourn his loss. They had learned the many excellencies of his character from his writings, and his frank, cordial manner, and sincere appreciation of the good points in our institutions, which Englishmen frequently fail to recognize, deepened the respect they previously felt into warm affection.

It was not by his merits as a theologian that Dean Stanley attained the high position he occupied in public esteem, either here or in England. Both evangelical Christians and adherents of the High Church were separated in theology from him by a wide gulf, but by both he was respected as a sincere Chrstian, an earnest worker, and a generous, warm-hearted friend. The Evangelical Christian saw with deep sorrow the absence in Dean Stanley's teaching of the doctrine of man's inherited and inherent depravity, and the salvation of man through the Sacrifice on the Cross; the High Churchman considered that the dean failed in his want of appreciation for the ceremonies of the Church, but the dean regarded both as his brethren, extended to both his cordial esteem, and was always ready to discourse with them on the points in which they could agree.

He regarded

as one of reconciliation, and he labored hard, and not without success, to disarm hostility within and outside of the church to which he belonged. To him, Christianity was pre-eminently the religion of love, of tender, comprehensive, all-embracing, benevolence, and he appeared, by the readiness with which he fraternized with leaders whose creed differed most widely from that of his own church, to regard dogmatic truth as of minor importance. There is no doubt that this disposition seriously impaired the Dean's usefulness in the great work of winning souls for Christ, but it also exercised an indirect beneficial influence, in attracting to the church men, especially young men, of high culture, of scholarly and scientific attainments, to whom Christianity in the form of dogma is repulsive.

Such men, allured to the church by Dean Stanley's exhibition of religion, were brought under its influence, and were thus rendered more amenable to the higher teaching of salvation by grace through our Lord Jesus Christ. Thus it happened that on Monday, July 25th, there were at Dean Stanley's funeral, drawn together by a common sorrow, men of many nationalities, and men who differed as widely on religious subjects as Huxley and Darwin and the Bishops of London and Peterborough. The Prince of Wales and his brother, Mr. Gladstone and Lord Salisbury, the Duke of Argyll and the Earl of Shaftesbury, with many other well-known men whose tastes, dispositions, and associations differed from each other as widely as it is possible for them to differ, stood side by side, united in one spirit—that of reverence for the dead and regret that the place he had filled in the world had become vacant.

Dean Stanley's life was a very busy one. There will probably be a complete record of it published in the form of a biography from the pen of Canon Farrar, or some other of his numerous friends. In the meantime the following narrative of its more salient features will be of interest to our readers.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Arthur Penrhyn Stanley was the second son of a former Bishop of Norwich, who is well remembered for the nautical enthusiasm which he possessed through life (he longed to be a sailor when a boy), for his love of natural science, and for his singular freedom from religious intolerance, standing on the same platform as Father Mathew, the Irish priest and temperance pioneer. He also preached a funeral sermon on Joseph Gurney, the Quaker philanthropist. For thirty-two years the father was rector of Alderley, where he won all hearts, and many of his traits appeared in the son. The honored mother of Dean Stanley was Catherine, daughter of the Rev. Oswald Leycester, rector of Stoke-upon-Trent, England.

He was born in the year 1815, and having enjoyed the tuition of his accomplished father during his early boyhood he was sent at the age of fourteen to Rugby School, of which the year previously the renowned Thomas Arnold had been appointed head master. In 1834 he proceeded to University College, Oxford, where he obtained numerous distinctions, and laid the foundation of the accomplished scholarship for which he was so remarkable. He gained a prize for his poem "The Gypsies," took a first class in classics, won the Ireland scholarship, a Balliol scholarship, and the Newdigate prize, the Latin Essay prize, the Theological prize, and the English Essay prize.

In 1842 occurred Dr. Arnold's sudden death; and Mr. Stanley, who had by this time been ordained, preached the funeral sermon in Rugby School chapel, where eight years before he had sat an attentive listener to the words of his venerated teacher. Two years later, Stanley published the work which first drew attention to his many high qualities—his one of the finest specimens of biography in the English language. In its whole plan and execution it is a model memoir of a noble man, by one whose relation to him is far from being adequately described in the statement that he was a favorite pupil. For though a reverent disciple, the biographer was also the respected friend whom Arnold thought it useful to consult, as his letters show, not merely upon literary matters, but also on other subjects of practical moment. The "Life of Arnold" exerted a powerful influence in this country, not only upon the teaching class, who drew abundant inspiration from the example of the Rugby master, but likewise upon a numerous body of young ministers and students of theology, who found in the utterances of Arnold help in their perplexities respecting Christian doctrine and the interpretation of Scripture.

At this time Mr. Stanley was Fellow and Tutor of University College, where he endeared himself to several generations of undergraduates by his unvarying kindness and almost fatherly sympathy. He was the very reverse of the usual type of "Oxford don," between whom and the youths he has to teach there is too often an absence of sympathetic feeling.

In 1851 Dr. Stanley was appointed Canon of Canterbury, and during this period he wrote his "Historical Memorials of Canterbury." In 1858 he resigned his canonry, becoming instead a Canon of Christ Church, and chaplain to Dr. Tait, then Bishop of London, but now well known as Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1864, when Dr. Trench was made Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Stanley was appointed to and in the same year he married Lady Augusta Bruce, sister of Lord Elgin, and for many years a personal friend and attendant of the Queen. His marriage gradually drew the dean from the comparative retirement of his former life into the choicest circles of London society, intellectual, literary, political, and aristocratic. He was wont to say that he had never really lived until his marriage. His friends had always been among the leading spirits of the time, and his house at Oxford was renowned for his abundant and catholic hospitality. But in London he moved in a larger circle, and under the auspices of Lady Augusta Stanley the deanery at Westminster became one of the most distinguished salons in London.

An important share was borne by Lady Augusta in all her husband's labors and pursuits. The dean himself thus chronicled his irreparable loss in a few pregnant words at the close of his memoir of his mother: "That 5th of March"—on which his mother died—"was the Ash Wednesday of 1862, when her surviving son was absent in attendance on the Prince of Wales, on a journey through Egypt and Palestine. On another Ash Wednesday, the 1st of March, 1876, he stood by the deathbed of her by whose supporting love he had been 'comforted after his mother's death,' and whose character, although cast in another mould, remains to him, with that of his mother, the brightest and most sacred vision of his earthly experience."

Dean Stanley's literary fame, as first evidenced by his "Life of Arnold," surpasses his fame as a public speaker. The book "Sinai and Palestine," which he wrote after visiting the Holy Land in 1852, is probably the best book yet published on those interesting regions.

He also published a commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians, which has been widely read and highly commended. He has also written a copious "History of the Jewish People," in which the Old Testament history is presented with so much clearness, eloquence of style, and historic and literary illustration, not to speak of learning and calmness of judgment, that not theologians alone, but also cultivated readers generally, are drawn to its pages. The last published volume in the series, which treats of the period intermediate between the Old Testament and the New, is not surpassed as a piece of historical writing by any of the later works of this class which have emanated from the English press. In point of style it takes rank with Macaulay's history, and the best chapters of Froude. The Maccabean period and the reign of Herod are described in a manner to fascinate the attention of every cultivated reader. He was also a diligent worker in the company of revisers of the New Testament.

But the volume which of late years has probably attained the widest circulation of all the dean's works is that on Westminster Abbey, with its tombs and monuments. No journeyings among the tombs can compare in interest with this last production, where the dean's wealth of historical knowledge and familiarity with English literature are employed, with characteristic grace, to illustrate the records of this venerable mausoleum.

Our space forbids even a mention of his many other compositions, or of the excellence of his sermons, especially of his funeral discourses. One however may be mentioned which attracted much attention, preached when a certain gifted novelist was buried in Westminster Abbey. On that occasion he showed how our Saviour had practically illustrated the "use, the value, and the sacredness of fictitious narrative," and he referred to some among the ideal children of the departed author, "making that grave," he observed, "seem to those who crowd around it as though it were the very grave of those little innocents whom he had thus created for our companionship, for our instruction, for our delight and solace."

HIS VISIT TO AMERICA

in the fall of 1878, and the cordial manner in which he was then received by all Christian denominations, and even by the Jewish members of the community, will be fresh in the memories of our readers.

While here he was the guest of Mr. Cyrus Field, and during his stay, Mr. Field's house was crowded with clergymen and literary men, the editors of all our great daily journals uniting to do honor to the illustrious visitor.

He preached a remarkable sermon in Trinity Church, New York, in which, with graphic strokes, he sketched the rise and progress of the different schools of religious thought which have left their impress on Christendom. On the same evening an enthusiastic reception was accorded to Dean Stanley by the bishops and pastors of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at which an address engrossed on parchment was presented to him. In the course of the address he made in reply, the dean related how some eight or ten years ago the President of the Wesleyan Conference waited upon him, and in courteous terms asked that a monument might be admitted into Westminster Abbey to the memory of Charles Wesley, "the sweet psalmist of our English Israel," and he had then said, "And why not John?" A monument to the memory of the two illustrious brothers was according erected in the Poets' Corner of Westminster

Abbey, close to a monument erected a century before to the memory of the poet Isaac Watts. "I rejoiced," said the dean, "to have his monument among those of the kings and the great lights, whether of literature or science, that adorn the walls of Westminster Abbey."

A delegation of Baptist ministers also waited on Dean Stanley to express the pleasure with which they welcomed his visit to America, and to whom he spoke in the same liberal, genial spirit he has shown to the ministers of other denominations. The Century Club also entertained the dean at their house in New York. There he met a distinguished company of literary and ecclesiastical celebrities, who cordially united in expressions of esteem and fraternal regard. That the dean fully appreciated the enthusiastic welcome he had received from the American people, was evident from his remarks at that meeting. He said that he had been told in England that he would be met with kindness and hospitality in America, but he had not been led to expect anything like what he had experienced. He referred to the pleasant homes in which he had been entertained during the delightful two months which he had spent in this country; and concluded by saying that he was delighted at every fresh bond that cemented and strengthened the kindly feelings already existing between England and America, and that he wished to return his heartfelt thanks for all that had been done and said for him and his friends during their sojourn here.

On his return to England the deck of the steamer was crowded by eminent men, anxious to see the last of the distinguished English visitor, and not until the last bell rang were the last farewells said.

His arrival in England was sadly opportune, for

was shortly afterward plunged in grief by the death of her beloved daughter the Princess Alice; and to no other voice did she ever give so willing an ear as to that of Dean Stanley, who was able to offer her the precious consolations of the Gospel. There existed for many years a sincere friendship between the royal family of England and the dean, which on both sides was one of evident respect and esteem. It was remarked a short time ago that Queen Victoria, who has shown an unconquerable aversion to visiting London since the death of Prince Albert, came all the way from the Isle of Wight to pay a visit of condolence to Dean Stanley, on hearing of the death of his wife, to whom she was personally attached, and at the dean's funeral, visitors noticed prominent among the floral tributes a beautiful wreath of China flowers, sent by the queen, which had the following note attached to it, in Her Majesty's own handwriting: "A mark of pure affection and high esteem, from Victoria R."

LAST ILLNESS AND DEATH.

Since the death of his much loved wife the intimate friends of the dean have noticed a certain failing of energy and vital power, but no apprehensions were felt even when his fatal indisposition began. On Saturday, July 9th, the dean preached a sermon in Westminster Abbey, but during the service was obliged to retire twice from attacks of nausea. On Sunday his illness became more pronounced. Though on Tuesday he was able to visit the library, on the following day he was prostrated by his malady, and from that time did not leave his chamber. On Friday erysipelas of the face set in, and during the next two days extended in an alarming manner. From this time the strength of the patient rapidly failed, and when Sir William Jenner, the Queen's physician, arrived, he pronounced that there was no hope. Previous to the last and fatal attack the dean engaged in prayer with the Rev. Canon Jones, but it was with the greatest possible effort that he could articulate.

The Archbishop of Canterbury was at the dean's bed-side during a portion of the last evening, and arrived just in time to speak a few words with him before he became unconscious. In the course of the day, Canon Farrar, the intimate friend of Dean Stanley, administered the Sacrament to the dean. He expired quietly and without suffering.

Dean Stanley looked older than sixty-six years, his form was frail and diminutive, and of late years was bowed as if with silent sorrow. A few weeks before his death, when he presided over the annual meeting of the Workmen's Clubs Association, he said, somewhat humorously, to a friend, before the meeting began, that he did not, like other men, realize much satisfaction through his senses, as he had only about one-half those allowed to ordinary mortals. The conversation, which took place in the Jerusalem Chamber, began thus:—"How beautiful the cedar-wood smells!" "Yes," said the dean, "so they tell me; but I cannot smell anything." He then went on to say how his sense of sight was failing him, and that his sense of hearing had always been imperfect, as he could scarcely ever distinguish music from noise; he not only had no ear for music, in the ordinary meaning of the phrase, but what to other people was music gave him no satisfaction.

At the service of July 9th, to which allusion has been made, the dean preached from the text, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God" (Matt. 5:7, 8). The sermon was of a very solemn character, and now that it is remembered as the last sermon he ever preached both it and the text are called to mind as very significant.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Reasons for Founding the Abbey by Edward the Confessor—His Exile and Solemn Vow—Cost of the Abbey—The Procedure at Coronations.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY, of which a picture appears on our frontispiece, is in many respects the noblest of all the venerable fanes that adorn England. It was built in the twelfth century, for reasons and under circumstances which are thus set forth in a life of Edward the Confessor: "The devout King destined to God that place, both for that it was near to the famous and wealthy City of London, and also had a pleasant situation among fruitful fields lying about it, with the principal river running hard by, bringing in from all parts of the world great variety of wares and merchandize of all sorts to the city adjoining, but chiefly for the love of the chief apostle whom he reverenced with a special and singular affection." A small abbey is, however, known to have stood upon its site ever since the seventh century.

King Edward was exiled by a hostile faction to Normandy, in France, but being afterward restored to the throne of England, he returned from his Norman exile possessed of a stock of ideas which he could not possibly have attained in his English home. With the exception of his long hair and beard all the marks of the Anglo-Saxon had been merged in those of the Norman.

Doubtless the idea of a regal abbey, on a scale hitherto unexampled in England, had been kept prominently before his mind by what he saw and heard during his sojourn in France. The motive by which he was actuated leads us back to times and modes of thought long since passed away. In that age, as still among some classes in Roman Catholic countries, religious sentiment took the form of special devotion to some particular saint. Among Edward's favorites St. Peter was chief. On his protection, while in Normandy, when casting about for help, the exiled prince had thrown himself, and vowed that he would make a pilgrimage to the Apostle's grave at Rome. This vow was, it is said, further impressed on his mind by the arrival of a messenger from England almost immediately afterward, with the announcement of the departure of the Danes and his own election as king. Edward having announced his intention of visiting Rome to the Great Council, the proposal was received with horror by nobles and by people. Great dangers, it was represented, would attend the pilgrimage; and, besides, at that critical time, his majesty could not be spared from his own dominions. The king at last gave way, on the suggestion that a deputation might be sent to the pope, who might release him from his vow. The release came, on condition that he should found or restore a monastery of St. Peter, of which the king should be the especial patron. Such are the circumstances in which Westminster Abbey had its origin.

ENORMOUS COST OF BUILDING.

The king spent on the building of the Abbey one-tenth of the property of the Kingdom. It was the first cruciform church in England, from which all the rest of like shape were copied, in expression of the increasing hold which the idea of the crucifixion had laid in the tenth century on the imagination of Europe.

Its massive roof and pillars formed a contrast with the rude wooden rafters and beams of the common Saxon churches. Its very size, occupying as it did nearly the whole area of the present building, was in itself portentous. The windows were filled with stained glass, the roof was covered with lead. The cloisters, chapter-house, refectory, dormitory, and infirmary, with its spacious chapel, if not completed by Edward, were all begun and finished in the next generation on the same plan.

This structure, venerable as it would be if it had lasted to our time, has almost entirely vanished. Possibly one vast dark arch in the southern transept—certainly the superstructure of the dormitory, with their huge pillars grand and regal at the bases and capitals, the massive low-browed passage leading from the great cloister to Little Dean's Yard, and some portions of the refectory and the infirmary remain as specimens of the work which astonished the last age of the Anglo-Saxon and the first age of the Norman monarchy.

The long expected dedication of the Abbey took place on Christmas Day, 1065, amid great pomp and high observance.

THE PROCEDURE AT CORONATIONS.

The rubric of the Coronation Service brings before us some of the most celebrated associations of the Abbey. "The Queen sitting in King Edward's chair, the Archbishop, assisted by the other archbishops and the bishops, comes from the altar. The Dean of Westminster brings the crown, and the Archbishop, taking it of him, reverently putteth it upon the Queen's head; at the sight whereof the people, with loud and repeated shouts, cry 'God save the Queen,' and the trumpets sound, and by a signal given, the great guns of the Tower are shot off. As soon as the Queen is crowned the peers put on their coronets and caps. The acclamation ceasing the Archbishop goeth on, and saith, 'Be strong, and of a good courage. Observe the commandments of God and walk in His holy ways. Fight the good fight of faith, and lay hold on eternal life: that in this world you may be crowned with success and honor; and when you have finished your course, receive a crown of righteousness which God the righteous judge shall give you in that day.'"

It is impossible to enter into technical architectural details, or to describe the various alterations which the Abbey has from time to time undergone. To form an adequate conception of what Westminster Abbey is, its manifold treasures should be studied with such aids as that afforded by the late accomplished Dean Stanley in his able and interesting work, "Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey," to which we have been indebted for the above particulars. The long line of illustrious kings, poets, warriors, legislators, and men of letters, whose remains or whose monuments the Abbey enshrines, passes before us in the Dean's eloquent and instructive pages, and in which all that genius, learning, far-reaching sympathies, and marvellous versatility can do, is done to make the old Abbey speak to the men of this generation, in no inarticulate language, of all the high instruction and the precious lessons which are treasured up in its history.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"And a highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein. No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon, it shall not be found there; but the redeemed shall walk there: And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."—Isa. 35: 8–10.

Wrong Ways—Marks of the Right Way—I. It is the King's Highway—The Brainard Pass—The Simplon Pass—II. It is a Clean Way—III. It is a Plain Way—The Convert in Philadelphia—IV. It is a Safe Way—The Heavenly Scroll—V. It is a Pleasant Way—The Wheel in a Factory—No Care on the Way—Some of the Travellers—VI. It Ends in Glory—Southey's Paltry Wish—The Christian's Glorious Prospect.

THERE are hundreds of people here who want to find the right way. You sometimes find a man, after journeying, standing at a cross-road, by his bewildered look indicating that he has lost his way, or is uncertain which road to take. There are many in this house persuaded of the fact that there are a thousand wrong roads, but only one right road. If I should come into your heart to-night, and were able to scrutinize it as only God can, I would find that the great question with you was about which was the right road. Here are various roads branching out; the question is, which one you had better take.

Here is a road which seems quite attractive, but there are many toll-gates on that road; you would have to pay your way; you would have to pay it in tears, in genuflections, in flagellations, and from that fact I know it is the Gospel way. Here is another road, with the houses of entertainment on either side of it of an evil nature; and there are bad solicitations to sin; and I know from the kind of people I see walking on that road, and the kind of people I see standing in the blackness of it, that it is the wrong road. Here is another way. It is beautiful, and it is macadamized. Horses' hoofs glitter and ring, and the vehicles spin down over the way. But in this instance you see the precipice, and you try to stop, and you begin to saw the bit in the mouth of the fiery steed, and you cry, "Whoa! whoa!" But it is too late, and you crash through the embankment, and you are gone.

From these roads I turn away; I want to find the right road; you want to find the right road. You know about the Roman Appian road. It was a very costly road; it was three hundred and fifty miles long; it was thirty-four feet wide; and on either side there was room for foot passengers. It was built out of hexagonal rock closely fitted together, and it was so costly a road, and so wonderful a road, that it exhausted the treasury of the Roman Empire to build it. And yet the invaders, and the elements, and time, that old conqueror who tears up a road as he walks over it, have left a mere ruin. Well, I have to tell you of a way older than the Appian Way; millions have gone over it, and millions are to come, and it is as good a road now as when the first pilgrim travelled on it.

> The prophets, and the apostles too,
> Pursued this road while here below;
> And therefore we, without dismay,
> Will walk, in Christ, the good old way.

I propose to-night, so far as God may help me, to tell you some of the characteristics of the Gospel road. "A highway shall be there, and a way; and it shall be called The Way of Holiness. The unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein. No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon, it shall not be found there; but the redeemed shall walk there: and the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads."

I. In the first place, then, I remark in regard to this road, that it is

THE KING'S HIGHWAY.

It is the royal road. You dash on through the Brainard Pass, and there is hardly a pebble to jar the carriage wheel. You go on over bridges which span awful chasms that almost take your breath, and then you go on through tunnels dripping with melting draperies, and yet approaching the rocks, and on by dangerous precipices, and perhaps for the first time in all your life you realize what it is to be on a royal highway, a royal road built by governmental patronage and authority.

Well, I am to speak to you to-night of another road. God sent His Son to build it. It was to span the chasm of earthly iniquity. It was to tunnel the mountains of earthly obstacles. It was to be blasted out of the Rock of Ages, and cemented with the blood of the cross. It was to be the royal road, the King's Son having built it. He waved His torn and blistered hand over it, crying: "It is finished." Napoleon spent fifteen million francs in building the Simplon Pass, that his armies might march over for the devastation of Italy. Christ, our King, has built a royal road, for a divine purpose, so that the armies of Heaven may march down over it, and the redeemed of earth may ascend it; and it has been done at vast expense, and all nations are invited to travel on it.

Other roads and other bridges have broken down under those who travelled over them; but this bridge is so mighty, and this road so great, that Christ having built the road, and mounted the chariot of salvation, and all His redeemed ones mounting with Him, they ride up the steep of Heaven amid the acclamations of angels. Done, well done, gloriously done, magnificently done. The King's Highway!

II. I remark again, in regard to this road, that it is

A CLEAN ROAD.

A road sometimes becomes fallow and miry because it is not properly cared for; but my text says in regard to this road that the unclean shall not walk there. Room on either side of the road to throw away all our sins. We may wash ourselves in the basin of the eternal rock.

> Firm and unmoved are they
> Who rest their souls on God;
> Fixed as the ground where David stood,
> And where the ark abode.

At every step of this road we cry out, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." It is a clean road. Without holiness shall no man see the Lord. If you have any idea that we can take our sins with us, we had better be looking at the finger-board of the road which says, "There is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death." If we expect to carry with us our sins, our lusts, our worldliness, I must in the name of God to-night shatter the infatuation. We must give up sin, or give up Heaven. It is a clean road.

III. But I remark again, in regard to the road spoken of in my text, that it is

A PLAIN ROAD.

My text intimates that the man who is three fourths an idiot can find it as well as a philosopher. The wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. So that though one be an imbecile, a laughing stock on the street, and pursued by the mob, derided and cursed, such an one will find the open gate of Heaven. While, on the other hand, there are many who are wise for this world, and who are fools for eternity. Astronomers with their telescopes sweep the heavens, yet are not able to see the morning star of the Redeemer. Many a man acquainted with the higher branches of mathematics is not able to do a plain sum in the Gospel arithmetic: What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his soul? Men able to botanize across the continent, and yet never having found the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the valley.

Oh, my friends, it is a plain road, plain pardon, plain peace, plain salvation. Why not this night start on it? Why stop for anything? I will not take your time up in philosophical discussion; you want to go to the city, and there is a right road to that city. After pointing out the road, would I give a geological discussion about the rocks over which you would have to pass? Would I detain you with a physiological discussion about the muscles of the body to be brought into play? No, I would say, "There is the road; there is the road." And I shall not detain you to-night by a discussion of whether the atonement was limited or unlimited; why God let sin come into the world or who was Melchizedek?

Let all these questions go. I tell you, There is the road, the highway, the clean road, the plain road, the straight road. Start on it now. The wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." "Except ye become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter the Kingdom of Heaven." In other words, if you get into Heaven it will not be by way of Athens, but by way of Bethlehem and Calvary.

When I was living in Philadelphia a man who had been a member of a former church wrote me "I have just become a Christian. You know the time I had with you talking and arguing with you about the things of eternity. But I found I could not be saved through my head; I must be saved through my heart." I had passed whole days in discussing the doctrines of religion with that man. He always met me with an acute argument. But he found out he must accept the Kingdom of God as a little child; and having found out that the next moment he was ushered into the Kingdom. It is a plain way; the child can find it, as well as the old man; the ignorant as well as the philosopher. It is not only a highway and a clean way, but a plain way.

IV. But I must go farther in carrying out the idea of my text, and tell you that it is

A SAFE WAY.

Sometimes along those ancient roads there were lions crouching in the grass; and the lion would wait until the traveller would come by, and then having secluded itself, its head down between its paws, as soon as the traveller came up the lion would crouch and leap upon him, and there was a mauled carcass by the roadside. But, says this text, in regard to this road to Heaven, "No lion shall be there." Oh, the complete safety of those who have got on this road! I really suppose that one minute after a man has entered the Kingdom of God he is as safe for Heaven as though he had been ten thousand years in Heaven.

He may fall, he may slip, but he is kept by the power of God unto salvation; and there is no need of fear about this matter if you are really the child of God. Though this be the first day of your adoption, I repeat it, you are as safe for a final heaven as though you had already entered upon it in glory. Oh, the safety of those who put their trust in God! What's the use of worrying? What's the use of fretting about anything? Safe for time, safe for eternity. What though your house be burnt? That is only a change of investment from earthly to heavenly securities. What though your reputation be assaulted? Your name will be a the better in Heaven; for when you give your heart to God, God not only takes care of your body and your soul, but of your reputation; and ten thousand persecutions can do you no harm permanently. Only be sure you are on the right road and all is well. Safe forever.

> "Firm and unmoved are they
> Who rest their souls on God."

You cannot be destroyed.

> "Though troubles assail,
> And dangers affright;
> Though friends should all fail,
> And foes all unite;
> Yet one thing secures us,
> Whatever betide,
> The scripture assures us,—
> The Lord will provide."

And I want you to remember that earthly subtraction is heavenly addition. And I want you to know that the tears of earth are the crystals of Heaven. And I want you to know that as they take the rags and tatters and put them in the paper-mill, and they go under the cylinders, and they come out pure white paper; so all the rags of earthly destitution and sorrow will go down unde he cylinders of death, and they will come out a white scroll, on which shall be written your eternal emancipation. Take courage, it is not only the royal road, and a clean road, and a plain road, but it is a safe road. Just starting a man on that road keeps him on it.

And oh, how glad the end of the journey! As with our venerable friend and brother Freeland, who this last week went into the Kingdom of God: living a life of usefulness, honored in our city by all who knew him, his life an adornment of the Christian religion, walking for many years this royal road, this clean road, this plain road, this safe road, and reaching Heaven.

V. But I go further in this discussion of my subject, and tell you that the road spoken of in my text is

A PLEASANT ROAD.

It is a pleasant road. God gives an indemnity from all harm to every Christian. All things work together for good to those that love God. They hold a bond signed, sealed, and delivered by the President of the universe. People don't seem to understand that passage, "All things work together for good to those that love God." They do not understand it at all, and I did not until I went into a factory one day. You go into a factory, and you see a great many wheels turning; and here is a wheel turning this way, and there is another wheel turning that way, and another wheel turning some other way, and you say to the manufacturer, Why don't you make all these wheels turn one way?

Why not turn this way toward me, or turn this way instead of that way, and that way, and the other way? Why, the man of the factory would say, all this variety of motion gives us the power to make these fabrics, these shawls, these carpets; if they all turned one way we could not do it. Then I think again. That is the way with the wheels of God's providence; they work together. Here is a wheel turning that way, and you say, That is right. Here is a wheel turning that way, and you say, That is wrong. And you say, O Lord, why not make the wheels all turn one way; not one turn this way, and another the other way?" "Ah!" says the Lord, "it is by all these providential wheels you get the blessing; and the beautiful robe of your Christian character is being woven; and all these wheels, whether they turn this way, or that way, work together, like the cogs of the wheels working into the opposite wheel. Working together, though seemingly against you, working together for good to those that love God."

Oh, glorious assurance! What's the use of your worrying about bread? Behold the fowls of the air, they gather not, yet your Heavenly Father feedeth them. If He takes care of the hawk, the osprey, and the swan, and the raven, and the albatross, and the eagle, won't he take care of you? What's the use of fretting about clothes? Consider the lilies of the field; they toil not, neither do they spin; yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

God clothed the daisy, the cowslip, the rose, the lily, the heliotrope. Won't He clothe you? What's the use of fretting about temptation? God will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will in every temptation bring a way of escape that ye may be able to bear it (1 Cor. 10: 13). Oh, what a way this is! What a royal road! What a clean road! What a plain road! What a safe road! What a pleasant road! The King's highway! The trees on either side reach over their branches until they interlock, dropping their shadow upon your pathway. Tables of entertainment spread for all poor pilgrims.

I start on this King's highway, and I go a little distance, and I find a harper, and I say, "Who art thou, O harper? Hast thou not a tune for the tired pilgrim?" He makes no answer. He turns his face toward Heaven, and his fingers tremble among the strings of the harp, and he begins the song: "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?"

I go a little further on this King's highway, and I accost a trumpeter, and I say, "Who art thou, O trumpeter? And hast thou not a song for the tired pilgrim?" He says nothing; but he wipes his lip, and puts the trumpet to his mouth, and he begins to discourse: "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

And I go a little further on this King's highway, and I meet a maiden of Israel. She has neither harp nor trumpet, but she has cymbals, and I say, "Who art thou, O maiden of Israel?" She makes no answer; but I notice that the cymbals are rusty with the rust of the sea-spray, and I find it is Miriam, as she claps the cymbals, discoursing: "Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and the rider hath He thrown into the sea." Then I go a little further on the King's highway, and I see a group, white-robed, approaching me; and they are so bright, so lustrous, so fair, I say, "Who are ye?" And there comes no response. And I say again, "Who are ye?" And a voice comes from Heaven, saying, "These are they who came out of great tribulation, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

Oh, come into the King's highway to-night.

VI. I want to tell you that

IT ENDS IN GLORY.

My text says the redeemed shall come to Zion. What does that mean? Zion was a mountain fastness; it was not only the King's fastness, but it was a mountain fastness, and it was impregnable. That is going to be the end of your journey, and once there you are safe forever. All the batteries of earth and hell may blaze away, but they cannot move it. Sebastopol was taken, Gibraltar was taken, Babylon was taken; Heaven is not taken by its enemies. Once there, there forever.

Dr. Dick said he thought in Heaven he would study chemistry and the higher branches of mathematics and conic sections. Southey said his chief enjoyment in Heaven would be in seeing Chaucer and Shakespeare. Dr. Dick may have his conic sections, and Southey may have Shakespeare; all the Heaven I want is Christ and my good friends that I knew and loved on earth. God grant that we may enter in through the gate into that city. Oh, start on the road to-night. When we have wept our last tear, and carried our last burden, and we come to Zion, all across Heaven may there be a chorus of the morning stars, a chorus of white-robe victors, a chorus of martyrs, from under the throne, a chorus of ages, a chorus of worlds; and there be only one name uttered, and only one song sung, and only one throne left—that of Jesus only.

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 230,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

NATIONAL ADVERSITY.

An Address by Mr. George Müller on the Condition of England.

"In the day of adversity consider."—Eccles. 7: 14.

Many Christian friends know better than I can tell them that it is scarcely possible to hear a paper read, or to look into a paper, without learning of great calamities that have happened in connection with railways or in connection with mines, or about fire, murder, and the like. At the close of my seventy-sixth year I have to state that I never in my whole life heard of such great numbers of calamities, and of such terrible days, as within the last two years. All who have taken notice of these things will speak the same language. We have further to remember the great depression in agriculture, and the exceedingly trying circumstances in connection with commercial affairs. In looking at the colonies it is very little better. But worst of all is the state of Ireland.

What have we to say in all these circumstances? Adversity has befallen this nation. There is still abundant reason to praise and bless and magnify God for what He has given, and for what He is yet doing. But it would be sinful in the extreme if we did not own the hand of God in regard to adversity. The Word which I have been reading brings before us the commandment of the living God through His servant Solomon—"In the day of adversity consider." We have, therefore, to consider what is the reason why all these things happen.

It is not by chance, not at a peradventure; the hand of God is in all these shipwrecks, these calamities in connection with railways and mines, and in other circumstances. The hand of God is in this, that two years ago there was such a trying harvest; the hand of God is to be owned in commercial difficulties.

But the point is, whether in our inmost soul we are ready to acknowledge this. Let us not sin by pretending to humble ourselves, while the heart is haughty and lifted up. We have abundant reason to humble ourselves; abundant reason to say with the prophet Jeremiah, "It is of the Lord's mercies we are not consumed." If we had what we deserve, we should be without any of the mercies we enjoy. Let us remember that he who spoke thus was a holy man, yet he says, "It is of the Lord's mercies"—not that these wicked Israelites are not consumed, but—"that we are not consumed." And so we must do. Though by the grace of God we are not drunkards, and are free from the sins brought before us by name, yet great and many and varied are our own shortcomings and sins; and therefore, like Jeremiah, we have to include ourselves. Or like Daniel—one of the holiest men living then, so holy that we do not read of a single fault, though, of course, he was not without sin—when making confession he includes himself, and says, "We have sinned." And thus we have to do.

Once more I refer to the catalogue of sins brought before us. "Covetousness." In connection with this covetousness let us remember one fearful sin of this nation—The opium trade with China. If there were nothing else but this one blot on us nationally, what reason have we to humble ourselves before God! And why have we done this? Because of our covetousness. If for every particle of opium we had to pay a large sum, and lost a large sum, it would not be thought of. But because it brings so much we care not what becomes of the bodies of these poor Chinese, and the minds and souls of these poor Chinese. Ah! the blood of this one single crime cries out before God against us as a nation; and therefore it becomes us nationally to humble ourselves on account of our sins before God.

What have we to do? There is yet the salt in the land; there are yet thousands and tens of thousands of God's children in the land; and we have to humble ourselves before God on account of the sins of the nation at large. We have to beseech God, if it might be, yet to lengthen out the days of tranquillity, to bring us into a different state nationally, and to bless us further spiritually as a nation.

Another point is, that we have to look out for answers to our prayers, and to seek individually to do what we can to bring about a different state of things. As to covetousness, let us, by our own life and deportment, show we esteem heavenly riches, and not the gold and silver of this world. As to pride, let us cry to God to clothe us with humility, that it may be seen that by the grace of God we aim at manifesting the mind of Christ. As to temperance, let us abstain altogether from those things which bring such misery on the nation. As to the observance of the Lord's day, let us, by our deportment and by meeting with the children of God, set a good example to our fellow-countrymen, and manifest the very opposite of the Spirit brought before us here.

What will be the result? As we are individually seeking to be like a city set on a hill, and as individually we aim at doing the will of God, so shall we, in our little measure, not only bring glory to God, but be a benefit to our fellow-countrymen.

SYLPH SOMERS.

A Story of the Last Century, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe," etc.

Chester a Century Ago—The World-famous "Rows"—Dr. Cecil Gilbart Introduced—Influence of Dr. Priestly and Dr. Price upon His Mind and Character—Matthew Henry's Saintly Life—Influence of the Evangelical Creed.

OUR narrative begins in the city of Chester, England—not, however, the Chester of to-day—the "Central Terminus"—so named—of great lines of railway, whose vast station, overhanging with its crystal firmament acres of ground, surprises the traveller, and whose interminable platforms and arched roofs daily echo the footsteps and voices of thousands of hurrying wayfarers, many of them from the ends of the earth, or reverberate with the thunder of escaping steam from giant locomotives, in ardent motion, or impatient rest. But we are to tell the story of a life in the Chester of a hundred years back, whose population was not as now, forty, but fifteen thousand, and whose modes of traffic, as compared with those of the present day, were but as the tedious and awkward gait of the sloth as compared with the speed of the mettled racer.

Yet, though the Chester of a century ago would be deemed of little account if placed side by side with the Chester of this hour, it was by no means an insignificant place, especially when viewed in relation to the England of that time. Perhaps, when thus considered it was reckoned a more important city than is the Chester of to-day by this generation; for at the period we speak of it was a sort of provincial metropolis, and therefore the residence during "the season," so called, of many of the gentry from the surrounding districts. Its streets, day after day, brilliant with fair ladies, dressed in the grotesque yet elegant costume of the time, their towering head dresses and hooped petticoats gay with ribbon flashing along the picturesque and antique thoroughfares. The tradesmen, likewise, of Chester, we are told, held up their heads in those days, and assumed that air of importance which is natural to their class in towns the resort of opulent families.

Chester, also, a century ago, had not comparatively near it as now the great cities of Liverpool and Manchester, to dwarf and eclipse it by their vast size, surpassing wealth, and architectural splendor. King Cotton had not begun to reign—was only in swaddling clothes, nursed, and rocked in his cradle—so that Chester was Queen, so to speak, of the Northwestern "Marshes," but now her crown is dimmed and shorn of its glory by reason of a glory "that excelleth."

The maritime traffic of Chester in the olden time consisted of the Irish and coasting trade, with the addition of a small portion of foreign imports and exports. The Irish trade was the most important carried on, hence the connection of Chester with our present history. We learn from a "Trade Return" of those days that about 1776, while only ninety-five foreign vessels entered its port, no less than two hundred and sixteen entered inwards from Ireland, conveying for the most part immense quantites of linen cloth. Indeed, so great was the intercourse a century ago, both commercial and otherwise, between Chester and the sister-land, that many Irish families of note made yearly visits to Chester, and sojourned there for weeks, as such families do now in London, the great metropolis of the British empire.

Geographical description is not the task which we set before us; yet a few words concerning the appearance and history of Chester we consider necessary to our narrative.

Even to the present hour, notwithstanding all the changes which of late it has undergone—Chester, with its oak-framed houses and pointed gables, is the most antique-looking city in England. Even to this day as the visitor passes through its narrow streets, he is dimly conscious of a link which binds him to the past, and however strong may be his predilections for the conveniences and improvements of modern life, he has no alternative but to yield to the influences which temporarily affect him, and hold communion with the days which are buried in the grave of time, together with those busy personages who, a century ago, played their part on the stage of activity but have left only a memory behind.

The town proper is inclosed by a wall of great height and thickness, and of nearly two miles circumference. The city gates are well preserved, and after their ancient pattern, so that the visitor's imagination, if informed and vivid, irresistibly calls up before him the Roman legionary sentinel of seventeen centuries back, keeping watch and ward, clad in bronze helmet, and bearing spear and buckler.

"The form of the city," says Pennant, the well known Welsh Archæologist, "plainly evinces its Roman orgin, being in the figure of their camps, having four gates, four principal streets, and a variety of lesser ones crossing the main thoroughfares at right angles."

The architecture of these four principal streets is without parallel in the kingdom. They are excavated and sunk several feet below the original surface of the ground; so that the carriage-road lies far beneath the kitchens of the adjacent dwellings. It is furnished on either hand, however, with a line of inferior shops, and right over these runs a rather wide and unique causeway, bordered on the outside with a balustrade, planted at intervals with pillars, which, strange to say, support the upper front story of the houses.

As a witty writer has put it, "The passengers' footway, covered overhead, runs right through the first floor fronts of the houses, whose back drawing-rooms are turned into shops, and consequently no longer places for the delectation of guests, but for tempting the purses of customers."

These curious galleries are the world-wide famous "Rows," and a tenement in the Rows was the abode of the individual whom we first introduce to our readers. He is a member of the medical profession, that calling so illustrious for honorable names and public utility, and, for his century, is a man of great professional skill and scientific attainment. He has, therefore, a great reputation in the city, and as a consequence is in very extensive practice.

His name is Cecil Gilbart, or, in full title, Doctor Cecil Gilbart, and that his mental and moral status may be clearly known we furnish a few particulars respecting those agencies and influences under which his mind and character were nurtured and developed. Dr. Priestly, whose fine statue now adorns one of the chief quarters of Birmingham, was, in the days we write of, the foremost man in the scientific world. His great discovery of nitrous and oxygen gases, called by him in outlandish phrase, "dephlogisticated air;" his history of discovery relating to vision, color, and light, and other similar philosophical works, had won him a European fame, while his book on "Matter and Spirit," in which it has been said, "he ingeniously labored to spiritualize matter and materialize spirit," was bringing him into hot and furious controversy with the champions of a more established and widely accepted theory, and one certainly more consonant with the revealed origin of man.

Dr. Gilbart, carried away by the brilliant discoveries of his friend in a region germane to his own profession, was an ardent disciple of Priestly, and, enamored of his genius, became very much entangled, we fear, in his materialistic conception of men's higher nature, a conception which, in after years, the great Baptist pulpit orator, Robert Hall, who, in his younger days, had been smitten with the same craze, declared, as he wept over the lowered coffin of his father, "he buried for ever in his grave," shrinking with horror from the thought that the spirit he had revered, so full of light and love, was gone out in unconsciousness, and like the body, festering in its shroud, was resolving into millions of unthinking atoms.

Another leading spirit of the time before us, whom we must mention, was Dr. Price, a prominent man in the political world, who, although only advocating measures which have since been far outstripped in the statutes of the land, was dubbed, in the doggerel of the times, by the adherents of old abuses and class legislation,

"That revolutionary sinner, Doctor Price."

Doctor Gilbart, of a wide and generous, though far from poetic nature, was an eager student of the so-called seditious speeches, sermons, and pamphlets of Dr. Price; they appealed to his sense of social justice and English right, and his spirit yearned and panted after days of greater national progress and constitutional freedom.

It was, in truth, a period of great social ferment the world over. All the kingdoms of Europe, and France especially, as having outgrown their former measure of civil development, were in the throes of the birth of a new order of things.

Tennyson says, in one of his minor poems, "The good old rule" and "simple plan," is,

> "That he should take who has the power,
> And they should keep who can."

And never had the two sides of the social world, sarcastically described in these words, presented such a rage of controversy, and such a life and death war-struggle, as in the closing decades of the last century.

Dr. Gilbart, as a Nonconformist, in the days of Conventicle, Test, and Corporation Acts, was a warm partisan of Dr. Price, and in the exercise of his profession was brought much into contact with those whom he considered unrighteously placed under social ban and political disability, and that, in his opinion, by men often in every way their inferiors, and so he declared himself "the friend of liberty," a phrase of sinister omen to those holding the reins of power in his day.

Most persons will know that for many years Chester was favored with the ministrations of the sainted Matthew Henry, the celebrated commentator of the Holy Scriptures.

In a sketch of his life in our possession we read, "His constant work on the Lord's Day while in Chester was to pray six times in public, to sing six times, to expound twice, and preach twice, and this he did for many years together." After a life of intense devotedness to the cause of Christ and true religion, he died in 1714, at Nantwich, but his body lies buried in one of the churches of Chester, while a statue in the city, not very long erected, commemorates his eminent learning, virtue, and piety.

Matthew Henry, as all are aware, was a firm believer in the Supreme Divinity of his Saviour and Lord. In his commentary on the first chapter of St. John's Gospel, he says, "The Evangelist lays down the great truth that Jesus Christ is God, one with the Father."

After his death, however, those who succeeded him in the pastorate, from various causes gradually drifted away from this cardinal doctrine of the Christian Church, and, at the period of our narrative, the congregation worshipping in Matthew Henry's meeting house had become Unitarian and Arian. It was with the congregation, under its cold eclipse from evangelical truth, that the Doctor Gilbart of our story was identified.

His father, who had originally come from Ireland, had been for years before him a member of the same worshipping assembly, and from boyhood Dr. Gilbart had attended with him; as a consequence, never brought under the power of a more Divine and living creed, the mind of young Gilbart accepted the shorn doctrine of his teachers as an adequate presentation of Christian truth.

It is our deep and solemn conviction that what is commonly spoken of as the orthodox creed is above all other beliefs best fitted to call forth in their highest meed a kind and loving heart, and a humane and self-denying character. God incarnate as our ideal must from the nature of the case be most powerfully adapted to evoke within us the most lofty and beautiful humanity. Yet it must be confessed that Unitarianism has numbered among its adherents many most philanthropic men; it may be from their viewing deeply, as without question they do, the moral aspect of the atonement. But however this may be, as "a good Samaritan" we must in justice describe Dr. Gilbart. The sick poor had the gratuitous exercise of his medical skill, the hungry he was wont to feed, and the naked to clothe. In times of sickness and pain, sorrow and want, the wretched ever found him ready to their call.

Job of old, we are told, could say, "I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him," and though he whose character we now portray never, of course, reached the lofty ideal which is set before us in the Oriental patriarch, yet if so disposed he could, in no mean measure, have applied to himself the words we have quoted, and might have added likewise, in phrase further descriptive of the great Arab Sheik, "The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy."

Dr. Gilbart's own heart, however, strange to say, was by no means one of the happiest. He had to a large extent what has been called, "the sorrow of knowledge." Beset by many philosophic doubts, in a world crowded with mystery, and holding to a cold and negative creed, he had not the confidence of a living faith to sustain him in his lonely hours, nor the sublime and glowing conception of the evangelical doctrine to give warmth and color to his spiritual emotions, and the joyous aspiration to his soul.

It may, however, be objected that such a course of benevolent service as that which Dr. Gilbart is stated to have pursued is totally and essentially inconsistent with the supposition of inward unhappiness and discontent; that of necessity acts of kindness must call forth in the doer of them the felicity of love.

It is certain that this is the case when our deeds spring from a moral nature which has been baptized with the Saviour's spirit, and by His grace has been quickened and renewed; but the great fact of experimental religion and the mysterious and sacred doctrine of the indwelling of God by faith in the human soul were things altogether untaught and all but ignored in Dr. Gilbart's day. The Gospel of Christ, in fact, was suppressed, and, as a rule, a sort of pagan morality was preached from the pulpits throughout England.

A PREVALENT DELUSION.

By Dr. Graham.

We are often assured from the pulpit and the press that by the preaching of the Gospel Christianity shall triumph over all its enemies, and fill the world with righteousness and peace as the waters fill the bosom of the deep. This, we are told, is the work of the Church, and especially the work of missions and till this is accomplished we need not look for the coming of the Lord. This, indeed, was my own hereditary faith, and it was with many struggles I gave it up. But it cannot stand the test either of Scripture, reason, or experience. I ask then, the question, "Is the ministry of the Gospel intended to produce

UNIVERSAL RIGHTEOUSNESS?"

And to answer the question, I submit the following facts for your consideration:

There is no such statement, either in the Old or the New Testament; for though many passages point us to the hopes of universal peace and prosperity upon the earth, yet they are all connected with the restoration of the Jews and the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ in His kingdom (Isaiah 9:9; Habakkuk 2:14; Isaiah 2:1–4; 6:3; 24:23). Read Isaiah 60 and 65, Daniel 7; 26–28, and many similar passages which promise universal righteousness; but they are all witnesses for the Advent of the Lord and the glory which it brings; nor can they be applied to the present widowed and suffering condition of the Church without the greatest violence and distortion.

The Lord's promise to the disciples (Mark 16:15; Matthew 2:19) goes not a hair's-breadth farther than saying, "The believer shall be saved, and the rejecter shall be condemned;" but it does not say that all the nations shall become disciples, nor that all the disciples shall be saved, much less that they are expected to fill the earth with righteousness as the waters cover the sea. Hence the beautiful saying of Chalmers that the Gospel is to be universally preached, but it is not to be universally planted, before the next coming of Christ.

History is against the belief. In no age or country has there been an example of Christianity becoming national. The flock has always been comparatively a little one; hitherto the gate has been strait and the way narrow; nor is there a hint of alteration while the dispensation lasts. On the contrary, it becomes worse toward the end (Luke 18:8; 1 Timothy 4:1-3; 2 Timothy 3:1–6). The solemn word is still the order of Divine providence, "Many are called, but few are chosen" (Matthew 20:16), and election, and not universality, is the law of the dispensation.

Apostacy began early in the Church, as we learn from the Epistles and from the threatenings of the Lord, and the stream of corruption, in spite of the checks that have been given it by the reformers and martyrs of the different ages, has become deeper and blacker until the present time.

THE THREE LEAVENS, of Herod, of the Pharisee and of the Sadducee, that is, tyranny, superstition, and infidelity, have from the beginning continued to leaven the churches and the nations, and they seem busier in the present day than ever. Infidelity especially seems to be gaining the mastery in the high places of the Church and of the rulers of the world.

Perhaps we may recognize a historical as well as a synchronical development of these three leavens, and say the leaven of Herod refers to the tyranny of the old pagan empire with its ten persecutions, and the leaven of the Pharisee to the Papal times of ignorance, superstition, and blood, while the leaven of the Sadducee may be fairly applied to the present generation of the Church, in which the denial of angels and spirits, and a paternal God, and the atonement of the Cross, and a resurrection of the dead, is quite as common and as open as it was among the Jews in the days of the Lord and His apostles. This does not savor of universal righteousness.

Look at the parables, and what do you find? Sheep and goats, wheat and tares, wise and foolish virgins mingling together till the time of the end. Is this like universal righteousness? No; it is mixture, and nothing but mixture, until the final separation when the Lord comes. The two kingdoms are in conflict; the Cains and Abels, the righteous and the wicked, continue in warfare during the whole dispensation. So that there is absolutely no place on earth for your universal righteousness till the dispensation is changed, and till the principle of election ceases to be its law.

Look at the promises which are given to a scattered, persecuted community travelling through the wilderness, surrounded with enemies, fed with manna, and seeking a city that hath foundations whose builder and maker is God. Is that like your universal righteousness? Look at the awful threatenings which, like a black cloud, are suspended over the heads of the persecutors till the very moment of the Lord's coming (2 Thessalonians 1:6–10). While these threatened foes of God and man prevail upon the earth there can be no universal righteousness.

And do you think Babylon is to fall by the preaching of the Gospel? Then all the frightful judgments to be poured out upon that great harlot, ending in her sudden and utter destruction, like a millstone cast into the sea, are to be interpreted of the operations of Divine grace, and not of consuming vengeance, at the coming of the Lord! Read Revelation 17 and 18, and say, with your hand on the Bible and your eye on God, "Is this possible?

Again, the Scripture mentions other forms of Antichristianism, such as the Man of Sin, and Son of Perdition, the Beast and the False Prophet of the Apocalypse, and the apostates and mockers of the Epistles; and I demand some evidence that the preaching of the Gospel will ever either convert or silence them. No; Babylon is doomed to destruction, and your duty is to come out of her (Revelation 18:4), and to join with the apostles and prophets, and even heaven itself, in rejoicing over her fall (Revelation 18:20). The beast and the false prophet continue their wickedness up to the very end, and they are not to be converted by the preaching of the Gospel, but to be cast alive into the lake of fire (Revelation 19:20).

Is not Satan still the serpent, the dragon, and the roaring lion seeking whom he may devour? And does he not continue till Christ comes in flaming fire to bind him and cast him into the bottomless pit? And how can there be peace and prosperity and the conversion of the world and universal righteousness in this world of ours while Satan, Antichrist, and the Beast of the Apocalypse are doing their deadly work among us? The thing is impossible; it has no foundation in the Word of God.

Cast your eye over the nations called Christian and tell me if their present condition gives any proof of the conversion of the world by the preaching of the Gospel? Survey the state of Europe from Russia to the isles of Greece, and from the isles of Greece to the rock of Lisbon, and what do you find? You find apostacy from the faith and holiness of the Gospel everywhere; abundance of superstition and infidelity; the large cities overflowing with masses of ignorant, turbulent, and licentious men, who have no regard either for God or man. After wars bloodier than either of Napoleon's, you find the nations armed to the teeth, jealous, suspicious, hateful, and hating one another, just waiting to see who will strike the first blow. This does not look like peace, or the reign of peace, which you expect by the preaching of the Gospel. Old Adam is stronger than young Melancthon still; and iron rams, and rifled cannon, and six-barreled revolvers, and armed nations are proof that if the reign of peace and righteousness is to come by the Gospel, we are far from it.

But, you will say, if the world is not to be converted by the ministry of the Gospel, what motive have I for preaching? This opinion, you say, strikes at the root of missions, and damps my ardor before I reach the heathen shore. It tells me at the outset that my efforts shall be in vain. Hear me, my brother, and take heed how you hear. If your ardor be a false fire and your expectations unscriptural, it is right and proper that they should be damped. You have the high commission of the Lord: "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." And that is though He does not say that all will believe your message. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life;" and that is another motive. "Labor, watch, preach to the heathen; pray over them night and day, with many tears" (Acts 20:19–21; 2 Corinthians 2:4). Magnify your office, provoke them to emulation, as St. Paul did; and if only some of them are saved, let that motive content you, and be thankful; but do not doubt your commission if many reject it. Yea, hold fast to the command of your Master, though, like St. Paul, you may be scourged and imprisoned, or buffeted and crucified, as your Master was. Your loyalty does not depend on the largeness or number of your victories, but on the commands of your King. Many of His most faithful ministers have had but little success; and His own mission seemed a failure, for one of His apostles betrayed Him, another denied Him, and all forsook Him in the hour of danger.

God does, indeed, in almost all cases, encourage the faithful minister or missionary with more or less success, as we see in the preaching of the Gospel both at home and in the heathen lands. In China, in India, in the South Seas, and in barbarous Africa, infant congregations are being born to the Lord by the Word of His testimony; and for this let us render Him our thanks.

These are some of my reasons for believing that the modern expectation of converting the world is a delusion. I may sum them up in a concluding sentence. I have shown that it is not stated in the Scripture; that it is not promised in the Lord's commission; that all past history is against it; that the apostacy of the churches is against it; that the parable prophecies and promises are against it; that the doom of Babylon, the Beast, and the False Prophet at the coming of the Lord is against it; that the presence of Satan, tempting and devouring, up to the end of the dispensation, is against it; and finally that the present condition of the Christian nations is utterly opposed to any prospect of universal righteousness and peace.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Week's History of Events in the Sick room at Washington is one of mingled hope and fear, the latter unhappily predominating. A very serious relapse in the condition of the President, the most serious that has occurred since the shooting, took place last week. Premonitions of a very severe attack of dyspepsia were observed on Sunday, August 14th, which on Monday developed rapidly, and on Tuesday caused the gravest apprehensions. Violent attacks of retching shook the enfeebled frame of the sufferer, and the pulse mounted to 130, while the temperature sank below the normal point. The stomach obstinately refused to retain food, and the strength of the patient was only kept up by nourishment injected by enema. The bulletins were again eagerly watched by anxious crowds in every city, as they were during the early days of July, and many prayers were offered to God for the patient sufferer.

As the dyspepsia was slowly overcome, and liquid nourishment was cautiously administered, supplemented by the enemata, a new complication showed itself. The right parotid gland became inflamed. This gland is situated below the ear, and is the part affected in the sickness known as "the mumps." The physicians were not alarmed by this fresh trouble. It was somewhat painful, and rendered the President uncomfortable, but was not considered dangerous. In the case of a healthy person it would be of trifling moment; in the state of prostration in which the President lies, it is idle to deny that it is not discouraging. At the latest accounts it is, however, reported as subsiding.

The condition of the wound has also given cause for disappointment. The public had inferred from the bulletins issued, that the progress of healing had been rapid, and the fact that the tube employed at the dressing penetrated only about three inches, led to the hope that the inner part had closed satisfactorily. Rumors were current on Friday that another operation had been performed to remove an obstruction. As nothing was said about the operation in the bulletin the rumors were discredited, but on Saturday persistent inquiry led to the admission by Dr. Bliss, that on the morning of Friday he removed with delicate instruments a piece of flesh which operated like a valve, opening outward to allow the pus to escape, but not opening inward to admit of the tube being inserted. When this valve of flesh was removed, Dr. Bliss said he was able to pass his catheter in to the depth of thirteen inches. At this point it did not touch the bullet, which still remains in the President's body.

All these new complications of course add to the gravity of the President's case. The physicians are still hopeful, but it is impossible to disguise the fact that his condition is extremely critical. The prayers of the whole nation are being offered that, if consistent with God's will, his life may be spared.

Expressions of Sympathy From all Quarters continue to pour in on the President and his family. The patriarch of the Armenian Church at Constantinople has sent a letter of condolence, in which, after expressing his thankfulness at the failure of the attempt to assassinate the President, he says: "As a representative of the Armenians of Turkey, I am happy to avail myself of this occasion, Mr. President, to be the channel of conveyance to you of the sentiments of high admiration which my nation feels for the Government and the people of the United States—a Government which realizes all the dreams of friends of liberty, and a people whose philanthropy obeys the highest precepts of religion and morality." The Queen of England has also telegraphed her sympathy, and desire for information as to the President's condition; to which Mrs. Garfield sent the following reply: "Your Majesty's kind inquiry finds the President's condition changed for the better. In the judgment of his medical advisers there is strong hope of his recovery. His mind is entirely clear, and your Majesty's kind expressions of sympathy are most grateful to him, as they are gratefully acknowledged by me."

The Assassin Guiteau Attacked One of his guards on Wednesday, August 17th, with a knife. The guard had reason to suspect that Guiteau was plotting suicide, and on entering his cell to investigate, observed that he was concealing a weapon. The guard ordered him to drop it, when Guiteau sprang upon him and tried to inflict a wound, but succeeded only in cutting his clothing. The guard drew his revolver, and Guiteau, dropping his knife, tried to gain possession of the pistol. The struggle lasted several minutes, when the pistol was accidentally discharged, and the report attracted the attention of other guards, who ran to the cell and secured the prisoner. Guiteau's motive in making the attack is matter for conjecture. He could not have hoped to escape, but may have wished to cause people to think him insane. The knife which he used was what is known as the "cheeser" at the jail. It is a shank used in the sole of shoes, and is sometimes removed by prisoners, who can sharpen it on the sandstone window-ledge to almost razor-like sharpness. It is used by them for shaving, and is of the best of steel. It is about five inches in length, and a quarter of an inch in width. About three inches of this weapon was sharpened, and the rest was wrapped in paper and tied by twine so as to form a substantial handle. It is altogether an ugly weapon in the hands of a desperate criminal.

A Vigorous Temperance Campaign will be commenced in Pennsylvania next month. A leading journal of that State says, "It is understood that this movement will extend to every portion of the State, cities and towns and rural districts will be worked up by able speakers—men and women employed for the purpose with a special view to their fitness and eloquence." The movement will not be political, but will be confined to an effort to win individuals from drunkenness to the cause of temperance, and to restore outcasts to society.

A Panic on the Excursion Steamer, Plymouth Rock, resulted from the breaking of a large steam pipe on Wednesday, August 17th, while the boat was on her way from New York to Long Branch. It appears that when off Sandy Hook a report was heard in the engine room, followed by what seemed to be an explosion. The escaping steam rose in volumes and filled the cabins, and a panic ensued among the passengers. Men, women, and children rushed to the forward part of the vessel, and screams and prayers filled the air. Women and children were trampled upon in the struggle for safety; their clothing was torn and their cries for help were disregarded. A rush was made for the life preservers. "The men," says one of those on board, "were absolutely wild, and some of them attacked their fellows with camp-stools in order to secure advantages; others smashed out cabin windows, and more than one tore life-preservers from others who were tying them upon their own persons. In this latter work there were numbers of the crew who participated." The life-preservers were stored in a part of the boat difficult of access, and women and weak persons could not obtain them, while some of the men were noticed wearing four, and one man had a life-preserver tied around his valise. The musicians on board who were playing when the accident occurred are said to have been overwhelmed with panic and to have cried like children.

The excitement was at its height and some of the passengers, fearing the worst, had unhesitatingly jumped into the sea, when the cloud of steam dissolved and there came a partial calm to the frenzied hundreds. A half mile distant was discovered the tug Germania, which came to the assistance of the disabled boat, and with the aid of the steamer City of Richmond she was towed in safely. No lives were lost, but many persons, chiefly women and children, were injured by being knocked down and trampled upon by the cowards who were eager to save themselves whoever else perished. An inquiry into the condition of the boat has been ordered by Mr. Windom.

The Arrest of Captain Howgate, Formerly connected with the Signal Service, on a charge of embezzlement, preferred by General Hazen, the chief of the Signal Service Bureau, has caused a shock of astonishment through the country. Captain Howgate is a man of considerable scientific attainments, and his reputation for proficiency in this branch of the service is very high both here and in Europe. His appointment to succeed General Myer, when that officer died, was strongly urged. The fall of so eminent an officer is deeply to be deplored, and a general feeling of satisfaction will be produced if he is able to fulfil his promise of completely exculpating himself. Several causes are assigned for the alleged embezzlement. Among others is one that affects the character of other distinguished officers. It is openly asserted that many appointments in the civil service are given to women of immoral character, who do not render to the government any return of service for the stipend they receive. The necessity for civil service reform thus appears additionally urgent.

The Progress Mormonism is Making in Georgia has stirred up public indignation against the men who are persuading uneducated men and girls by delusive accounts of the prospects of Utah to migrate thither. A bill has been introduced in the State Senate which makes the propagation of the doctrine of polygamy in Georgia a felony. The debate which immediately followed the proposal of this measure did not indicate that it is likely to pass in its present form, but showed that public opinion is not disposed to tolerate the insidious teachings of the missionaries. It appears that the Mormon agents in Georgia conceal the doctrine of polygamy from their dupes until they have them safe in Utah. The Georgia citizens, even the most uneducated, would recoil from the system if they understood its immorality.

Typhoid Fever Has Broken Out, is the melancholy intelligence that comes from the English colony at Rugby, Tenn. Of the four hundred residents, twenty are reported sick with this dangerous complaint. A consultation of the physicians at Rugby and those summoned from Cincinnati resulted in the observation that the symptoms were so uniform in all cases as to indicate a common cause. Suspicion at once fell upon the drinking water. An investigation showed that a small reservoir, which in the partial failure of the regular supply had been drawn on for drinking purposes, was poisoned by decaying animal and vegetable matter, and no doubt remains that the disease was engendered in this way. Thus far only two of the colony have died, Mr. Dayken and Mr. Chater. These were the first deaths at Rugby, and the funeral services on Sunday, August 14th, were touching and melancholy in the extreme.

The Return of Leo Hartmann, the Russian ihilist, to New York last week may possibly bring ıe question of the extradition of criminals to a ·st. Hartmann declares that he has returned for ıat purpose. The question is now being argued ith considerable energy in the press, but as yet, ıe Russian government having made no demand r the surrender of Hartmann, the question has ot come before the courts. There is no extradi- on treaty between this country and Russia, so ıat if the refugee were surrendered, the act would e of courtesy and not of right. Political agita- rs, conspirators for the overthrow of foreign overnments, would never be given up by the Wash- gton government, but how far the principle of otection of foreign refugees applies to such men Hartmann, has not been decided. It is certain, owever, that if Guiteau had made his escape to ussia we should apply for his extradition, and artmann is certainly in the same category as uiteau, although the President of the United ates bears no resemblance to the despotic ruler Russia. Hartmann has declared his intentions becoming a citizen of the United States and taken it his papers.

The Forthcoming Cotton Exposition at At- nta, Ga., is anticipated with considerable interest, ot in the South alone, but throughout the Union. me idea of the proportions of the exposition may e gained from the following figures showing the ze of the main building. It contains 1,200,000 et of lumber. In its sides are 296 large win- ws, and as many more in the monitor on its of. There are 1050 feet of the main shafting, ıe centre of which is sixteen feet above the floor. he prize list is now completed and shows that the sh prizes aggregate $20,000, and are offered to mpetitors in all departments; but the largest rtion are in those relating to cotton and cotton achinery. The grand prize of the exposition is 000, for the best bale of cotton other than long aple. In the Department of Cotton Machinery a and prize of $500, or a piece of plate of that val- , is offered for the most valuable new improve- ent for preparing or manufacturing cotton. An- her of $200 is offered for the best arrangement r receiving seed cotton, keeping it clean and sep- ate, carrying it through the process of cleaning, d for the separate delivery of the seed to the wner as he may desire it. Another of the same lue will be awarded for the best practical inven- n for preparing for ginning storm-beaten cotton which large fragments of boll and stalk have ad- red. It is expected that the exposition will give marked impetus to the progress of cotton manu- cture in the South.

A Singular Will was Left by Charles Elliott, wealthy farmer of Knox, Maine, who died there July 15th. Among the legatees are two grand- ns who share equally with the children, but who e required as a condition of receiving their lega- es to abstain from intoxicating liquors and bacco. Another clause in the will imposes the ndition that they shall not gamble or engage in tting. The farmer also gave minute instructions s to the penalties to be inflicted for any violation the conditions. He directed that if they use bacco in any form, either to smoke or chew, or rink any ardent spirits or alcoholic liquors in any ay unless prescribed by a physician under oath at it is necessary, they shall be cut off from wer for six months for the first offence, and one ar for each subsequent offence, their share so cut f to be disposed of and divided the same as pro- ded in case of their decease.

A Death from an Electric Light Apparatus curred at Buffalo, N. Y., on August 7th. The ght used in that city is that known as the Brush ght, and is produced by a generator at the com- any's station on Ganson Street. The generator surrounded by a railing to keep people from uching it. It is constructed of iron and copper ire, and weighs about 4800 pounds. The arma- re makes about 700 revolutions a minute, and enerates a current equal to 225,000 cells of a bat- ry. On the end of the machine is a brass and pper cylinder, termed a commutator, where all ıe current generated accumulates, and is gathered p by six copper strips called "brushes." These pass the current to the positive pole of the instru- ment. Three of these copper strips are on the side facing the entrance. A man who was exam- ining the brushes was warned that they were dan- gerous, but he appeared to disregard the warning, for he was observed to reach over the railing and seize two strips, one in each hand. Instantly a circuit was formed, and he dropped on to the rail- ing rigid. Only a gasp was heard as the man fell. His hands still grasped the strips, and the attend- ants who rushed to his assistance, found it impos- sible to loosen the clenched fists until the machine had been stopped and the current cut off. It was seen at once that the man was dead. He was a healthy and strong man, but succumbed to the powerful agency like an infant. The obstinate re- solve to test in his own person, in spite of warning, the effect of the dangerous element, is like that some young men show in their desire for the expe- rience known as "seeing life," which generally ends in eternal death (Prov. 7 : 22–27).

A Farmer's Desperate Fight with Seven wolves is reported in a Chicago journal as having occurred recently near Dayton, Wis. The farmer owns a large flock of sheep, and a few nights ago he went out to drive them home, when, as he passed a swamp, he heard snarling and barking. He had taken an old musket along, thinking per- haps he might shoot a partridge or some small game, and had loaded it with shot. But feeling unsafe, he advanced toward the sound, and there saw two old wolves and five large whelps wrang- ling and fighting over the dead body of a sheep. He got to within two rods of them before they heard him, when he fired into their midst. Immediately the whole seven came bounding toward him, and before he had time to climb a tree they were full upon him. He reversed the gun and used it for a club. The fight was long and desperate, and in the struggle the farmer had his clothing torn to pieces and was bitten in several places, but event- ually he succeeded in slaying the whole seven. It is impossible to read such a narrative without hor- ror at the thought of what would have been the fate of the man had he been less active and cour- ageous. The Christian in his spiritual life has to contend with enemies in the shape of evil passions and the temptations of Satan as fierce and relent- less as wolves, but victory is assured for him if he relies on the strength of his Saviour (Eph. 6 : 12).

One of San Francisco's Late Millionaires was locked up in a station house a few days ago, and had to remain all night because he had not five dollars to put up as bail. He was formerly the owner of a princely fortune. One block of stock he once held was worth ten million dollars. He was lavish in his expenditure; as an example of his reckless extravagance it is stated that he built a stable on California Street finished inside and out with costly woods, and which cost over forty thousand dollars. Numerous other instances are given of his wastefulness and of the silly ways in which he squandered his money. His substance and his friends alike are gone, and in his extremi- ty he has none to help him. Those who are mak- ing the acquisition of riches their aim in life could have no better commentary on the warnings of the Bible (Prov. 23 : 5).

The Discovery of the Body of a Beautiful young lady, until lately known as "the belle of New Haven," which was found floating in the river by a Savin Rock fisherman, has led to dis- closures of a most revolting nature. It is supposed that she committed suicide while suffering the pangs of remorse at having succumbed to tempta- tion. An attractive young woman of immoral character, residing in New York, visited New Haven, and formed the acquaintance of the girl, and is believed to have aided her seducer in his wicked scheme to work her ruin. The New York girl has been arrested on a charge of perjury, and is ex- pected to make a full confession. The event should be a lesson to both parents and their daughters, in- ducing greater care in making the acquaintance of strangers. Those men, too, who deliberately plot the ruin of innocent girls may be assured that even if they escape punishment in this world, God will one day take cognizance of their crime, which in some aspects is worse even than murder.

THE WORD OF THE CROSS.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"For the preaching of the cross is to them that per- ish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God."—1 Cor. 1 : 18.

The Wisdom of Words—The Evil it Works—I The Word of the Cross—The Cross has one Uniform Teaching—Contradistinct from Other Words—From the Word Ceremonialism—The Cries of the Cross—"God Must be Just"—"God Loves Men"—"The Atonement is Com- plete"—"Come and Welcome"—II. The Word of its Despisers—They Call it Foolishness—Because they Could not Originate it—Because It Convicts Them of Folly—A Bone for a Dog—Not Capable Witnesses—An Irishman's Nega- tive Evidence—What Perishing Means—III. The Word of Believers—They Call it Power—It has Delivered From Sin—From Satan—Per- sonal Experience—The Cross Omnipotent.

NOTE well that in the seventeenth verse Paul had renounced the "wisdom of words." He says that he was sent to preach the Gospel, "not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect." It is very clear, therefore, that there is an excellence, elegance, and eloquence of language which would deprive the Gospel of its due effect. I have never yet heard that the cross of Christ was made of none effect by great plain- ness of speech, nor even by ruggedness of lan- guage; but it is the wisdom of words which is said to have this destroying power. Oh, dreadful wis- dom of words! God grant that we may be de- livered from making attempts at it, for we ought earnestly to shun anything and everything which can be so mischievous in its influence as to make the cross of Christ of none effect.

The "wisdom of words" works evil at times by vailing the truth which ought to be set forth in the clearest possible manner. The doctrine of atone- ment by blood, which is the essence of the preach- ing of the cross, is objectionable to many minds, and hence certain preachers take care not to state it too plainly. Prudently, as they call it—craftily, as the apostle Paul would call it, they tone down the objectionable features of the great sacrifice, hoping by pretty phrases somewhat to remove the "offence of the cross."

Proud minds object to substitution, which is the very edge of the doctrine; hence theories are adopted which leave out the idea of laying sin upon the Saviour, and making Him to be a curse for us. Self-sacrifice is set forth as possessing a high, heroic influence by which we are stimulated to self- salvation, but the Lord's suffering as the just for the unjust is not mentioned. The cross in such a case is not at all the cross by which self-con- demned sinners can be comforted, and the hardened can be subdued, but quite another matter. Those who thus vail an unwelcome truth imagine that they make disciples, whereas they are only paying homage to unbelief, and comforting men in their rejection of the divine propitiation for sin. What- ever the preacher may mean in his heart, he will be guilty of the blood of souls if he does not clearly proclaim a real sacrifice for sin.

Too often the "wisdom of words" explains the Gospel away. It is possible to refine a doctrine till the very soul of it is gone; you may draw such nice distinctions that the true meaning is filtered away. Certain divines tell us that they must adapt truth to the advance of the age, which means that they must murder it and fling its dead body to the dogs. It is asserted that the advanced philosophy of the nineteenth century requires a progressive theology to keep abreast of it; which simply means that shall take the place of an offensive truth. Under pretence of winning the cultured intellects of the age "the wisdom of words" has gradually landed us in a denial of those first principles for which the martyrs died. Apologies for the Gospel, in which the essence of it is conceded to the unbeliever, are worse than infidelity. I hate that defence of the Gospel which razes it to the ground to preserve it from destruction.

The "wisdom of words," however, is more fre- quently used with the intent of adorning the Gos- pel, and making it to appear somewhat more beautiful than it would be in its natural form. They would paint the rose and enamel the lily, add whiteness to snow and brightness to the sun. With their wretched candles they would help us to see the stars. O superfluity of naughtiness! The cross of Christ is sublimely simple; to adorn it is to dishonor it.

Some seem to imagine that the Gospel does not contain within itself sufficient force for its own spreading, and therefore they dream that if it is to have power among men it must either be through the logical way in which it is put—in which case all glory be to logic, or through the handsome manner in which it is stated—in which case all glory be to rhetoric. The notion is current that we should seek the aid of prestige, or talent, or novelty, or excitement; for the Gospel itself, the doctrine of the cross, is in itself impotent in its hands and lame upon its feet, and must be sustained by outside power, and carried as by a nurse whithersoever it would go. Reason, elocution, art, music, or some other force must introduce and support it, or it will make no advance—so some injuriously dream. That is he speaks of it as being itself the power of God, and he says that it is to be preached "not with wisdom of words," lest the power should be attributed to the aforesaid wisdom of words, and the cross of Christ should be proven to have in itself no independent power.

Having cleared our way of the wisdom of words, we now come to the word of wisdom. Paul preached the cross, and our first head shall be the word of the cross. Many give the cross a bad word, and so our second head shall be the word of its despisers concerning it, they called it foolishness; and then, thirdly, we will think upon the word applied to the cross by those who believe it; it is to them "the power of God." O that the Holy Spirit may use it as the power of God to all of us this day.

I. First, then, we speak upon "the word of the cross." I borrow the term from the Revised Version, which runs thus: "The word of the cross is to them that are perishing foolishness, but unto us who are being saved it is the power of God." This is, to my mind, an accurate translation. The original is not "the preaching of the cross," but "the word of the cross." This rendering gives us a heading for our first division and at the same time brings before us exactly what the Gospel is, it is "the word of the cross."

From which I gather, first, that the cross has one uniform teaching, or word. We are always to preach the word of the cross, and the cross hath not many words, but one. There are not two Gospels any more than there are two Gods; there are not two atonements any more than there are two Saviours. There is one Gospel as there is one God, and there is one atonement as there is one Saviour. Other Gospels are not tolerated among earnest Christians. What said the apostle, "If we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be candidly heard and quietly fraternized with." Nothing of the sort. I will quote the Scripture. Paul saith, "Let him be accursed." He has no more tolerance than that for him, for Paul loved the souls of men, and for to tolerate spiritual poison is to aid and abet the murder of souls.

There is no Gospel under heaven, but the one Gospel of Jesus Christ. But what about other voices and other words? They are not voices from heaven, nor words from God, for He hath not in one place spoken one thing, and in another place another; neither is it according to the spirit of the Gospel that there should be one form of Gospel for the first six centuries, and then another mood of it for the nineteenth century. Is it not written, "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever?" If the atonement were in progress, if the great sacrifice were not complete, then I could understand that there should be progress in the preaching of it; but inasmuch as "It is finished" was pronounced by Christ upon the tree, and then He bowed His head and gave up the ghost, there can be no further development in the fact or in the doctrine.

From that word I gather, next, that the doctrine of the atonement is one word in contradistinction from many which are constantly being uttered. We preach Christ crucified, and His voice from the cross is, "Look unto Me and be ye saved;" but another voice cries aloud, "This do and thou shalt live." We know it, it is the voice of the old covenant which the Lord Jesus hath removed, taking away the first covenant that He may establish the second. The call to salvation by works is a strange voice within the fold of the church, and the sheep of Christ do not follow it, for they know not the voice of strangers. The word of the Gospel speaketh on this wise: "The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, the word of faith, which we preach; that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." "Believe and live" is the word of the cross.

Much less do we regard the word of ceremonialism and priestcraft which still lingers among us. We had thought it was a dull echo of the dead past, but, alas, it is a powerful voice, and is constantly lifting up itself. Priestcraft is crying, "Confess to me and thou shalt have forgiveness. Perform this ceremony, and undergo the other rite, and thou shalt receive a sacred benediction through men ordained of heaven." This voice we know not, for it is the voice of falsehood. He that believeth in Christ Jesus hath everlasting life; we are complete in Him, and we know nothing of any priest save that one High Priest, who, by His one sacrifice, hath perfected forever them that are set apart.

Brethren, let us hear this word of the cross, for in effect my text says, "Let the cross speak for itself." That is to be our preaching. We bid reasoning and speculation hold their tongues that the cross itself may speak. We let the cross speak its own word.

First, it cries aloud, God must be just! The dreadful voice of justice in its certainty and severity rings through the world in the sighs and cries and death-groans of the Son of the Highest. Jesus has taken man's sin upon Himself, and He must die for it, for be sin where it may, God must smite it. The Judge of all the earth must do right, and it is right that sin should involve suffering. God must make bare His arm, and bathe His sword in heaven to smite sin wherever it is found, for He smites it even when it is imputed to His only Son!

THE CROSS THUNDERS

more terribly than Sinai itself against human sin. How it breaks men's hearts to hear its voice! How it divides men from their sins, even as the voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon and rends the rock in pieces! If God smites the perfect One who bears our sin, how will He smite the guilty one who rejects His love?

Let the cross speak again, and what does it say with even louder voice? God loves men, and delights in mercy. Though He loveth righteousness and hateth wickedness, yet He loves the sons of men, so much so that He gives His only Begotten to die that sinners may live. What more could God have done to prove His love to mankind? "God commendeth His love to us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." The love within that glorious deed needs no telling, it tells itself. The word of the cross is "God is love;" He willeth not the death of the sinner, but that he turn unto Him and live.

What next does the cross say? Mark, we are not speaking of the crucifix. The crucifix represents Christ on the cross, but He is not on the cross any longer, He has finished His sacrificial work, and has ascended to His glory. If He were still on the cross He could not save us. We now preach the cross as that on which He died who now liveth and reigneth full of ability to save. Let the bare cross speak, and it declares that the one sacrifice is accepted and the atonement is complete. Sin is put away, the work of reconciliation is accomplished, and Jesus hath gone up on high unto His Father's throne to plead for the guilty. Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over Him; He is risen for our justification, and we are accepted in Him.

"No more the bloody spear,
The cross and nails no more,
For hell itself shakes at his name,
And all the heavens adore."

Let the cross speak, and it tells of ransom paid and atonement accepted. The law is magnified, justice is satisfied, mercy is no longer bound by the unsatisfied demands of judgment. "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them: and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation," which also is the word of the cross.

When we let the cross speak still further we hear it say—Come and welcome! Guilty sons of men come and welcome to the feast of mercy, for God hath both vindicated His law and displayed His love, and now for the chief of sinners there is free and full forgiveness to be had—to be had for nothing, for the cross gives priceless blessings without price: "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." This is the word of the cross; what more can we desire to hear? We may be forgiven in a way which shall not violate the claims of justice. God is just, and yet the justifier of him that believeth. He is merciful and just to forgive us our sins. Oh that I knew how to be quite still and to let the cross itself speak out with its matchless tones of mercy and majesty, love and blood, death and life, punishment and pardon, suffering and glory. It speaks in thunder and in tenderness! If we will but listen to what it hath to say it is the word by which the inmost heart of God is revealed.

II. We have the unpleasant task, in the second place, of listening to

THE WORD OF ITS DESPISERS.

They call the doctrine of the atonement "foolishness." Numbers of men call the doctrine of salvation by the blood of Christ "foolishness." It is most assuredly the wisdom of God, and the power of God, but they stick at the first assertion and will not acknowledge the wisdom of the wondrous plan, it is therefore no wonder that they never feel its power. No, it is foolishness to them; a thing beneath their contempt. And why foolishness? "Because," say they, "see how the common people take it up. Everybody can understand it. You believe that Jesus is a substitute for you, and you sing with the poorest of the poor,

"'I do believe, I will believe,
That Jesus died for me;
And on the cross He shed His blood
From sin to set me free.'"

"There," say they, "that's a pretty ditty for educated men. Why, the very children sing it and are able to believe it, and talk of it. Pshaw! it is sheer foolishness! We don't want anything so vulgar and commonplace. Don't you know that we take in a high-class review, and read the best thought of the times? You don't suppose we are going to believe just as common ploughboys and servant girls may do?"

Ah me! How mighty wise some people think themselves! Is every truth which can be understood by simple minds to be thrown aside as foolishness? Is nothing worth knowing except the fancy thinking of the select portion of humanity? Are the well-known facts of nature foolishness because they are open to all? Is it quite certain that all the wisdom in the world dwells with the superfine gentlemen who sneer at everything and take a review? These superficial readers of superficial literature, are they the umpires of truth? I wish that their culture had taught them modesty. Those who glorify themselves and sneer at others are usually not wise, but otherwise; and those who call other people fools may be looking in the mirror and not out of the window. He who is truly wise has some respect for others, and the profound has respect for the Word of God.

But why is it that you count the Gospel of the cross to be foolishness? It is this: because this religion of ours, this doctrine of the cross, is not the offspring of reason, but the gift of revelation.

the thinkers of the ages continued to think, but they never invented a plan of salvation in which divine justice and mercy should be equally conspicuous. The cross was not in all their thoughts. The plan which blends vengeance and love was never invented by human imagination. Since man has such an aversion to the great atonement, he could not have been the author of the idea, and he was not the author of it; God alone reveals it in language that babes may understand, and therefore carnal pride calls it "foolishness."

Besides, the carnal man thinks it foolishness because it makes him out to be a fool, and you may take my word for it that anything which proves either you or me to be a fool will at once strike us as being very foolish. Our conscience is dull, and therefore we retaliate upon those who tell us unpleasant truth. "Why,

AM I NOBODY AFTER ALL?

I, bound in the best black cloth, and wearing a white cravat? So religious and so respectable, so thoughtful, so studious, so profound, am I to be nobody? Do you dare to say to me, 'Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom!' My dear sir, you cannot know what you are talking about. Why, I am a professor, a philosopher, a doctor of divinity, and therefore you cannot really mean that I am to receive truth as a little child? Such talk is foolishness." Of course they say so.

I have rejoiced when I have read the sceptical papers, and have seen how they sneer at the old-fashioned Gospel. The Bible said that carnal men could not receive spiritual things; how truthful is its statement! It is written, "There shall come in the last days scoffers." Here they are, hastening to prove by their conduct the things which they deny. One is grieved that any should scoff, and yet in a measure we are rejoiced to find such confirmation of truth from the lips of her enemies. As long as the world lasts, ungodly men will despise a revelation which they are unable to understand; it is beyond their sphere, and therefore its preachers seem to be babblers and its doctrines to be foolishness.

But, in very deed, it may well seem foolishness to them, for it treats on subjects for which they have no care. If I were able to explain to a general audience how to make unlimited profit upon the Stock Exchange, or in some other market, all the world would listen with profound attention; and if I put my point clearly I should be pronounced a really clever preacher, a man well worth hearing; but when the sermon is only about the Word of God, and eternity, and the soul, and the blood of Jesus—most people turn on their heel; they are not sure that they have souls, and they refuse to argue upon the supposition of a future existence, which is an old wife's fable to them. As for eternity their philosophy has no room for it, and they do not concern themselves about it.

One said in argument the other day, "I believe I shall die like a dog." I could give him no better reply on the spur of the moment than to say, "If I had known that you were a dog I would have brought you a bone." As I had the notion that he would live forever I came to talk to him upon subjects suitable to an immortal being, but as I found out that he was going to die like a dog, what could I do for him but provide such cheer as the creature could enjoy? These men call the Gospel foolishness because they look after the main chance, and care more for the body than for the soul.

One of their wise men said, "Why do you preach so much about the world to come, why not preach about the world which now is? Teach these people how to ventilate their sewers, that is a much more needful matter than their believing on Jesus." Well, sanitary matters are important, and if any of you feel that you have nothing to live for but ventilating sewers I wish you would live at a great rate, and get it done as quickly as you can. Meanwhile, as we are convinced of the need of other things besides drainage, and as many of us expect soon to take our happy flight to a place where there are no sewers to ventilate, we shall look into those things which concern our future life, seeing they also fit us for the life which now is.

Now, brethren, I say of these gentlemen who pronounce the Gospel foolishness that you need not take muuh notice of them, because they are they are not qualified to form a judgment upon the subject. I do not depreciate their abilities in other respects, but it is certain that a blind man is no judge of colors, a deaf man is no judge of sound, and a man who has never been quickened into spiritual life can have no judgment as to spiritual things. How can he? I, for instance, have felt the power of the Gospel, and I assert that I have done so. Another man declares that I am not speaking the truth. Why not? Because he has not himself felt that power. Is that sound reasoning? Have you not heard of the Irishman who, when five men swore that they saw him commit a theft, made answer that he could produce fifty people who did not see him do it. Would there have been any force in that negative evidence?

The unspiritual are incapable witnesses; they put themselves out of court, for at the outset they assert that they are not cognizant of those things concerning which we bear testimony. Their assertion is that they never were the subjects of spiritual influences, and we quite believe what they say; but we do not believe them when they go further, and assert that therefore what we have seen, and tasted, and handled is all a delusion. Concerning that matter they are not capable witnesses.

And I beg you to notice that those who call the Gospel of the cross folly are themselves, if rightly looked at, proofs of their own folly and of the sad results of unbelief. The Christians in Paul's days felt that the Gospel had emancipated them from the bondage of idolatry and vice, and when they heard others that were captives under these delusions telling them that the emancipating force was foolishness, they looked at them, and smiled at the absurdity of the statement. They noticed that such men were themselves

PERISHING.

What a calamity it is for a man to be perishing! A house is unoccupied, its floor is untrodden, its hearth knows no genial glow. It suffers from neglect, it is perishing. Men who are not living to God are missing the end of their being, and like deserted houses are falling into ruin; they are perishing. While unoccupied by good, such minds are surrounded by powers of evil. Yonder is a tree, I have seen many such; around its trunk the ivy has twisted itself, grasping it like a huge python, and crushing it in its folds. The tree is perishing, its very life is being sucked out by the parasite that grasps it. Multitudes of men have about them lusts, and sins, and errors that are eating out their life—they are perishing. Their souls and characters are as timber devoured by dry rot, it remains in the fabric of the house, but it is perishing.

Unbelieving men are comparable to a ship that is drifting to destruction; it has snapped its cable, it is nearing the rocks, it will be broken to pieces, it is perishing! Those that believe not in Jesus are drifting toward a sure immortality of misery, they are daily perishing; and yet while they perish, they condemn the means of rescue. Fancy drowning mariners mocking at the life-boat! Imagine a diseased man ridiculing the only remedy. That which we have tried and proved they call "foolishness;" we have only to answer them, "Ye are yourselves, as ye remain captives to your sins, the victims of foolishness. Ye are yourselves, as ye waste your lives, as ye drift to destruction, proofs that the foolishness is not in the cross, but in you that reject it." The preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness, but to nobody else. O that their hearts were changed by the power of the word, then would they see all wisdom in the word of the cross.

III. We come, in the third place, to notice

THE WORD OF THOSE WHO BELIEVE.

What do they say of the cross? They call it power, the power of God. The more we study the Gospel the more we are surprised at the singular display of wisdom which it contains; but we will not say much upon that point, for we are not qualified to be judges of wisdom. But we do say this, the word of the cross is power; it has been the power of God to us, it has worked upon us as nothing else has ever done.

The phenomenon of conversion is a fact. Men and women are totally changed, and the whole manner of their life is altered. It is of no use to deny the fact, for instances of it come before us every day; unbelievers become devout, the immoral become pure, the dishonest become upright, the blasphemous become gracious, the unchaste become holy. Evil ways are on a sudden deserted, and penitents struggle toward virtue. We see persons in all ranks of society undergoing a radical transformation—self-satisfied people are humbled by the discovery of their unworthiness, and others who were steeped in immorality renounce their vicious pleasures and seek happiness in the service of God.

HOW DO YOU ACCOUNT FOR THIS?

We who are the subjects of such a change account for it in this way—it is wrought by the doctrine of the cross, and the power which accomplishes the change is the power of God.

We have been delivered, also, from the power of Satan. That evil prince has great power over men, and once we were led captive at his will. Even now he attacks us, but we overcome him through the blood of the Lamb. We are also daily delivered from self and from the world, and from all things that would enthral us. We are being saved; yea, we are saved. Every day a saving force is operating upon us to set us free from the thraldom of corruption. This we feel and know.

We could tell the histories of some here present, or, better still, they could tell them themselves, histories of changes sudden but complete, marvellous but enduring, changes from darkness to light, from death to life. How gladly could we detain you with details of our being upheld when our temptations have been almost overwhelming, and kept pressing forward in Christ's service when we have been altogether without strength had not the word of the cross poured new energy into us. We have been ready to die in despair until we have looked to the cross, and then the clouds have yielded to clear shining. A sight of the bleeding Saviour, and a touch of His hand have made us men again, and we have lifted up our heads as from among the dead. Under the power of the cross we still advance from strength to strength; there is power in the word of the cross to make a man grow into something nobler than he ever dreamed of. We shall not know what we shall be till we shall see our Lord and Saviour as He is.

I appeal to you who are truly converted, were you converted through the wisdom of man? I appeal to you that are kept from sinning, are you led toward holiness by the power of elocution, of rhetoric, or of logic? I appeal to you who are despairing, are you ever revived by musical words and rhythmical sentences? Or do you owe all to Jesus crucified? What is your life, my brethren, but the cross? Whence comes the bread of your soul but from the cross? What is your joy but the cross? What is your delight, what is your heaven, but the Blessed One, once crucified for you, who ever liveth to make intercession for you? Cling to the cross, then. Put both arms around it! Hold to the Crucified, and never let Him go. Come afresh to the cross at this moment, and rest there now and forever!

Brethren, believe in the power of the cross for the conversion of those around you. Do not say of any man that he cannot be saved. The blood of Jesus is omnipotent. Do not say of any district that it is too sunken, or of any class of men that they are too far gone; the word of the cross reclaims the lost. Believe it to be the power of God, and you shall find it so. Believe in Christ crucified, and preach boldly in His name, and you shall see great things and gladsome things. Let no man's heart fail him! Christ hath died! Atonement is complete! God is satisfied! Peace is proclaimed! Heaven glitters with proofs of mercy already bestowed upon ten thousand times ten thousand! Hell is trembling, heaven adoring, earth waiting. Advance, ye saints, to certain victory! You shall overcome through the blood of the Lamb.

The Schoolmaster's Prayer for Help.

A Medical Student's Confession.

THE HAPPY SCHOOLMASTER.

The Bad Temper Cured.

By the Rev. G. A. Rogers, M.A.

"I SHOULD like to tell you my case," said a tall, fine-looking, gentlemanly man, with a bright beaming countenance. I had been speaking at a meeting in a large provincial town, on the mighty power of Divine grace, as all-sufficient to save and deliver from the habit of besetting sins. At the close of the meeting this gentleman accosted me, as above, and added, "I keep a school, and for years my temper was sorely tried by my boys. Being, as I trust I am, a converted man, and a professing follower of the Lord Jesus Christ, I felt that by giving way to my temper I was dishonoring my Lord and Master. This was a sad grief to me. It was a bad example for my boys, and I knew it must mar my influence with them. I struggled against it. I made it a subject of earnest prayer. Night after night I confessed my sin and sought strength to overcome it, but all in vain.

"I then wrote down and kept on my desk a memorandum of my transgressions, hoping that the constant sight of the reminder of my sins might serve as a check and cure, but still in vain. The outbursts of temper broke over all such barriers. Again and again I confessed, and wept over my sad and sinful habit. It was injuring my own soul, and dishonoring my Lord in the presence of the whole school. This state of things went on for weeks and months. I knew not what to do. All my efforts were fruitless; all my good resolutions were broken. I was at length so driven to utter self-despair, as regarded this matter, that one night I fell upon my knees, and cried unto the Lord, and said, 'It is no use, Lord; I give it up, undertake for me.'

"It is now five years ago, sir, since this happened. The Lord did undertake for me; He did for me what I could not do for myself. Since that time I have never once been out of temper with my boys, nor have I once felt the inclination to be so. I thought you would like to have your words confirmed by this account of my experience." Such was in substance the language of the speaker.

I was glad to receive this living testimony to the all-sufficiency of Divine grace. It is just the happy experience which true faith in the present power of the Lord Jesus Christ ensures. It confirms the words of the Holy Spirit, uttered by the loving John: "This is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith" (1 John 5 : 4).

Present victory over a bad temper is one of the many triumphs of simple faith. Until this gentleman had utterly despaired of self, and had put the whole case into the hands of the Lord, and cried unto Him "undertake for me," he struggled against his sin in vain. The old Adam was too strong for him, until he was brought to despair of all his own efforts, and "gave it up." His extremity was God's opportunity. As soon as he gave up all self-trust, Christ was ready to undertake for him. If we would conquer temper, or any other sin, we must just make it right over to the Lord. We must give it up to be dealt with by Him. We must place it wholly into His hands, confess to Him that we have done with all attempts to overcome in our own strength, and trust Him to "undertake for us."

Simple trust in the power of the Lord Jesus Christ to overcome daily sins and sinful habits, is the one great secret of victory. Many a Christian man brings disgrace upon his profession by the outbursts of an unruly temper. It is often remarked, "He is a good man, but he has such a temper; it is the one great infirmity." And often the victim of this bad temper has brought himself to believe that it is only an infirmity. He looks upon his ungovernable temper as another man looks upon his deafness, or blindness, or his broken leg, as a sad misfortune, as one which must be endured, but which cannot be cured.

I remember a learned and eminent Doctor of Divinity, highly esteemed and beloved as a faithful minister of Christ, being greatly pitied on account of his affliction with a bad temper. It seemed never to have been suggested to his admirers, nor to have occurred to himself, that a bad temper is not a bad affliction, but a bad sin, which ought to be confessed as such, and overcome.

"I can cap that story with another, equally remarkable," said a brother clergyman to me, when I had related the above circumstance at a clerical meeting. "There is a gentleman in my parish—a man of decided piety—whose temper was the plague of his life. At times it completely overmastered him. Everybody knew it, and it made him very miserable. He carried his temper upon his face. He struggled and prayed against it, but without success. But a short time ago a remarkable change took place. He was in his chamber, upon his knees, wrestling with the Lord against this besetting sin, confessing it and weeping over it, when he seemed to hear a voice speaking to his conscience, 'Will you give up your temper to Me?' He was startled, but he accepted the voice as the voice which spake to Samuel of old, and at once said aloud, 'Yes, Lord, I will;' and then and there he made over himself afresh to the Lord to be delivered, and kept from this besetting sin. The victory was won. He came out of his chamber with a countenance beaming with happiness, and every one has noticed the happy change which then took place in him."

Many other instances might be named, and doubtless will occur to some of my readers. Let no Christian doubt the immediate and saving power of his Lord. He who saves from hell, can save, and save at once, from every sin. His keeping power is equal to His saving power. Place Jesus between you and temptation, and you will find that He is able to save to the uttermost. Let the same simple, confiding faith by which you first trusted Him for your salvation be now exercised in Him for deliverance from any sinful habits, and He will make you more than a conqueror.

THE MEDICAL STUDENT.

By the Rev. G. A. Rogers, M.A.

"YOU know how greatly I value your ministry, but, forgive me for saying, I did not at all like your sermon last Sunday morning." This was addressed to me by a very dear and valued member of my congregation, one of the most efficient of my forty District Visitors, and a hearty and enlightened laborer in my large London parish of some ten thousand souls.

I gave respectful attention to her remonstrance as she went on to address me to the following effect: "The sermon was so unlike the usual style of your preaching. It might have done very well for a tract, or a meeting, but surely such a subject was not fit for the pulpit. You have accustomed us to the full Gospel, which has gathered around you such a crowded church [the church contained nearly two thousand sittings]. I was so unhappy at hearing such a sermon, with so little of the Gospel in it, that I felt I must come and tell you how disappointed I was. Pardon my boldness, but surely that kind of sermon will never save souls."

This was an alarming exordium from such a quarter. All I could do in reply was to assure my kind monitor that I had not preached the sermon without first having sought my Master's guidance and blessing; and having acted under a deep sense of personal responsibility, I still hoped, that notwithstading her disapproval, God would own my feeble effort to promote His glory. This was scene number one. Now let us pass on to scene number two.

While quietly sitting in my study one evening, several months after the above interview, a knock was heard at my door, and a gentleman introduced himself as a medical student. He told me that he had been walking the hospitals in London, and was just completing his course of study. He had during the whole of his term in London attended my ministry at Regent Square Church, but had never made himself known to me. But as he was now on the point of leaving London, he felt he could not depart without calling to thank me for having been the instrument in God's hands of leading him to seek and find the Saviour. This was indeed joyful news, and led to some delightful and profitable conversation. I examined the grounds of his hope and new-born happiness and was thankful to find that the evidences of his conversion of heart appeared to be clear, decided, and Scriptural.

Before parting, I inquired whether he could recall any sermon in particular which God the Holy Spirit had so blessed to his saving change. "Oh yes!" he replied, "I shall never forget that sermon!" "Which was it?" "You remember, sir, preaching on Palmer the poisoner?" "Perfectly." "Well, as a medical student, I was deeply interested in the case." And then he went on to state how, from being interested in the career and awful end of that poor wretched man, the Lord opened his eyes to see himself as a lost sinner, and his need of a present Saviour. He saw a picture of his own depraved heart in that of the poisoner, and he saw his own deserts in the doom of that detected and condemned transgressor. He went home to his chambers from that church a changed man, and he gave himself no rest until, by the grace of God, he found both pardon and peace at the foot of the cross.

Years after this event I was paying a visit to a near relative in Devonshire. "There is a gentleman residing in this parish who will be very delighted to see you," said my host. "He heard you were coming, and he said how pleased he would be to you." "And who may he be?" I inquired. "Oh! he knows you very well. He is our parish doctor, an excellent man. And I believe he is a truly godly man. You will be sure to meet him at church on Sunday."

And I did meet him. I scarcely recognized him. But he soon recalled to my mind the Medical Student of old who paid me that evening visit which I have just recorded. After a cordial greeting, when we separated, almost his parting words were,

"I SHALL NEVER FORGET THAT SERMON."

I am not certain that my lady monitor has ever become acquainted with the result of the disapproved sermon. When she reads this short narrative I have no doubt she will be one of the first to recognize the leadings of the Holy Spirit, and to praise God for having led His unworthy servant to preach it.

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT IN RELATION TO PROPHECY.

By Rev. William Maude.

In Revelation 5, verses 9, 10, we find a new reading of such exegetical importance that, for the purpose of comparison by the reader, we shall place it side by side with that of the Authorized Version.

Authorized.	Revised.
"And they (the four living creatures and the four-and-twenty elders) sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof; for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth."	"And they (the four living creatures and the four-and-twenty elders) sing a new song, saying, Worthy art thou to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation, and madest them to be unto our God a kingdom and priests; and they reign upon the earth."

Here, it will be observed, the ground of the opinion very widely entertained, that the living creatures, or cherubim, as well as the elders, must represent the redeemed in general, or certain classes of the redeemed, inasmuch as they speak of themselves "as redeemed by Christ's blood, made kings and priests and destined to reign over the earth" is wholly removed. The redeemed of God elect out of every tribe, and tongue, are spoken of throughout in the third person: "Thou didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe," etc., and "madest them," and "they reign upon the earth."

In the sixth chapter the omission of the words "and see" in the summons of the four living creatures to the horses and their riders which go forth on the opening of the first four seals, has sufficient MS. authority, besides being strongly supported by the internal evidence. The imperative "Come!" is addressed, not to the seer to come and behold the vision more closely, but to the symbolic riders sent forth as the heralds of God's four great providential agencies to prepare the way for Him whose coming is at once the keynote of the book and the sole remaining hope of humanity.

This is the view taken by Alford. "In interpreting so unusual a term of address," he observes, "surely we should begin by inquiring whether we have not the key to it in the book itself. And in this inquiry are we justified in leaving out of consideration such a verse as chapter 22: 17, 'The Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come;' and the following, 'Amen. Even so come, Lord Jesus?' This seems to show, in my mind beyond a doubt, what, in the mind of the seer, the remarkable and insulated exclamation 'Come' imported. It was a cry addressed, not to himself, but to the Lord Jesus: and as each of these four seals is accompanied by a similar cry from one of the four living beings, I see represented in the groaning and travailing together of creation for the manifestation of the sons of God, expressed in each case in a prayer for Christ's coming; and in the things revealed when the seals are opened, His fourfold preparation for His coming on earth."

In the vision of the great multitude, recorded in the seventh chapter, verses 9–17, several important variations from the reading of the Authorized Version will be found. Thus the question of the elder, in the 13th verse, instead of "What are these which arrayed in white robes? and whence came they?" is, in the Revised Version, given in the following terms: "These which are arrayed in the white robes, who are they, and whence came they?"

But the emendation in this passage to which we would more especially call attention is the insertion of the definite article in the 14th verse, "the great tribulation." Indeed the original is still more emphatic, the article being twice repeated, "the tribulation, the great one." And thus the unquestionable reference to "the great predicted tribulation of the coming apostacy and Antichrist"—"the hour of trial" from which the overcomers in Philadelphia are to be "kept"—and not merely to any general tribulation extending over the whole interval between the first and second Advents, is sharply indicated.

Another noteworthy reading has been adopted by the revisers in chapter 15: 6, where, instead of the seven angels who bear the seven last plagues being said, as in the Authorized Version, to be clothed in pure and white linen," we now read, "arrayed with precious stone, pure and bright." The significance of this reading will appear when we contrast this passage with chapter 19: 7, 8, "The marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath made herself ready. And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white; for the fine linen is the righteousness"—or, as the Revised Version more correctly reads, "the righteous acts"—"of the saints." Hence, being thus specially appropriated, the emblem of "fine linen"—washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb—would hardly be suitable if used emblematically to represent the unfallen righteousness of angelic beings.

There are various other points in the Revised Version to which we intended to call attention, such as the reading "an eagle" for "an angel," in chapter 8: 13; "the key of the pit of the abyss" for "the key of the bottomless pit," in chapter 9: 1; "sign" for "wonder," in chapter 12: 1; and "bowls" for "vials," passim: but the limits of this article will only allow us to refer to one other improved reading of special importance, and based on a correction of the original text, which is found at chapter 17: 8. This very remarkable verse reads, in the Authorized and Revised Versions respectively thus:

Authorized.	Revised.
"The beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is."	"The beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and is about to come up out of the abyss, and to go into perdition. And they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, they whose name hath not been written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast, how that he was, and is not, and shall come" (marg. "shall be present").

The last clause of this verse, as it stands in the Authorized Version, is indeed, as Dr. Roberts has remarked "truly an enigmatical declaration."

What meaning can be attached to the statement that "the beast"—whatever we understand by it—"is not, and yet is?" But by the substitution of the adopted reading—which has overwhelming MS. authority—an intelligible statement is attained. "I have no hesitation," observes Mr. W. Kelly, "in saying that so runs the last clause of the verse. This would not be questioned by those who are sufficiently acquainted with the subject to form an opinion. Persons may differ in the explanation of the verse; but there can be no doubt that such is the true reading. The common text is almost contradictory of itself, and affords no just sense."

Thus far our object in the present paper has been to point out some of the passages in which English readers may derive help in their study of the Book of Revelation from the labors of our present learned revisers. And this help is, as we have sufficiently indicated, neither scanty nor unimportant. But before concluding these remarks a less grateful task remains for us; namely, to specify a few cases in which, either by the adoption of an unsatisfactory rendering, or by having introduced a passage calling for correction, they have, as it seems to us, failed to afford the aid we might reasonably have expected.

As an example of the former class we may point to chapter 1: 19—

A VERY IMPORTANT PASSAGE,

inasmuch as it gives us, as we conceive, the correct threefold division of the whole book. In the Authorized Version it reads thus: "Write the things which thou hast seen, and the things which are, and the things which shall be hereafter." The rendering of the Revised Version is very similar: "Write therefore the things which thou sawest, and the things which are, and the things which shall come to pass hereafter."

There is some improvement here, no doubt; nevertheless, we are strongly of opinion that the correct rendering of the last clause is, "the things which are about to come to pass after these things;" which rendering is that adopted, with very slight variation, by Tregelles, Davidson, W. Kelly, Seiss, and Rotherham. The point of importance is, that the immediate sequence of "the things about to come to pass" to "the things which are"—without the recognition of which the Book as a whole cannot be correctly interpreted—is missed alike in the Authorized and Revised Versions. The word "hereafter" is vague, whereas the sense of the original is precise, and indicates that the series of events included in the prophetic portion of the Apocalypse follows immediately upon the termination of the Church's earthly history, the latter constituting "the things which are," as outlined in the Epistles to the Seven Churches contained in chapters 2 and 3. Hence the fourth chapter commences, "After these things" (Revised Version).

Of another kind is the mistake committed by the revisers, as we venture to think, by the retention of the word "book," as the translation of the Greek biblion in chapter 5, instead of "roll," the roll or scroll of parchment being, as all know, the ancient form of book. Indeed, to say that a "book," in the modern acceptance of the word, was "written within and on the outside, and sealed with seven seals," is a statement which is hardly intelligible, while a scroll rolled up and sealed upon the edge presents a clear and graphic image.

The one other instance of failure on the part of the revisers to convey the true meaning of the original, to which we shall refer, is found in the sixth verse of the tenth chapter, where, in the revised text as in the Authorized Version, the mighty angel who stands upon the sea and upon the land, lifts up his hand to heaven and swears by Him that liveth for ever and ever "that there shall be

TIME NO LONGER."

The right rendering, however, undoubtedly is "that there shall be no more delay." That this rendering, adopted by Tregelles, Alford, Davidson, etc., is the correct one, is confirmed by the statement which immediately follows in the sacred text, "but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he is about to sound, then is finished the mystery of God." This rendering, it will thus be seen, is of great exegetical importance; and, indeed, apart from this, the statement that "time shall be no longer" is one to which no definite meaning can be attached. As long as man exists time must continue, for time is simply the creature's relation to eternity.

But we have done. We are not careful to find fault where we feel we owe so large a debt of gratitude, and this feeling grows upon us the more familiar we become with the Revised Version. The revisers have done their work and done it well. To say that it is not perfect is to say what must be said of every work to which man puts his hand. To say that it does not admit of improvement is certainly a statement to which we are not prepared to commit ourselves; but still the fact remains, and a grand fact it is, that a purer and more strictly faithful version has been placed in the hands, or within the easy reach, of the hundred millions of people who speak the English tongue.

"NO PLACE LIKE HOME."

BY HESBA STRETTON.

Saturday and Sunday.

RUTH had been hard at work all day hoeing thistles. Many a time she lifted up her eyes to the green woods where Ishmael and Elsie were at play, and recalled the rare days of holiday like it which she had had when she was young. The thought of the children's pleasure made her own work lighter; and though she was tired enough when she heard the church clock strike the hour for leaving the field, she walked along briskly under the hedge, to be home the sooner.

Elsie and Ishmael would be fine and hungry before she could get tea ready; and Mrs. Chipchase had promised her some buttermilk, to make them some buttermilk pikelets for a treat. There was a pleasant stir and agitation in Ruth's mind, yet there was a vague disquiet mingled with the pleasure. Ishmael was about to cease to be a child, and was stepping into the perils and duties of boyhood, that dangerous crisis in which she had seemed to lose all her other children. He was about to escape from under her wing and flutter away; like these little half-fledged hedge-sparrows, which were twittering and hovering all along the thornbushes.

Her other boys and girls seemed to care no more for their poor home than the nestlings of this year will care for the old nest next spring. But Ishmael was not like the others, who had all taken after their father, and only thought of their mother as a drudge to slave for them. She had not been as good a mother to them, she said to herself; but then she had not believed in God as she did now. How marvellously good He had been to her to give her such a son as Ishmael, when she was a weary, worn-down, gray-haired woman!

Mrs. Chipchase nearly filled Ruth's large brown pitcher with buttermilk, and gave her two or three spoonfuls of tea in a screw of paper. Ruth was a favorite with her, as being a quiet, harmless old woman, and she lingered a moment at the door to speak a word or two to her.

"Mind Ishmael's here in time of a morning," she said, "for the master's very particular."

"I'm sure," answered Ruth falteringly, "as I don't know how to thank you and the master for taking him. It 'll be the makin' of him, I know; and he's a good lad, ma'am, God bless him!"

It was seldom Ruth uttered so many words together, except to Ishmael; but her heart was full. The farmhouse was a homely place, but there was a rude abundance about it, which she seemed to feel for the first time, as if she also had a share in it. She stood at the kitchen door, and could see the big table at which Ishmael would eat, where a plough-boy was now sitting, deeply absorbed in the contents of a huge basin, which had been filled up from a big iron pot hanging a little way above the fire. The smell of the good broth reached her, and seemed to promise that Ishmael would grow a strong, hale man, when he could always satisfy his hunger. "He hath satisfied the hungry with good things," she murmured to herself, as she took up her brown pitcher, and with a curtsey to the mistress turned to go away.

"Ruth Medway!" shouted a loud, rough voice from the far end of the farmyard, "Nutkin the keeper's been and hauled Ishmael to jail for stealing pheasants' eggs in the wood!"

"There's the master come home!" cried Mrs. Chipchase. "Whatever is he shouting, Ruth?"

Ruth was still standing with a smile on her wrinkled face; but it died away as the meaning of the words reached her brain. The sky grew black, and the sunshine fled away; a dizziness seized her, which made the solid ground she stood on reel beneath her. The loud crashing of her brown pitcher, as it slipped from her hand, and broke into a hundred fragments on the stone causeway, brought her back to her senses.

"What's the matter?" asked Mrs. Chipchase, running to the door, which her husband had now reached.

"Matter enough!" he answered. "Here's our new waggoner's lad, that was to come on Monday morning, taken off to jail for poaching. Nutkin caught Ishmael and Elsie roasting eggs in the wood; pheasants' eggs, stolen from the nest! There's no chance of him getting off; for the squire's mad after game; and Nutkin swears he'll lock him up out of harm's way. I'm sorry for you, Ruth, to have such a husband and family. I did think Ishmael was going to be a comfort to you in your old age. But the lad knew better; and he's no excuse."

"It was naught but a lad's trick," said Mrs. Chipchase, "such as any one 'ud do. Ishmael never stole an egg of mine, when I set him to gather them. Our own boys never brought in more than he did. He's as honest as the day, I'm sure."

"Thank you kindly, ma'am," murmured Ruth, turning away and walking slowly down the causeway toward home, with a bowed head and feeble feet. How heavily her sixty years seemed to weigh upon her all at once! How rough the road was, which she had trodden so many hundreds of times in all kinds of weather, to earn her own bread and Ishmael's! Was she half blind, that everything looked so dim? And where had all the merry sounds of the summer evening gone to? There was a sort of numbness and stupor over her mind, until she found herself trying to fit the old key into the lock of her poor hut, the home Ishmael had never yet left for a single night. He was not coming home to-night!

She sank down on the door-sill, and swayed herself to and fro in mute despair. No tears came to her eyes; for she was old and her tears were exhausted; but she sobbed heavily again and again, and yet again. There was no hope in her heart. She thought of Nutkin's enmity, and her husband's bad character. The rector's family had gone away to foreign parts for six months, and a stranger, who knew nothing of Ishmael, was taking the duty of the parish. The squire could not be reached, for Nutkin's influence was all-powerful with him. No, there was no chance for Ishmael.

To be in prison! Home was poor enough; she felt all at once what a dark, miserable, empty hovel it was. But if Ishmael could only be within, it would be a true home to both of them. She sat down on the desolate hearth, and tried to think of God; but she could think of no one but Ishmael yet. Her soul was in the deepest depths. All night long she lay awake. The little bed on the floor beside her was empty for the first time; and her ear listened in vain for Ishmael's quiet breathing. Her husband had come home so drunk that she had not dared to get him up the ladder, and he was lying in a dead sleep on the floor below.

Over and over again she counted her nine children on her fingers, some dead and some living, and a heavy sob broke from her lips as she whispered "Ishmael." She had mourned over her dead, and grieved over her living children who had forsaken her; but no sorrow had been like this sorrow. None of them had ever been in prison, and now it was her youngest and dearest, yes, and her best, who was fallen into deep disgrace. When the morning came her heart turned sick at the thought of going to church, and Humphrey with an oath forbade her to go to Uptown after Ishmael. Ishmael would not be in the singing gallery; and how could she sing "Glory be to the Father" while he was in prison?

All the morning Humphrey, sitting by the wood fire, to make sure that Ruth obeyed him, was cursing Ishmael as a disgrace; but she did not answer a word. She had kept silence so long that she hardly knew how to talk, except to Ishmael. It was a relief to her when her husband took himself off in the afternoon, and left her in solitude as well as silence. She was sitting alone, with her wrinkled face hidden in her hands, deaf, blind, and mute to everything but her trouble, when she felt a warm pressure of loving arms round her neck.

For a moment she thought it was Ishmael, but looking up she saw the face of Elsie. Her mother was standing near, and when Ruth rose to drop a curtsey to the schoolmistress, she took her hard cramped hand between both of her own, and bending forward, kissed the old woman's brown cheek. Ruth's face flushed a little, and a strange feeling of surprise and pleasure flashed across the darkness of her grief.

"I want you to get a cup of tea for me," said Mrs. Clift.

It was something for Ruth to do; and, as she busied herself in kindling her swift-burning fire, and filling her small tin kettle from the well, for a few fleet moments she forgot Ishmael. But she could eat nothing when the tea was ready, though Elsie had brought some dainty tea-cakes in order to tempt her appetite.

"I have been up to the Hall, and seen Mr. Lansdowne," said Mrs. Clift, as they sat together at the rough little table. "Elsie has to go before the magistrates to-morrow at Uptown; and I went to speak for poor Ishmael. But there's not much hope, Ruth. Mr. Lansdowne tells me Nutkin says Ishmael has infested the woods since his very babyhood, and all the village thinks him to be in league with poachers. That's not the truth, I know."

Ruth shook her head in sorrowful denial.

"I told the squire so," said the schoolmistress, softly; "and he answered women never could be made to believe that poaching was a crime. I did say I couldn't call taking a few eggs from a wild bird's nest any great sin—not bad enough for a young lad to be sent to jail for. He said it was not only that, but all the Medways were a plague and a pest in the parish; and it would be a kindness to check Ishmael at the outset. Ruth, I'm more grieved than I can tell you."

Again Ruth shook her gray head in silence.

"I've been thinking how lonely you are, and how you have to bear the sins of your husband and sons," said Mrs. Clift; "and it seems to me that to think of our Lord's life here is the only thing to comfort you. Do you remember the words, 'He is despised and rejected of men; a Man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from Him; He was despised, and we esteemed Him not?'"

The quiet voice speaking so gently to her ceased for a few minutes; and Ruth covered her troubled face again with her hands. It was the Lord Jesus who had been despised and rejected of men, as she was by her neighbors. He had been "a Man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," more deeply than she was. Did her old companions in the village hide as it were their faces from her? Nay, all the world had hid their faces from Him who died to save them. Even on the cross those that passed by reviled Him, wagging their heads; and the chief priests and elders, and the thieves crucified with Him, had mocked and jeered at Him.

"'Surely He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows,'" resumed the quiet, gentle voice. "'He was wounded for our transgressions: the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and with His stripes we are healed.'"

She was not bearing her griefs alone, then, as she had fancied during the long dark night. The Lord Himself had carried her sorrows. He had been wounded for her transgressions, and for Ishmael's. A healing sense of His love and compassion and fellow-feeling was stealing over her aching heart.

"'All we like sheep have gone astray,'" went on the soothing voice; "'we have turned every-one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all. He was oppressed, and He was afflicted, yet He opened not His mouth: He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He openeth not His mouth.'"

Dumb, and opening not His mouth! Was not that again like herself? She could not cry aloud, and speak many words, and make her grief known to every ear. It was true. Jesus Christ had lived her life of sorrows, and grief and scorn, and silence. Her head was bowed down still, but her heart was lifted up. The suffering Son of God made it easier for her to bear her own suffering.

It was growing dusk now, and the schoolmistress bade her good night; but Ruth would go a little way on the road with her. When she returned to her lonely home, she lingered for a minute, trembling and reluctant to re-enter its dark solitude. It had always been her custom, since mael was a baby in her arms, to sing, "Glory Thee, my God, this night," as the last thing be- he went to bed, except when Humphrey hap- ed to be at home, which was very seldom. She l not thought of it last night, the first time t Ishmael had been away from her. But the ught crossed her mind, and could not be driven ay from it, that, may be, this Sunday evening was singing it alone in his cell at Uptown. e tears, which had not come last night, stood in dim eyes, as, sitting down in her old chair by dark hearth, she sang the hymn right through, low and faltering voice, which could hardly e been heard beyond the threshold.

THE COMMANDMENTS.

5. Lesson for Sept. 4. Exod. 20:12-21. Golden Text, Eccl. 20; 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

God must in all things "have the pre-eminence" l. 1 : 18) ; in the Lord's Prayer we are taught ray first in God's interest and secondly in our n, and thus the first four of the Ten Command- nts concern our direct duty to Him, the last six cern our duty to man. The first of these, i.e., fifth commandment, treats of our relations to earthly parents, "Honor thy father and thy ther." This commandment is enforced in at st eleven other passages of Scripture, so greatly s our God insist on filial respect (Ex. 21 : 17 ; . 19 : 3 ; Duet. 5 : 16 ; Jer. 35 : 7, 18, 19 ; Mal. 6 ; Matt. 15 : 4 ; 19 : 19 ; Mark 7 : 10 ; 10 : ; Luke 18 : 20 ; Eph. 6 : 2). God has made no eption of unworthy parents or unconverted ents ; our duty is the same to them, whatever y may be to us. It not unfrequently happens t a converted son or daughter has much to suffer ome through the misunderstanding of uncon- ted parents, and too often they think it is a icient reason for leaving home and seeking a of less suffering and reproach among such as lerstand them. This is in direct opposition to command of our God. If in such a case the ents request them to leave home, it is quite ther matter, or when God gives them a distinct to leave home for His service, provided they not doing so from the selfish motive of avoid- suffering, let them go, and the Lord be with m.

But it is a blessed thing when a son or daughter stand fire, not only the open persecution of ner friends, but the bitter poisoned darts of se nearest and dearest to them ; and how bitter y are, only those can tell who have experienced m. There is a heroism in obeying the many arently needless requirements, which are often iously arranged on purpose to hinder the child ttending a meeting or in some precious service ctly for the Master. It needs real practical h to recognize under such circumstances that ll things work together for good to them that God" (Rom. 8 : 28), and at the same time to firm as a rock about those things in which prin- e is involved. A daughter who is ready to ounce a religious meeting which she had counted to please a captious mother by doing some house- d duty which could have been done just as easily nother time, has a right to say to that mother en she insists on her going to the theatre or to ne worldly amusement, "No, dear mother, I can up my will, but I cannot give up God's will, I cannot follow Jesus to the theatre," etc. A verted son who for conscience toward God will k to the utmost requirements of his unconvert- father to help him in business, even though he st thereby deny himself many of the spiritual asures which his heart longs for, will be in a ition to speak with God's authority about any- g in the business which is contrary to His will, d, Sunday work, or whatever it may be. "So ne will of God that with well doing ye may put ilence the ignorance of foolish men" (1 Pet. 15). Disobedience to parents (2 Tim. 3 : 2) is gn of the perilous times of the last days, and fearfully prevalent even in families of believers he present time.

Thou shalt do no murder," has been explained our blessed Lord to include anger against a ther and hard names ; He warns us against the sin of attempting to hold communion with God while we are not on good terms with our brethren ; "first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift (see Matt. 5 : 21–26). Let a child of God give way to a bitter or jealous thought about a brother and then go to prayer, he will be conscious of an uneasiness, a restlessness, a want of concentration ; the enemy has come in at the open window and the stillness of the soul is broken by his presence. Things are not in their right order, first be reconciled to thy brother, and tell him the hasty, evil, unworthy thoughts that you have been thinking about him, and "then come and offer thy gift." "Yes," you say, "but he would not think me capable of doing so, and I should sink in his estimation." Of course you would, and the sooner, the better for your own sake, if this is a thing you fear. But if he is a man living in the light of God, he will honor you as he never did before, and an unhindered flow of communion with God will set in upon your soul. All which is against love is in violation of this command. As God's Levites it is our vocation "to bless in the name of the Lord" (Duet. 10 : 8, 9). Let us follow our vocation, and Him who called us to it.

"Thou shalt not commit adultery" is applied by the Lord Jesus even to a sinful look. How much more then to the unholy and unclean reading and conversation which is so sadly common in our days. Details of sin are read and spoken of with interest by parents in the presence of children, who catch every word, and then either talk over it with their young friends, or look out the terms used in the dictionary, that they may be able another time to understand all which is said ; the unwise parents never suspecting that those who are so young possess such sinful curiosity. Alas ! it is hereditary. In other cases the children are sent out of the room, but they do not notice when they look through the window that the parents are bowed in prayer over that which they just heard mentioned, and their keen sense of justice tells them that if it is wrong for them it is wrong for their parents too. Whenever there is an impure atmosphere in a house, although it may be only manifested in the reading with interest that which is impure, the children and servants will in some way come under the influence. O how great a check would be placed upon habits of impurity which are too often formed in childhood if there were a pure transparent atmosphere at home, nothing hidden, sin never referred to without sorrow and prayer to God, all things done and spoken in openness and transparency ; in such an atmosphere all comes to the light, "All things that are reproved are made manifest by the light : for whatsoever doth make manifest is light" (Eph. 5 : 13).

Our beloved Lord teaches us not only that we should not steal, i.e. that we should in nowise injure others, but also that we should act in the most disinterested manner towards them. "I say unto you that ye resist not evil." If a man takes away our coat, we are not to defend our cloak ; the Word of God does not suppose that Christians have a very large wardrobe, and if it consists of only coat and cloak, still we are told not to resist evil if any one would take them away. "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth" (Luke 12 : 15). Some say, "But this would be encouraging vice." I suppose when it was not the custom among Christians that any man should say of aught that he possessed that it was his own, this experiment was tried, and far from vice being increased thereby, we see how the Spirit of God could not tolerate a lie among the company of believers, but Ananias and Sapphira were cut off by the immediate judgment of God. The half-hearted durst not join themselves unto them, for then the life of Christ, the superhuman, divine life was manifest ; and so it would be again if we returned to the true standard of Christian principle.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." "A false witness that speaketh lies" is among those things which God hates and which are an abomination unto Him (Pro. 6 : 16–19). The sin above all others which shuts out from the New Jerusalem is the sin of lying : "There shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie." "Without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie" (Rev. 21 : 27 ; 22 : 15). God is truth, the devil is a liar and the father of lies (John 8 : 44), all which is untrue is of the devil. Why do not men speak the truth? They are afraid of one another, they see it is not to their interest, they want to appear better, cleverer, of higher birth or richer than they really are. Thus their whole life is one tissue of untruth, and not their words only. The assumption of the present day, the attempt of servants to imitate the dress of their mistresses, of the middle classes to imitate the luxury of the upper classes, the sad want of simplicity and reality, is all part of one great lie.

The unwillingness of many to work ; young ladies, who get into the pernicious habit of ringing for their maids to do every little service for them, thus losing their health by inaction, because they think it beneath them to put their hands to anything but embroidery ; the large class who are willing to work in anything which they think worthy of their position or education, but who fear more to do that which they consider menial than that which is really sinful in the sight of God ; men who fail in obtaining situations as clerks and who would be ashamed to carry parcels until they obtain another situation ; girls who have learned music and French, and would rather starve than go out as nursemaids until God opens them a way to take a better situation, all this is part of one great untruth which is infecting the whole nation. Such people are not afraid of begging, they think it beneath them to work but not beneath them to beg. Paul, busy as he was in his glorious mission of soul winning, would not be dependent upon any man : "Ye remember, brethren, our labor and travail : for laboring night and day, because we would not be chargeable to any of you, we preached unto you the Gospel of God" (1 Thess. 2 : 9). All we are and do has reference to those around us, and all unreality and want of truth is a sin against the ninth commandment.

The last commandment is directed against a sin which is almost universal, except where the life of Christ exists. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, wife, servant, maid, ox, ass ;" these are the things mentioned, and then it is added "nor anything that is his." No doubt among those whose treasure is on earth these things mentioned may be objects of envy. O how I should like to have just such a house or such a carriage or dress as so and so ! Others think if they do not say, Oh how I should like to be the intimate and esteemed friend of such and such a Christian ! or how I should like to be used of God just as such and such a Christian is. All this is coveting, and therefore breaking the tenth commandment, and all this is a reflection upon the goodness of our heavenly Father. He arranges all the circumstances in the life of each of His children to serve in the very best way to His glory and their advance in holiness. Now what is the antidote to all the sins against which these commandments are made ? Simply renouncing self. It is self which dishonors father and mother, self which generates anger. Christ in us does neither of these things. Christ in us cannot be impure, does not take away that which belongs to another, bears no false witness, does not, and cannot covet. A man who has no will but God's will, no wish or choice about anything but that God may be glorified, needs not to be restrained by these laws ; the instinct of Christ's life within him makes the obeying of them his second nature ; he has learned to live not unto himself but unto Him which died for him and rose again ; he has become "a new creature, old things are passed away, behold, all things are become new" (2 Cor. 15 : 15, 16).

A Confession of Ignorance of a Startling character was made the other day by a man of ripe years who called at the Bible House and bought a New Testament. He said he wanted to compare it with the New Revision ; he had never read either, and wanted to see which was the best.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Compromise has been Effected Between the two Houses of the British Parliament on the subject of the Irish Land Bill. Two members of each House held an informal conference and arranged the concessions it was thought might be honorably made. The decision arrived at was accepted, and the bill has become law. The House of Commons accepted three important amendments as well as some verbal modifications inserted by the Lords. The landlords will now have the power alike with the tenants of appealing to the new land court in cases of dispute; they will also have the right to claim compensation for investment when a tenant sells his lease; and the claims of the tenant for compensation for money sunk in improvements are restricted. It is obvious that all these changes are made in the interest of the landowners. It is also apparent that they involve the more important consideration of the tenant being involved in litigation to enforce his rights, which is an important aspect of the case, because the tenant being usually without capital while the landowner has it, he may accept a compromise rather than go to law.

The House of Commons having accepted these amendments the House of Lords did not insist on the others, and the Bill was finally agreed to by the Peers. As an evidence that the settlement in the dispute now effected is fair, it may be noticed that the Peers are assailed by the Conservative press for having surrendered too much, while the Radical press blames Mr. Gladstone for permitting them to extort concessions so important from him. The Marquis of Salisbury said, as a final expression of opinion on the bill, that although the opposition retained its objections to the Land Bill, and particularly regarding its provisions affecting leaseholders, he would not take any action which would send the bill back to the House of Commons, which had removed the dangerous excrescences of the bill. He expressed the hope that the bill would be of great benefit to the tenants and not of much harm to the landlords.

The Execution of the Coercion Act in Ireland was denounced by Mr. Parnell and his gang of followers in the House of Commons, as soon as the Land Bill was safely passed. They threatened the government with a continuance of the agitation if those arrested were not promptly released. Mr. Parnell said that the power of arrest under the Coercion act had been used to crush political agitation and not against the "ruffians" whom the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Mr. Forster, denounced in his speech introducing the Coercion bill. If evidence had been needed that the British Government have acted wisely in the matter this declaration supplies it. The government in locking up the leaders instead of their dupes, have shown that they recognized in the instigators to crime, a more dangerous class than the actual perpetrators.

An Important Agitation Has Commenced in Ireland which will probably lead to increased emigration from that country to the United States. The agricultural laborers are combining for a general strike for higher wages. They contend that as the farmers are enjoying better terms from the landowners, they can afford to pay their employés better than heretofore. It is notorious that the lot of the laborers is most pitiable, and that of those who work for the farmers who belong to the Land League is worst of all. Their demand is for payment in two classes. The better class to receive nine shillings per week ($2.25), the second class six shillings ($1.50), with some perquisites, such as a small plot of land at low rental. Should the farmers refuse to grant the concession it is expected that the men will strike, and a large proportion of the people will then be penniless.

Signs of Future Trouble Between Germany and France are noticed by those who watch the expressions of feeling in both countries. One of the most ominous is the speech M. Gambetta made recently at Belleville. Alluding to this speech a German newspaper of much influence says: "The portion of M. Gambetta's speech at Belleville in which he said, 'I hope to see the day when our severed brethren will once more be united to France,' contains fresh and unmistakable reference to Alsace-Lorraine, with the intention of describing the present state of affairs as merely provisional. We regret that M. Gambetta, in the prominent position he now occupies, never allows a year to pass without exciting afresh by public speeches the feelings of the French nation against Germany and the status quo, thereby showing his anxiety to be regarded by his countrymen as one who has devoted himself to a lifelong task of effecting the realization of French projects of revenge. We sincerely wish to foster and strengthen the friendly relations with France, and shall, therefore, combat every attempt to represent them as provisional." However strongly these attempts are "combatted" in Germany, travellers in France assert that the French people only await a propitious time to endeavor to wrest Alsace and Lorraine from Germany.

An Accident at a French Bull Fight Occurred on Sunday, August 14th, at Marseilles. At about five o'clock a large and crowded stand gave way, and about two thousand people were dashed suddenly to the ground amidst the débris of the structure. It is stated that over three hundred persons were wounded and twenty-seven killed. The scenes at the course, after the accident occurred, were of the most frightful and heart-rending description. The fact that these killed and wounded people were engaged at the time of the catastrophe in the desecration of the Sabbath, renders the circumstance additionally deplorable.

French Troubles in Africa.—The French have not yet put an end to their troubles in relation to their occupation of Tunis. The revolt against French authority continues to spread, and assumes every day a more serious and threatening aspect. The Arabs have escaped from Sfax, which the French have captured, to the Holy City of Kairouan, and incited their brethren there to rise against the French. There are signs that in view of the serious state of things that has arisen, the French Government and the French people are beginning to doubt the wisdom of the policy which suggested the expedition to Tunis, and their ambitious enterprises in Northern Africa generally. They believed that their position in Algeria would be strengthened by it, and that commerce would be tempted into new channels more favorable to them. But so far they find themselves grievously mistaken. Algeria is more disturbed than it was before, and Tripoli has become a centre of intrigue against French influence and authority. France has rough work to do before she sees the end of this Tunisian business, upon which she entered with such a light heart, and with such flourish of trumpets.

The Commercial Treaty Between England and France expires in November, and the negotiations for its renewal have been broken off on account of the wide divergence of views between the representatives of the two countries. Should the treaty not be renewed there will probably be a serious decline in the interchange of commodities, and both nations will suffer. While the treaty has been in operation the exports from France to England have risen from $145,000,000 to $205,000,000 per year. On the other hand the exports from England to France have decreased from $165,000,000 to $135,000,000 per year.

The Creditors of the Glasgow Bank, the failure of which spread desolation and ruin throughout the British Isles some time ago, have now received ninety per cent of their claims. Of 1819 shareholders, only 269 remain. The others are ruined. Nearly 600 gave up all they had, and began the world again. To the trustees of the fund raised for the relief of poor shareholders, which exceeded $1,950,000, there were 883 applications for aid.

The Rev. George Müller's Annual Report for 1881, shows that during the year ended the 26th of May, 1881, he received for his Orphanages and several Missionary objects the extraordinary sum of about one hundred and sixty-four thousand five hundred dollars. Such is one year's income of a man with no financial responsibility! He is God's steward, and he draws from the resources of the Almighty. None of that vast sum was laid apart for a fund to meet emergencies. It was all spent except a trifling balance of about $15,000. The work done during the year included the support and education of 2,252 orphans at the Orphan ages in Bristol; the support or assistance of 7 day schools, 56 Sunday schools, and 6 adu schools, most of which were in England and th rest in various parts of the world; the sale or th gratuitous distribution of 91,072 Bibles, Test ments, and Scripture portions; the assistance 151 preachers of the Gospel at home and in foreig countries; and the sale or the gratuitous distribu tion of 3,018,754 tracts and books. Truly this one of the most wonderful works of God sinc apostolic times. Mr. Müller's address is Ashle Down, Bristol, England.

A Triumph over Bad Temper was Describe by Mrs. Amanda Smith, at a Christian conventio held recently at Keswick, England. She said, " met a lady on a steamer whose face was beamin with delight. She had consecrated herself to th Lord, and had been healed in body and soul. Sh had long been a converted woman, but had bee troubled herself and had troubled others wit great irritability, the result of the complaint fro which she suffered. After she had consecrated he self, the suggestion came to her that she was no be ter, that she was conscious of having received n special blessing. Still she clung to the belief fulness of blessing in Christ, and all that night an for the next two days she kept on praising Fathe Son, and Holy Ghost for the perfect salvation pr vided for her. The result was that ere long th light and love of God filled her whole soul to ove flowing; and she became one of the most triumph ant and devoted of Christians."

Fishing in Little Pails.—At the Recent Co ference of Mr. Spurgeon's Pastors' College St dents, he related, by way of illustrating the wi dom of fishing in little pails as well as in dee seas, that when unable, through illness, to preac at the Tabernacle, and yet able to move from o room to another, he is accustomed to conduct brief service at Westwood for his own servants an others who may wish to come in. On one of thes occasions a gardener was converted, and interes ed in the change which had come over her hus band, the man's wife wished to know if Mr. Spu geon would again preach in the parlor next Su day. "Yes," answered the convert; "if he doe not get well." On the next Sabbath he repeate the little service, and the wife was won to Chris Mr. Spurgeon remarked on this, "I might n have done so well at the Tabernacle."

"Your Brother is Down There."—"A littl while back," said the Rev. A. G. Brown, of Lon don, in the course of an address delivered at th Mildmay Conference, "in the East of Londo they were digging a deep drain in the neighbo hood of Victoria Park. Some of the shoring gav way, and tons of earth fell down upon several me who were there at work. Of course, there was good deal of excitement; and, standing by th brink was a man looking on—I grant you wit great earnestness—on those who were attemptin to dig out the earth. But a woman came up t him, put her hand on his shoulder, and said, 'Bil your brother is down there.' Oh! you shoul have seen the sudden change! Off went his coa and then he sprang into the trench and worked a if he had the strength of ten men. Oh, sirs, ami the masses of the poor, and the degraded, and th lost, your brother is there! We may fold ou arms and say, 'Am I my brother's keeper?' Yes It is not for us to shirk the responsibility. Ther lie our brethren, and we shall have to give an ac count concerning them."

The Following Works by the Rev. C. H. Spu geon are for sale at The Christian Herald Offic at prices much below what they can be obtained f elsewhere. Remittances must accompany orders John Ploughman's Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; i cloth, 60 cents. The Treasury of David, a homilet ca exposition of the book of Psalms, four vols., as fa as Psa. 103, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Day Boo This popular gift-book contains a suitable passag selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for every da in the year, with a blank space opposite for aut graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spurge appear at their respective birthdays. The book gorgeously bound, and the price is 75 cents.

HIS Majesty David Kalakaua I., the King of Hawaii (pronounced Ha-why-ee), whose portrait, together with that of his wife, Kapiolani, we give on our frontispiece this week, and who has lately attained an unusual prominence in civilized society by his foreign tour, was born in 1836. He is the son of an eminent noble of princely rank, named Kapaakea, and on the death of King Lunalino I., otherwise called Kamehameha V., who died in February, 1874, leaving no heir, and without nominating his successor, he ascended the throne.

The announcement of his accession was at first received with considerable dissatisfaction, and a disturbance took place, many of the Hawaiians preferring as monarch Queen Emma, the widow of Kamehameha IV., a lady who visited Europe in 1871, and whose brother, then King of Hawaii, accompanied her. While in England both the king and queen died of measles, the former on July 14th, and the latter on July 8th. Their remains were laid in state in London, and were subsequently conveyed to the Sandwich Islands for interment.

When order was ultimately restored in the islands, Kalakaua was elected by a vote of the Island Legislature, and seven years of a peaceful and prosperous reign have shown that the confidence of the Deputies was certainly not misplaced.

The King is spoken of as a gentleman of good education, sound intelligence, and exemplary manners. It is supposed that one of the chief objects of his foreign tour is to make efforts to secure a desirable class of colonists for his dominions, for notwithstanding the increase of material prosperity, the native population is gradually dying out, and the Chinese bid fair to overrun the whole of the territory.

The Sandwich Islands, as they are now more generally termed, were discovered in 1778 by and as a compliment to Lord Sandwich, his patron, who was then first Lord of the British Admiralty, he named them after him; but that title is nowhere recognized in the constitution and laws of the Islands, which are thirteen in number, and constitute the kingdom of Hawaii. They are beautifully situated in the North Pacific Ocean, their distance from Panama, midway between North and South America, being 4800 miles; from San Francisco, 2100 miles, and from Japan, 3400 miles. Their distance from Australia is but little more than it is from Japan. They contain 6000 square miles. The largest of the group is Hawaii, which is about 97 miles long, 78 broad, 300 in circumference, and contains 4000 square miles. Honolulu is the capital, and it has a splendid harbor, formed by a huge coral reef. The total population is about 60,000.

Colonel C. H. Judd, an American citizen, who occupies the important post of secretary to the King, visited New York recently, and supplied many interesting details of life on the Sandwich Islands to the press. He is a son of Dr. G. P. Judd, who went as a missionary to the Islands in 1826. Among other information Col. Judd says: "The foreign society of the Capital, Honolulu, consists of about 2500 to 3000 Americans, English, French, and Germans. There is always a large number of men-of-war of different nations in port. Those who move in official society are in the main persons of education and refinement, who have seen a great deal of the world. At the King's receptions manners are very courtly, and the company is often accomplished and brilliant. The King is one of the few monarchical rulers who have had a business training, having practised law before he became a sovereign. He is making efforts to elevate the people, and endeavoring to introduce improved methods of agriculture. King Kalakaua is an eager reader of French and English magazines and newspapers, and carefully studies the United States Patent Office Gazette, in which patents are fully illustrated."

It is impossible to dwell upon, or even enumerate, all the incidents of the memorable but fatal voyage which resulted in the discovery of Hawaii, or, as it is sometimes written, Owhyhee, by Captain Cook, in 1778. The people at that time were but proved friendly, and a brisk exchange of goods was carried on between them and the crew of Cook's ship, the Resolution. The first time the natives saw white men they described them as gods of the volcano. Looking at them in the distance, they said, "The men are white, their skin is loose and folding," mistaking their garments for their skin, as they at that time had no conception of the well-fitted clothes of civilized men.

Mistaking the hats of the white people for their heads, and the cigars which were being smoked for something supernatural, they said, in alarm, "Their heads are strangely shaped; they are gods, for fire and smoke issue from their mouths." Thinking their pockets to be openings in their bodies, they exclaimed: "They have doors in the sides of their bodies; into these they thrust their hands and take thence many valuable things. Their bodies are full of treasure."

GODS OF THE VOLCANO,

These ideas of the dark, untutored minds were strongly confirmed by the discharge of a cannon and the display of fireworks; so that when Captain Cook landed the people invested him in a red cloth of the same kind as that in which they arrayed their idols, bowed down to him with solemn reverence, and conducted him to the house of their gods, and there worshipped him, various ceremonies being performed in his honor by the priests.

Ever after, when the captain went on shore, he was attended by one of the priests, who went before, giving notice that the "Orono," or god, had landed, and ordering the people to prostrate themselves before him; and even when on the water this functionary would stand at the head of the boat giving notice of Captain Cook's approach, at which the natives in their canoes would immediately cease paddling and lie down on their faces till he had passed.

CAPTAIN COOK'S MOVEMENTS.

It happened most unfortunately for this intrepid navigator that after his departure from the island, when the parting had been friendly on both sides, his ship was so damaged during a gale that he was under the necessity of putting back for repairs. This sudden return seems to have been viewed with suspicion; a tabu, or prohibition, was placed upon the bay where the ship anchored, so that there was no one present to welcome the officers and crew. In spite of this ominous sign, tents were erected on shore, and the damaged foremast, with all necessary tools and materials, landed to be repaired.

In a short time the tabu was removed and the natives entered into friendly intercourse, but several unpleasant incidents occurring shortly after, seemed to excite hostile feelings on both sides. The islanders could not keep from pilfering whenever opportunity offered, which brought about retaliation from the sufferers. A boat's crew were pelted with stones and driven from their boat, and it was only by the active interference of a chief that it was saved from destruction. Getting bolder and more troublesome, they at length stole a boat from its moorings, and Captain Cook determined to get King Terreeoboo on board, and compel him to remain as hostage till the boat was restored.

ATTEMPT TO SECURE THE KING.

Landing with a party of armed men, he proceeded to the King's house, and invited him and his two sons on board. The King gladly responded; but as they made their way to the shore chiefs and natives crowded round them, and begged their monarch not to go; they even compelled him to sit down and remain where he was. Finding no entreaties on his part could prevail in urging him to proceed, and that his plan was frustrated, Captain Cook began to be alarmed, and prepared to return to the ship.

Just at this moment news arrived that a chief of high rank had been shot, which caused quite a ferment among the assembled crowd, who immediately sent off all the women and children, and prepared for war. One of the natives went up to the captain, and, flourishing his weapon in his face, threatened to attack him. He was desired to desist, but not doing so, Cook fired a charge of small shot at him. The man escaped injury, but the action irritated and encouraged the others to hostile demonstrations. While the fray was going on, Cook fired again, and, killing one of the foremost of the throng, a general attack with stones immediately followed, answered by discharges of musketry from the marines on shore and the sailors in the boats. Before the former had time to reload, the islanders broke out into and a terrible confusion followed. The last seen of Captain Cook was when he was standing near the water's edge, calling out to the boat's crew to cease firing, and to pull in. While he faced the natives no violence was offered him, but directly he turned toward the boat he was stabbed in the back and fell with his face in the water. As Captain Cook fell, he uttered a groan, and the people at once exclaimed,

"HE GROANS! HE IS NOT A GOD!"

They then set up a deafening shout, and, dragging him on shore, surrounded and dispatched him with repeated stabs, snatching the daggers from each other's hands in their savage eagerness to take part in the assassination.

Such was the melancholy death of Captain Cook, a little more than a century ago. His body was carried into the interior of the Island, and divided among King Terreeoboo and several of the chiefs. His heart and liver were eaten by three hungry children, who were well known on the Island until they became aged men. In the year 1837 the officers and crew of the British ship Imogene, while cruising in the Northern Pacific, affixed to the trunk of a tree, near the spot where Cook met his death, an inscription on metal, commemorating his discovery of the islands, and constituting

A MONUMENT TO HIS MEMORY.

For many years the islands were not visited again; and it was not until 1786 that several vessels called for purposes of trade. But from the discovery of the islands to the arrival of missionaries in 1820 was a period of forty-two years, and the number of visitors, on the whole, must have been very great. There is no trace, however, of any religious instruction, even of the most rudimentary character, having been imparted to the natives.

ARDENT SPIRITS AND FIREARMS

were the chief articles of trade, and the main influence was to foster intemperance and a most licentious dissipation, which hurried the unwary people in thousands to their hopeless grave.

The following series of events will indicate in what a remarkable way God prepared the Sandwich Islanders to receive the Gospel, and will also show how it came to pass that the American churches were stirred up to send the glad tidings to them.

Kamehameha I. died in 1819, only a few months before a Christian mission embarked at Boston, Mass., to convey the Gospel to him and to his people. Although he had strenuously adhered to the religion of his people, he would not permit human sacrifices to be offered when he was sick for his recovery, as was customary in such cases; and, in lieu of such victims at his funeral, three hundred dogs were sacrificed. But there were the usual wailings throughout the islands. According to usage, the people shaved their heads, burned themselves, knocked out their front teeth, broke through all restraint, and practised all manner of crime as if it were a virtue. All ages and both sexes gave scope to the vilest passions, in self-torture, robbery, licentiousness, and murder.

Liholiho succeeded to the kingdom, and appointed his wife, Kaahumanu, as his premier. There soon followed an event which has scarcely a parallel in history, giving an affirmative answer to the inquiry of the prophet, "Hath a nation changed their gods which are yet no gods?" (Jeremiah 2 : 11). The tabu system of restrictions and prohibitions was inseparable from the national idolatry. They extended to sacred days, places, persons, and things; and the least failure to observe them was punished with death.

THE OLD SYSTEM SHORN.

A prohibition, which weighed as heavily as any other, was that in regard to eating, and was the first to be violated. A husband could, on no occasion, eat with his wife, except on penalty of death. Women were prohibited on the same penalty, from eating many of the choicest kinds of meat, fruit, and fish. These prohibitions extended to female chiefs, as well as to women of low rank. Many of the highest chiefs of the nation were females; and they especially felt burdened and uneasy.

They did not fear being killed by the priests, for they were chiefs; but the priests had made them believe that if they violated any prohibition they would be destroyed by the gods. This they began to doubt, for they saw foreigners living with impunity without any such observances. Besides—a fact which shows the power of God to bring good out of evil—ardent spirits had been introduced among them; and they often, when partially intoxicated, trampled heedlessly on the prohibitions of their idolatrous system, and yet were not destroyed by the gods. The awful dread, therefore, which formerly existed had in a measure subsided; and which, when no longer restrained by fear, the female chiefs were quite ready to throw off the burdens so long imposed upon them.

The mother of the king first violated the system by eating with her youngest son. Other chiefs, when they saw no evil follow, inclined to imitate her example. But the king was slow to yield. At length, however, he gave his assent; and then the work was done. The chiefs, as a body, trampled on all the unpleasant restraints which had previously enslaved them. In doing this, they were aware that they threw off all allegiance to their gods, and treated them with open contempt. They saw that they took the stand of open revolt. They immedately gave orders to the people that the tabu system should be disregarded, and the sacred temples demolished.

THE IDOLS COMMITTED TO THE FLAMES,

The high priest, having resigned his office, was the first to apply the torch. Without his co-operation the attempt to destroy the old system would have been ineffectual. Numbers of his subordinates, joining in the enthusiasm, followed his example. Idolatry was for ever abolished by law, and the smoke of heathen sanctuaries arose from the once venerated groves of every island. All the tribes, uniting in a jubilee at their deliverance, presented the extraordinary spectacle of a nation without a religion.

Liholiho seems to have had no higher aim in these remarkable proceedings than to be freed from restraint upon his habits of dissipation; and it is thought that the queen-premier favored the change in order simply to remove unreasonable disabilities from her sex. No religious motive appears to have had any influence with any of them, and the result was to leave the nation so far without any religion as to be practically in a less favorable state for self-preservation than it was before. But an unseen and all-merciful God, though they knew it not, was preparing them for the speedy introduction of

A BETTER RELIGION.

It was in a singularly interesting manner that God prepared the way throughout for the heralds of salvation in the Sandwich Islands. Ten years before the events we have just described—in 1809—two of the native boys shipped themselves on board an American vessel bound for New York. On their arrival in America their destitute, helpless condition drew forth Christian sympathy on their behalf. They were taken to New Haven, Conn., where one of them was subsequently converted to God.

Interest in these boys soon led to solemn inquiry into the condition of their country, and to the formation of the institution of the celebrated Foreign Mission School for the instruction of youths from heathen lands. The enterprise was consecrated by prayer, and was pre-eminently successful. Among the earliest pupils of the institution were five of the natives of the Sandwich Islands. On October 15th, 1819, a valedictory meeting was held in Park Street Church, Boston, Mass., to bid God-speed to a number of missionaries and their wives, who were about to sail for Hawaii. Among the number were several Americans, and three native young men, named Hopu, Tenooe, and Honuri.

The company embarked on October 23d, expecting a protracted and perilous conflict with pagan rites, for no intimation whatever had been received of the wonderful changes that had been occurring at the islands. The first tidings the missionaries had of them were on reaching the coast of Hawaii after a little more than five months sailing, on March 31st, 1820. Then they heard with wonder and gratitude that the idols and altars had been overthrown, and that the tabu and priesthood were abolished.

Having cast anchor, King Kamehameha III. and the royal family, with a retinue of dusky attendants, came off to the missionary ships in their double canoes. The king had a narrow girdle round his waist, a green silk scarf over his shoulders, a string of beads on his otherwise naked neck, and a feather wreath or garland on his head. Presently the missionaries were conducted ashore, and on landing were greeted with shouts of joy, and found the people most amicable and ready to believe and embrace the Gospel.

Not only were the Americans welcomed as missionaries, but as apostles of civilization, and Dr. Judd, whom we have already mentioned as one of the missionaries, became the adviser of the king and the chiefs. He organized the finances of the government and was Minister of Finance almost to the time of his death, about 1867. The Rev. Dr. William Armstrong, of Pennsylvania, went out as a missionary in 1831 and remained at the mission until 1848, when King Kamehameha induced him to become Minister of Public Instruction, a place he held until his death, in 1859. Almost his first act was to establish a private school for the education of the children of the chiefs.

Classmates together at this school were Kalakaua, now King of the islands, the dowager Queen Emma, and the three previous kings, and besides Colonel Judd and Mr. Armstrong, their brothers, Albert Judd, at present Chief Justice of the Hawaiian Supreme Court, and General Armstrong, who afterward became head of the colored school at Hampton, Virginia.

Colonel Judd was reared and educated at the islands, while Mr. Armstrong, like most of the sons of missionaries, was sent to the United States, and educated at Yale. He relates that when he visited the islands, a year ago, for the first time in twenty-five years, he entered the Court House at Honolulu one day and found two graduates of Yale sitting as judges, while the Attorney-General was a Harvard man, and the counsel for the defence was from Yale.

A reciprocity treaty was concluded between the United States and the Sandwich Islands by the influence of the missionaries, which has been of great advantage to the islands, as well as of great benefit to the Pacific Coast, which has received the entire crop of sugar of the islands, and could dispose of three times as much. The exports to the islands have nearly quadrupled in three years, consisting of machinery and supplies, which in value offset the sugar importations to the coast.

As an illustration of the marvellous success of the Gospel in Hawaii, we may mention that in the autumn of 1826, a congregation, estimated at not less than 10,000 natives, assembled to listen to the tidings of salvation. Wherever and whenever the missionaries preached there were immense and attentive audiences. Buildings were erected to hold 5000 people, and were at once filled to their utmost capacity. Schools were established in every district of the islands, and were conducted by four hundred teachers; and twenty-five thousand pupils, chiefly adults, were gladly receiving instruction.

THE CHURCH AT HONOLULU

is the most conspicuous edifice in the capital of the Sandwich Islands. It is the stone church of the American Board, and is shown in our frontispiece. Its tower and town-clock serve as a landmark for seamen. Its massive walls consist of coral blocks. The erection of this house was a Herculean work. The materials, stone, lime, sand, and timber, had to be collected by natives, whose facilities for the business were few and simple. The sand was transported by men, women, and children in calabashes, mat bags, handkerchiefs, etc., some bringing a quart at a time, some a peck. Some of the largest timbers were dragged a distance of some fourteen miles—fifty or a hundred natives perhaps, dragging a single piece.

The concourse of people at its opening was probably not much short of four or five thousand, among whom were his Majesty the King, his premier, and all the high chiefs. In the progress of the exercises the king arose, and before the vast assembly, presented a deed of the building and premises to the church, and to those of like faith who may come after.

A NATIONAL JUBILEE

was held in Honolulu in June, 1870, to recognize by heartfelt praise the goodness of God in sending thither the Gospel. Thousands assembled from all the islands, the King Kamehameha IV. and Queen Emma were present, and a special commissioner from the American Board attended from the United States.

A feast for six or seven thousand people followed a time of Christian fellowship and social enjoyment. With this jubilee the American Mission to the islands closed its labors, in a sense. It had done its work. By means of the blessing of God on the efforts of about one hundred missionaries, and the outlay of about a million and a quarter of money, that work had been nobly achieved. About a thousand true converts are now annually received into the fellowship of the Church, which is self-governing, self-sustaining, and aggressive in character, itself undertaking missionary operations among the heathen.

The Problem of Human Life Here and Hereafter is the subject of a book by Wilford Hall, published by Messrs. Hall & Company of New York, which deals with the question of evolution from the scientific point of view. Mr. Hall believes that many Christians have displayed more haste than courage in adopting the theories of evolutionists in the modified form known as theistic evolution, and claims that the orthodox doctrines of Christianity can be successfully defended on a scientific basis. It is notorious that during the last few years the great enemy of souls has used this theory of evolution to sap the faith of the most advanced scholars of the day, in the cardinal doctrines of the Bible. They have boasted that when the Christian is confronted with scientific theories he dare not face them, but takes refuge in faith, and rejects fact and reason. That he clings to the belief in the inspiration of the Bible and refuses even to examine facts which appear to him to conflict with the Scriptural account of the creation and the promise of a life beyond the grave. The charge has doubtless a basis of truth, for the Christian is often a busy and active worker in the cause of his Master, devoting all the time at his command to the work of winning souls for Him. Faith is above reason, and he who can say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and who sees the world lying in the arms of the wicked one, is not easily drawn aside from his work to examine the hypotheses of scientific experts. But it is not well that young men of education and culture should, because Christians have more useful work to do than spend their time in argument, arrive at the conclusion that the doctrines of the Bible are not so much above reason as contrary to reason. It is therefore a very commendable effort that Mr. Hall has made to prove that, even by the light of science alone, the advocates of the evolution theory stand convicted of illogical blunders, and that after all they have done the grand old doctrines of the Bible still stand impregnable.

THE NATION'S WOE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning, August 28, 1881.

"Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God."—ISAIAH 40 : 1.

The President Shot—Why should any one want to Kill Him—The Shadow on the Hearthstone—Its Alleviations—I. The President Prepared to Die—His Sermons—His Avowal to Dr. Sunderland—An Illustrious Death-bed—II. His Family Provided for—III. The Nation Safe—A Fair Chance for Gen. The Uncertainty of Human Life—Where our National Heroes are Enshrined—God Save the President.

THIS reiterated command to the ministers of religion centuries ago is just as appropriate this terrible morning, while we are awaiting tidings from the suffering couch of our chief magistrate.

"The President shot!" was sounded through the railtrain as we halted a few moments on the morning of July 2d, at Williamstown, Massachusetts, the place at which the President was expected in three days. "Absurd and impossible," I said. I asked then, as I ask you now,

WHY SHOULD ANY ONE WANT TO KILL HIM?

He had nothing but that which he had earned with his own brain and hand. He had fought his own way up from country home to college hall, and from college hall to House of Representatives, and from House of Representatives to the Senate Chamber, and from the Senate to the Presidential chair.

Why should any one want to kill him? He was not a despot who had been treading on the rights of the people. There was nothing of the Nero or the Robespierre in him. He had wronged no man. He was free and happy himself and wanted all the world free and happy. Why should any one want to kill him? He had a family to shepherd and educate, a noble wife and a group of little children leaning on his arm, and holding his hand, and who needed him for many years to come. If any one must shoot him, why shoot him then, just as after with indescribable perplexity and fatigue he had launched his administration and was off for a few days of recreation which he had so dearly earned? How any man could take steady aim at such a good, kind, sympathetic heart, and draw the trigger and see him fall is inexplicable.

But the deed is done. There is a black shadow on every hearthstone in America. It seems as if there were one dead in each house. Again and again we have prayed as we prayed this morning, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from us." God will hear our prayer, if not in one way, then in another. God's way is sometimes different from man's way, but it is always the best way.

I am thankful to my friends who have sent me a great multitude of telegrams this morning, showing their interest in this subject, telegrams from gentlemen who are my friends, and from others who are strangers, official telegrams from the public office of telegraphy, and they give a ray of hope. Who knows but our President may come forth again and ride through these very streets in triumph. God grant it. But the indications are not in that direction. I have hastened before my time of expected return, because I wanted in your presence to obey the text: "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God." While I comfort you, I must comfort my own soul, for no public event has ever so overwhelmed me.

I could dwell on the aggravations of this event, and say, what a pity that he could not have carried out the excellent policy proposed; what a pity that he could not longer have enjoyed the high honor bestowed by the suffrages of the people; what a pity that he should go out of life by the hand of violence; what an awful thing for his family and the nation and the world if he should die. But instead of dwelling upon the aggravations I shall obey my text: "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people," and present only of this stupendous horror.

I. Alleviation the first. James A. Garfield is prepared to exchange worlds if God sees fit to call him. Long ago he settled that matter. He was not dependent for happiness upon the course of a bullet or the whim of an assassin. On his knees and in days of health and with deliberation he had made

ALL RIGHT FOR ETERNITY.

There has been nothing of cant or whining or lugubriousness in his religion but a manly out and out profession of faith in God. Yea! he has preached this very Gospel. A minister said to me the other day, "I heard him preach; he preached for me in my own pulpit." I said, "What style of sermon was it?" He responded, "Excellent, excellent." But in all places he had preached—in Wall Street to the excited throng the day after Lincoln was shot—at Chickamauga among the wounded soldiers—in the Congress of the United States in many a noble speech.

Religion was with him no new thing. When a college boy, and encamped among the mountains for summer recreation, at eventide he takes out his Bible and says: "Boys, at this time of evening I am apt to read a passage of the Scripture; if you would like to hear it, I will read a chapter now." And then one of the comrades was called upon for prayer, and they all knelt in their summer tent. The last thing he did before leaving Mentor for Washington, was to take the holy sacrament of our Lord Jesus Christ, the tears of emotion rolling down the cheek of the communicant. The first opportunity he had after he was shot, he declared to my friend, Doctor Sunderland, that he trusted all in the Lord's hand, was ready to die or to live. Surely he was ready then. After these eight weeks of purifying distress he is ready now.

I want all the world to mark that this illustrious bed, if it be a death bed, illustrious for patience, illustrious for courage, illustrious for gentleness, is no infidel's death bed, no scoffer's death bed, no profligate's death bed, but in the most radiant sense a Christian death bed. Though canopied and surrounded with the elegance of a ruler's mansion, it is the same kind of pillow that your old Christian father and mother died on, and the same pillow which shall be offered in our last sickness, however humble our lot may be. It puts me more than ever in love with the old Gospel, the Gospel of the One who died at the hand of cruel assassins. O! Thou assassinated Christ, by Thy own wounds in the side and the hands and the feet and the brow, pity the head, the feet, the side, the physical anguish of our beloved President!

There had been other Christian men in the Presidential chair of this country, but the most pronounced Christian since the days of Washington, in the Presidential chair, is James A. Garfield. If he go—God forbid that he should go now—but if he go, he goes straight to the bosom of a merciful God. Death will be promotion. He will lose nothing, but gain everything. On the steps of the Capitol that stormy day in March he took the oath of high office. If he go now, at the gate of Heaven he will take the crown of triumph. Whether he live or die, I shout for him: "Victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

THE GARFIELD FUND.

II. Alleviation the Second. His family will be magnificently provided for. It is an awful thing when the bread winner of a family falls, if there be no estate left, and the wife must go forth with her helpless children at her back to fight for a livelihood. The mother, weak and sick with long watching, goes out to look for a place, and the children are taken by friends who, perhaps, get tired of the burden they assumed under sudden impulse of sympathy. But the more than $150,000 already subscribed to the Garfield fund are a hint that there is not one of us amid the fifty millions of America who will allow that afflicted family to suffer need. If this stroke come, the widow, the children, the aged mother will be the sacred charge of this nation. I see so many bereft women in the awful struggle for bread dying by inches, and finding no rest until they get inside the grave, that I am sure I am right when I present among the alleviations of this great sorrow the complete financial deliverance of our President's family.

NATIONAL SAFETY.

III. Alleviation the Third. If our President die, this nation, without a moment's halting, will march right on in its career of prosperity. The death of rulers in other lands often means bloody revolution. This nation endured the death of Presidents Harrison and Taylor and Lincoln, when it was not half as strong as it is now, and it will not be discomfited by this calamity. It will take more than one murderous wretch to stop this nation when God commands it to march on. If on that awful second of July the President had been instantly slain, I know not what would have occurred. There would have been other pistol shots and panic, and perhaps national delirium. How good God was to spare our President these two months, until the nation could gather its equipoise; for I tell you that while the heart of this nation is very sore, its head is level.

There will be but one life taken, and that by the hand of the law. I have no admiration for the organizations that I hear are forming to tear down the Washington jail, and maul the desperado. No, no. Let the judge of the court take his place and the jury be impanneled, and the witnesses testify, and the verdict be rendered, and the judge, amid a silence like the grave, give the sentence, and the scaffold be raised, and with a stout rope this accursed Guiteau be hung by the neck until he be dead. All that excitement will soon be in the rear, and the nation, chastened by this affliction, will move on and up.

"But," you say,

"WHAT IF THE PRESIDENT DIE,

what of his successor?" I answer, I have no acquaintance with the one who would be the incoming President, but I beg of you, the American people, give him a fair chance; do as you would like to be done by if you were put in the same crisis. The nation would make nothing by throwing any impediments in his way. Others make a prophecy in regard to this incoming President in case of the death of our present ruler—I make a prophecy. They make prophecy from a political standpoint—I make mine from a religious standpoint. If our President die, judging from what seems God's design of kindness to this nation, I think He will give especial blessing for especial emergency, and the chief ideas of President Garfield's administration will be carried out by President Arthur's administration.

There are men now in the Cabinet who have inaugurated such a great work that they will certainly be retained. Postmaster General James has sent such consternation into the scoundrels of the Star Routes, saving our country millions of dollars, and making his department more illustrious than have any of his predecessors, that I know his hand will be kept in that reformation. Secretary Windom has wrought what merchants and bankers all over the land have called a miracle of financiering, and I am sure he will not be dethroned while he is saving the land more millions than I dare to state. Robert Lincoln, Secretary of War, admired by all parties, first for his own sake and next for his martyred father's sake, will, I am sure, continue in the councils of the nation.

And others of the Cabinet, whose brilliant and world-renowned services cannot afford to be stopped, will stay in their places; and with all the Episcopal churches of America, by the command of their liturgy, praying Sabbath by Sabbath for the President of the United States, and all the non-liturgical churches of America uniting in the same supplication, I am sure upon the new chief magistrate would come straight from God the spirit of good government. You say that his position, if called to it, will be one of great delicacy. I know it. But it will be one of unlimited and unparalleled opportunity. Mark that. Fellow citizens, fellow patriots, fellow Christians, fellow mourners, now is the time to trust God.

IV. Alleviation the Fourth. If our President dies, he dies at what must be

THE BEST TIME.

If does not seem to suit me, it does not seem to suit you; but God's time is always the best. Do you say this is the teaching of fatalism? O, no; it is the teaching of your Bible and my Bible that God sets the limit of our life. Had it been best, the President by this time would have been amid the cooling sea breeze of Long Branch. Men with more bullets in them and in worse directions, are walking your streets to-day.

If he die—God avert the sorrow—if he die he goes at the time when he has the love of all the people. If he live he could not be an exception to the universal rule, that a brisk and decisive and reformatory administration rouses rancor and invective. Look up the files of the newspapers and see what surges of obloquy rolled over Lincoln, and Madison, and Monroe, and Jefferson, and Washington. Do you suppose Mr. Garfield could have carried out his intention of extirpating Mormonism, and that there would have been no wincing under the national surgery? He had other plans revolutionary for good.

It seems to me he suffered enough abuse in the political campaign of last autumn to suffer for one lifetime. If in addition to that there should be the insults of three or four years of contumely, it would be more than his share of bombardment. What is called the license of the printing press is getting to be something damnable. If James A. Garfield now dies, he dies in time in time to escape more insult than was ever heaped upon any of his predecessors, for by so much as he proposed greater reforms, he must have had to endure worse outrage. I was with him a few days before the bloody assault. I never saw a more anxious or perturbed countenance, and it seemed a relief to him to talk to my child, turning his back on the perplexities of State. What he has escaped, or seems about to escape, God only knows. The storm is lulled. If he goes, ours will be the grief—his the congratulation.

Six months seems to be a very short administration, but in that six months he has accomplished what forty years of his predecessors failed to do; the complete and eternal pacification of the North and South. There are more public meetings of sympathy in the South than in the North, on this subject. His sick bed, in eight weeks, has done more for the sisterhood of States than if he had lived out eight years, namely, two terms of the Presidency. The North, the South, the East, the West stand on the four sides of his bed looking into each other's eyes with a kindliness that never before characterized them. If he expire, do not think his administration because of its brevity is a failure. There has gone out from that sick room an influence that will be felt as long as the American Government continues. O! measure not a man's life by days, or months, or years; measure it by the sweep of its influence. Out of six months of time a good man may build an eternity.

V. Alleviation the fifth. This calamity makes disgustingly disreputable. Guiteau was no more crazy than thousands of other place-hunters. He had been refused an office, and he was full of unmingled and burning revenge. There was nothing else the matter with him. It was just this: "You haven't given me what I want, now I'll kill you." For months after each Presidential inauguration the hotels of Washington are roosts for these buzzards. They are the crawling vermin of this nation. Guiteau was no rarity. There were hundreds of Guiteaus in Washington after the inauguration, except that they had not the courage to shoot. I saw them some two months after, or six weeks after. They were mad enough to do it, I saw it in their eyes.

They killed two other Presidents, William Henry Harrison and Zachary Taylor. I know the physicians called the disease congestion of the lungs or liver, but the plain truth was that they were worried to death, they were trampled out of life, by place hunters, President Jackson said to a gentleman who told me of the utterance: "Sir, people want to be President of the United States. I want to tell them that this place is a perfect hell!" Now, in God's name let this thing stop. Three Presidents sacrificed to this one demon is enough. Let the Congress of the United States at the next session start a work of Presidential emancipation. Four Presidents have recommended civil service reform, and it has amounted to little or nothing. But this assassination will compel speedy and decisive action, and so some good will come of it.

But is it not sadly strange that the world makes no advance except through the

of human life. The Church is to be reformed, but Wycliffe and John Oldcastle must perish; and the scenes of Piedmont and Brussels market place must be enacted. The French despotism must be destroyed; but the streets of Paris must be incarnadined with human gore. The United States are to be separated from foreign rulers; but the frosts of Valley Forge must devour, and the bayonets of Yorktown must stab. National contest about slavery must be settled; but a million brave Northern and Southern men must die. Official patronage is to be regulated; but James A. Garfield must be assassinated. Alas! alas! without the shedding of blood there seems to be no reformation for the suffering state, and no atonement for the sin-cursed world. It seems for every reformation there must be a Messiah born in a manger and dying on a cross.

VI. Alleviation the sixth. This calamity has resulted in an glorious and sublime. There never was anything like it since the world stood. You tell me this is a selfish world, and it is every man for himself, and there is no kindness or generosity left. You make a mistake. Throne and cottage, Victoria and the village schoolgirls, parlor and kitchen, transatlantic and cis-Atlantic, trans-Pacific and cis-Pacific, Protestantism and Roman Catholicism, Eastern hemisphere and Western hemisphere, have by voice, by pen, by telephone, by telegram, by day, by night poured forth sympathy for our President and his family and the nation. There never has been anything like it.

That man expressed the feeling of many in this country when last week he offered to spare part or all the blood from his veins, if it was necessary to invigorate the President. We go back to ancient history to find a scene like that, and we speak of it in poetry and in song. We need not go so far back now. There are men here to-day who, wrought upon by the same power in this great sorrow, would bare their arm for the lancet, crying, like that old hero, of centuries ago, "Pour my blood into his veins that he die not." O! I think we must be brothers and sisters all. I think that all nations must belong to one family, and that they must have the same great mother—God. A little fore taste this of the good time when all misunderstanding shall cease and everybody shall say pleasant things about everybody else, and the embroidered eagle and lion and bear, will be taken off the banners, and there shall be substituted the lamb and the dove. How strange that one sick-bed should have made a millennium.

The President's son was said to be keeping a scrap book with all the expressions of sympathy and kindness, that he might show them to his father after he got well. Unsuccessful attempt. No book that ever went forth from earthly bindery would be large enough to contain the story. It will require the infinite book of God's remembrance to keep the record of the earthly and celestial sympathy that has hovered these long, dreadful weeks over the emaciated form of our suffering President.

VII. Alleviation the Last: The fact that this nation has impressed upon it as never before the

UNCERTAINTY OF HUMAN LIFE

Starting out on a holiday tour—coming back in an ambulance. Strong health no warrant against fatality. The President had a model physique. Out of a hundred men you would have selected him as the most healthy. Fine intellect no warrant. He was decidedly the most brilliant mind that ever occupied the White House. Able to select what food he would, what residence he would, what defence he would, yet we have been told more than once during the last two or three days that he is dying. Out of all this come lessons of perpetual readiness. It was a wonderful eulogy day before yesterday pronounced by the surgeons when they said: "There is no need of telling him he has to die, for he said at the start he had no preparations to make." Be ye also ready so that whether by flying bullet or falling scaffold, or colliding railtrains, or in gradual decease of ordinary sickness ye be called away.

I must leave until next Sabbath morning many things I want to say on this stupendous subject. Then I will tell you, if the Lord will, what this nation ought to do. I have this morning tried, at the behest of my text, to comfort you by the rehearsal of the alleviations of the national calamity. But after all there will remain in all our hearts a grief for many a day. O! I say I know just what you all feel.

OH! THAT HE ONLY COULD GET WELL!

How we would ring the bells and thunder the cannon, and set the night afire with pyrotechnic display. Oh! if he only could get well! But it does not seem to me at this crisis—although I have been hopeful until now—that he will recover.

I fear the message very soon will come shuddering along the lines: "President Garfield is dead!" If so, then with the pomp of great processions, and the tolling of bells, and the booming of minute guns, his silent form will move through these great cities toward his western home. He started from it with the congratulations of his country neighbors only a few months ago. They will at the same depot take up his palled casket, and with blinding tears carry it to the quiet graveyard and lay it down among his old friends.

We have no Westminster Abbey in which to bury kings, but we have a great national heart in which we enshrine those who have suffered for our land. Into that great shrine of the national heart we will carry our beloved President, and lay him down beside Adams, and Lincoln, and Washington, and the other mighty men who loved God and toiled for the betterment of the race. Then we will sound forth, partly in requiem and partly in grand march of triumph, the words which Garfield employed after another famous assassination: "The Lord reigneth. Though clouds of darkness are around about Him, righteousness and judgment are the habitation of His throne." God save the President! God save the nation!

The Responsibility for the Reign of Vice in New York City was fixed by Dr. Howard Crosby in an address at Trinity Baptist Church on Sunday night, August 7th. In sketching the history of the Society for the Prevention of Crime, of which he is President, he said: "The liquor law is a dead letter in New York City. We can't enforce it. All we can do is to make out lists of the improper places that mingle gambling and more questionable crimes with drinking, not allow them licenses, and revoke them where they have been granted. It took the society two years to persuade the judges to send any liquor-sellers to prison. Fines of $5 or so would be imposed and were readily paid by the offenders. They would be willing to pay $25 a week, and then could make fortunes. At last we did persuade the judges, and three men were sent to prison; but Governor Robinson pardoned them all before they got to the prison-door. Governor Cornell is of different material. He doesn't do that sort of thing. We did get a man sent to the penitentiary for thirty days. Ten days after he was sent we discovered that he was in the Tombs, where the head isn't shaved. We told the sheriff the man must be in the penitentiary in twenty-four hours or there would be trouble, and he was there in five hours. That is a specimen of how all the officials of the city government are ready to wink at delinquencies. The greater crimes in New York are attended to with a great deal of alacrity; but the matters which are the sources of crime—the sale of liquor, gambling dens, etc.—are wofully neglected, and officials purposely turn away their eyes so that they won't be called upon to make an arrest."

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

Dr. Gilbart's Generosity and his Philosophy—His Marriage—A Daughter Born—Its Mother Dies—Dr. Gilbart Becomes Warmly Attached to his Motherless Child—He is Summoned to a Conference of Antiquarians—His Reflections upon Rome's Invincible Legion.

As a great admirer, indeed, of the old Roman spirit and character, the Stoic philosophy was more affected by Dr. Gilbart than that of Socrates; a philosophy whose theory of human life is, "that acts of kindness should arise more from the head than from the heart," and that the duty of friendship more than love, of citizenship more than gentle charity, magnanimity more than tenderness, should actuate the conduct of men.

In harmony with this severe and stern system, Dr. Gilbart, at considerable cost, however, to his better self, schooled his generous impulses, and put restraint upon his emotional nature. Indeed, with Seneca, the great Roman stoical moralist, he long endeavored to persuade himself "That all emotion was mere perturbation, and all perturbation imperfection and weakness."

Hence, at the period we now speak of, he ruled himself to act more from cool judgment than from spontaneous sympathy—from what his conscience suggested he ought to do than from what a generous heart told he must. Consequently, though to give happiness, and dry tears should have been to Dr. Gilbart a virtual heaven upon earth, his principles of action robbed him of the bliss—keeping down, as far as he could, human love in his heart. He was like the sunshine and the rain, which are the source of refreshment and delightful pleasure to others, while they themselves all the while are unconscious of the joy.

Our abode, it is certain, plays no mean part in influencing the disposition and temper of our lives. Dr. Gilbart's dwelling, though, no doubt, it would nowadays be considered by many rather cramped and inconvenient, was, in our opinion, far preferable to the great majority of costly and pretentious houses of the modern type.

It was built of wood, framed in oak, and the interior, both the entrance hall and rooms, was wainscoted from floor to ceiling with the same timber. This material, dark from age, and polished, was bordered with deep and artistically carved mouldings. The rooms, though of good shape, were somewhat small, and the ceilings low; and the furniture, in harmony with its surroundings, was of a rich and antique pattern.

There are sanitary reformers, who, there is no question, would protest against the narrow bounds of air measurement in the various apartments of this abode. Yet their moderate size assuredly tended to promote cosiness and warmth.

Solid in structure and venerable of aspect, it was a house which tended to cherish, perhaps unconsciously, a quiet and dignified life, and to give its inmates to associate themselves with an unbroken and honorable part. Not like too many mushroom structures of to-day, which have no antecedents, are hastily produced and shamefully scamped, and which less than a twelve-month ago were things of nought, "Viewless as the wind," and without a history.

Dr. Gilbart had married in early life, but, after several years of quiet conjugal happiness, was now a widower. With an almost broken heart, he had laid the idol of his youthful affection in the cold and remorseless grave. It was felt to be a cruel blow. He had, in his conception, surrounded his beautiful wife with all the personal and moral attributes of an angel, and he somehow felt, that, if the world had only been right, the undying life of an angel should have been possessed by his beloved one too.

This bereavement, we fear, had the effect of strengthening his stoical theory. It led him to conclude more forcibly, if blindly, that in a world of death, where the affections are liable, at any moment, to be robbed of their object, it is fatuitous to give play to the emotions. That prudence should dictate a sort of hardness and reserve; that in a universe, which, in the hour of his intense grief, he dared to deem callous and heartless, the inner nature of man, and the outer world of dark and distressful circumstance, should be brought, by a discipline of impassiveness, into harmony the one with the other.

It was more than good fortune, however, it was a kind and fatherly providence, which in the hour of his bereavement provided for Dr. Gilbart an agent which in spite of his hard, un-Christian philosophy should ere long call forth and cherish within him the gracious and softer elements of his nature. In the death anguish of his "dearest one," an infant daughter was born to him, so that on the night one life was taken from the household, another was bestowed.

But, as Dr. Gilbart, in the presence of its dead mother, looked upon the infant, it was rather with a feeling of resentment than of joy. It was not a gift from heaven, he said to himself, but a tyrannical exchange that was forced upon him, and on cruel terms, and at a ruinous loss; and the rebellious anger and grief of the husband suppressed and kept in cold suspense the satisfaction and instinctive yearnings of the father.

Such an unnatural self-restraint and tension, however, human nature being what it is, could not last very long, and this, the more, since Dr. Gilbart, under a sense of professional responsibility, did not banish his motherless child from its home. He felt bound to watch over the feeble and helpless being, which in the course of nature had been intrusted to him. He therefore carefully selected a nurse for the infant, who should fill the post of foster-mother under his own medical advice and daily inspection.

As Dr. Gilbart's motherless infant grew to prattling childhood, and, taught by its skilful and generous nurse, held out toward him inviting hands and called him father, it was natural that he could not be either careless or indifferent.

One day, in special, he seemed to catch in the beaming eye and glad features of the little one the light of a spirit he had for years rejoiced in, and the beauty of a face that he had last seen ere the coffin of his most loved one was closed. The power of the recognition was overwhelming and irresistible; his usually cold and icy philosophy thawed as in summer sunshine, the fountains of a long sealed up passion gushed forth, and every barrier of studied stoicism was broken down mightily in his heart.

Taking up his "darling," as he now passionately called her, to his arms, pressing her to his bosom, and with an abandonment of love kissing her, his eyes full of tears, he confessed aloud in tender accents his former unnatural distance and reserve, rebuked his heartlessness, and vowed within himself to be a loving parent to the child which promised to restore to him in his home a loveliness and a fellowship of kindred-mind and spirit that he had believed was lost to him for ever. From that day forth, whatever impassiveness he might assume abroad, he was at home the fond parent and tender father.

When his daughter had reached somewhere about her fifth year, Dr. Gilbart spent a rather busy day among some of his antiquarian and would-be scientific friends in Chester. In digging a foundation for some houses the remains of some ancient baths were come upon by the workmen. And although a similar structure was already known within the city, the one now brought to light outside the walls lost nothing of its interest.

Dr. Gilbart, as an acknowledged authority in archæological matters, was, as a matter of course, summoned by the local savants to give his aid in exploring and explaining the fortunate discovery. This was a call, which as an ardent student in subjects of this nature, he was forward to obey, even at the cost, for an hour or two, of professional neglect towards some of his patients.

We fear that had some of our readers been present to hear a considerable portion of Dr. Gilbart's dissertation and exposition, they would have been little interested and edified. Such uncouth-sounding and un-Saxon words as "Tepidarium," "Balneum," "Sudarium," and such like, would have conveyed but little information to their minds; and were it otherwise, they would not care to know that they meant respectively, "hot water," and "hot air" baths, and "sweating places."

They might, however, have been interested to hear the Doctor say, when comparing the unquestionably important baths before him with those in Rome, that the baths, or "Thermæ" of the Emperor Caracalla, in the Imperial City, were no less than a mile in circumference, and included not only baths, but rows of marble seats for philosophic converse, halls for public lectures, and arenas for youthful exercises and athletics. "In fact," said Dr. Gilbart, "they were upon a scale of unparalleled magnificence—an institution for purifying at once the body and the mind, and for evoking the whole nature of man, as Rome then understood it, to its highest perfection and development."

But it was through not knowing what constituted the whole nature of man, its relationships and correlated responsibilities, that Rome gradually declined from the climax and zenith of her majesty. She had yet to learn that in meekness was true majesty, and that weakness was invincible almightiness. Empress of the world, she gloried in her strength, and made an arm of flesh her confidence. A little later than the time here referred to, the Creator of all things, the promised Christ of God, and the Desire of all nations, revealed to men a higher virtue than Rome could ever boast, and laid the foundations of an empire whose beneficent sceptre shall one day be universal.

After various descriptions and explanations of the objects around him, Dr. Gilbart, to give a practical turn to the occasion, launched out eloquently in praise of the costly provision for, and careful use by the Roman, of daily ablution, as compared with the indifference of the Briton of his own day in regard to this important matter.

"See," he happened to say, "how even the common soldier among the Romans practised the bath. There is my proof," he added, as he pointed to several ancient bricks lying loose in the ruin, inscribed with the letters, Leg. XX. VV. (signifying the unconquerable Twentieth Legion). "These men it was," he said, "who constructed in this far off province of the empire this bath, and as you see, friends, at large expense of money, time, and labor, counting life unbecoming and, indeed, unendurable, without their daily ablution. I wonder," he inquired, "if our King George's men cleanse their whole person in such a complete and thorough manner, not to say once a day, but once a twelvemonth? I very much doubt it."

In such a group as that which surrounded Dr. Gilbart, there is always one at least who is counted even by his friends "a good deal of a simpleton," though he himself all the while is inflated with an immeasurable amount of self-appreciation and conceit. Such was the case at all events upon the day before us. This individual was greatly struck with the Doctor's remark, and pondering it for a little in his mind, saw in it, as he supposed, the palpable and adequate explanation of a late national catastrophe.

"You are quite right, Doctor," he exclaimed, with a patronizing air—"quite right, my dear sir; and it is as clear as daylight to me, gentlemen," he said, turning to those about him, "that this Twentieth Legion, whose record is before us, were unconquerable, as they say on these bricks, just because of their daily wash. They entered, as the saying is, with clean hands, into every contest; and as a natural, and necessary, and, indeed, I may say, moral, consequence, they came off victorious. Now, our brave fellows, you see, unfortunately adopt no such custom; and mark the consequence, gentlemen—under General Burgoyne, at Saratoga, they have had, a short time since, to lay down their arms, horse and foot, you know—English soldiers they were, remember—brave as the Romans any day. And what else, gentlemen, but what I have suggested, can account for their defeat? I am sure I don't know; and what a great, I was going to say, ridiculous misfortune it is, gentlemen, that the sordid, and what I must call the harpy conditions—the harpy condition, I repeat—of the faces, hands, fingers, and feet of our heroes, and their inefficiency therefrom will eventuate, sure as I'm a living man, gentlemen, in American independence."

PERSIA: ITS POSITION IN PROPHECY.

By Rev. E. J. Hytche.

Symbolized in Nebuchadnezzar's Image—Its Future Prominence—Its Place in the Closing Crisis—An Antagonist of Antichrist—Alliance with Gog—The Eastern Kingdoms in the Millennium.

ONE notable sign of our times is the fact that the Eastern toes of Daniel's image have become strikingly prominent during the past half century. Two, Greece and Egypt, are already notable factors in Eastern politics; the first country, in fact, dominates whenever questions connected with the eastern encroachments of Russia are considered. But one once powerful, but now powerless State, which also formed a portion of Daniel's image—namely Persia—has escaped the notice of most prophetical students, although prophecy indicates that that kingdom will have an important post to occupy in the latter days of this dispensation.

As respects the position of Persia in prophecy fulfilled and unfulfilled, we need scarcely say how aptly the "silver breast and arms" (Daniel 2 : 32) of Nebuchadnezzar's image symbolizes the dual kingdom of Medo-Persia. This prophecy, indeed, is so self-interpreting that there cannot possibly be any doubt as to its meaning; for after telling the great Gentile autocrat that (verses 38, 39), Thou art the "head of gold," Daniel added that "after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee;" and so we have a gradual metallic debasement, until, when the image reaches its last or ten-kingdomed form, it is smitten by the Divine stone and scattered "like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors."

About forty years afterward—during the reign of Belshazzar, the last Babylonish emperor—Daniel himself had a prophetic vision, in which the second universal Gentile empire was revealed in its true or beast-like form. Thus we read, after describing the Babylonish beast (Daniel 7 : 5), "Behold another beast, a second, like to a bear, and it raised up itself on one side, and it had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth of it; and they said thus unto it, Arise and devour much flesh." Again the interpretation is supplied, for it is stated (verse 17), "these great beasts, which are four, are four kings [or empires], which shall arise out of the earth." This description of the second universal or Persian empire was fulfilled to the very letter, even to the three ribs, which symbolized its three great provinces of Persia proper, Media, and Babylon, which fitly represented the whole Persian empire.

For long ages Persia was in a semi-dormant state—thus literally answering to the photograph of Daniel (7 : 12), "The rest of the beasts had their dominion taken away, but their lives were prolonged for a season." But we are prepared for the revival of Persia in the last days as one of the five eastern kingdoms, probably under the general name of Syria, by the description of the Therion. For in Revelation 13 : 2, we find that "his feet were the feet of a bear"—the very emblem given to Daniel as significant of the Persian empire.

It is true that the fourth or Roman empire did not include much of the territory of ancient Persia, save Armenia and a part of the land lying between the Tigris and Euphrates and bordering on Syria proper. But as Nebuchadnezzar's image (Daniel 2 : 34) is to be "smitten on his feet," and as the Apocalypse not only portrays (Revelation 13 : 2) these "feet," but intimates that they are "the feet of a bear"—the Persian symbol shown to Daniel—and as they are also prominent features in Antichrist, there can be no doubt that Syro-Persia will be one of the five last eastern kingdoms. In that case Persia will probably regain its ancient boundaries, and extend from Syria to the Indus.

And here we cannot omit to refer to one mysterious event in which Persia and the Jews are brought into conflict. While Daniel was meditating on the prophecies of Jeremiah by the river Hidekel or Tigris, the angel Jehovah explained to him these enigmas, and further told him (Daniel 10 : 14) "what should befall his people in the latter days;" "for yet," as he continued, "the vision is for many days." It was also stated in verse 13, that "the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me twenty-one days." This prince, as the scene of the conflict was in heaven, was clearly no mere human being, but some evil spirit to whom Satan had committed the oversight of Persia. The archangel Michael, who is described as the prince of Israel (verses 13, 21), took part in the contest, and Satanic malignity being foiled, Daniel was told in answer to his prayer the trials and glorious destiny of his kinsmen "in the latter days." Nor need we be astonished at such a conflict between unfallen and fallen spirits; for, as the angelic hosts during this dispensation are (Hebrews 1 : 14) "ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation," we may well infer how active they would be in sustaining the courage of such a faithful servant of God as was Daniel. The same archangel Michael will also be the chief agent in ejecting Satan, the "prince of Persia," and other fallen spirits out of heaven (Revelation 12 : 7, 8) prior to the reign of Antichrist and his ten vassal kings.

PERSIA AS AN ANTAGONIST OF ANTICHRIST.

In the last days of this dispensation we first hear of Persia as an antagonist of Antichrist before he obtained universal sway. Thus Daniel intimates (11 : 40) that "at the time of the end the king of the south (or Egypt) shall push at him, and the king of the north (or Syria) will come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horses, and with many ships." But the alliance of these powers will be in vain, for the Therion will "enter the countries and overflow and pass over" them as conqueror and reduce them to vassalage. Hence it is probable that Persia is one of the three horns which Antichrist will "pluck by the roots" (Daniel 8 : 8–20).

THE ALLIANCE OF GOG AND PERSIA.

The contiguity of Syria or Persia to the land of Gog—"the prince of Rhos, Meshech, and Tubal," or Russia (Ezekiel 38 : 2, literal)—will account for its antagonism to and after its defeat for its ultimate alliance with Antichrist. Among the many nations stated as taking part in the last terrible invasion of Palestine by that awful potentate, Persia is specifically mentioned in the fifth verse of that prophecy. Of his utter defeat of that kingdom Ezekiel also reports, where Persia is mentioned under its primitive name of Elam.

But whatever be the cause, it is certain that the alliance of Gog and Persia will be interrupted just before his defeat in the Valley of Jehosophat. For it is stated (Daniel 11 : 44) "tidings out of the east (or Palestine) and out of the north (or Syro-Persia) shall trouble him; therefore he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many;" that is, the Jerusalemites who will have revolted (see Zechariah 12 : 5–8). As the northern boundary of the Holy Land will abut on Syria, this may possibly tend to unite the two nations against the increasing exactions and oppression of Antichrist. Both nations being thus in rebellion—the Jews in the field active, and the Syro-Persians at least passive—will enrage the tyrant beyond all control, and his final assault of Jerusalem will bring on the predicted crisis when the Divine Liberator will descend on Mount Olivet with the resurrection saints, and close the controversy of six thousand years (comp. Zechariah 14 : 3–5, and Revelation 19 : 11–21).

The five eastern as well as the five western kings of Daniel's image are stated (Revelation 17 : 12) to "have received no kingdom as yet," but that they will "receive power as kings one hour (or at the same time) as the beast." It is obvious then, that neither the present Persian nor any other eastern or western dynasty will then reign, for they will have been rejected from regal sway either by revolutions or the spread of democratic principles. The word "receive" would point to popular elections as presidents of republics, for at first they appear as crownless (Revelation 12 : 3). But afterward, under the leadership of Antichrist (Revelation 13 : 1), they appear as crowned kings. We may, then, infer that, at first, they will be elected as presidents of ten eastern and western republics for seven years; and that at the expiration of three years and a half, like the two Napoleons, they will violate their oaths, and assume the insignia of regal authority under the emperorship of Antichrist.

THE EASTERN KINGDOMS DURING THE MILLENNIUM.

With the sole exception of Babylon (comp. Jeremiah 51 : 62–64, and Revelation 18 : 21–23), it would appear that all the four eastern kingdoms divided among the generals of Alexander will be re-established during the millennium. Hence the same prophet, in fact, who so graphically depicted the downfall of Persia also prereported its revival, for he says (49 : 39), "It shall come to pass, in the latter days I will bring again the captivity of Elam, saith Jehovah."

Nor need such national restoration of Persia excite any astonishment; for the New Testament records two incidents which are but forecasts of its brilliant future. Thus the magi who presented precious gifts to the infant Jesus were clearly either Persians or of Persic race. That they were monotheistic we have every reason to believe, seeing that the high-principled Daniel offered no opposition to the desire of Nebuchadnezzar (Daniel 2 : 48), which constituted him Archimagoi, or chief of the magi. It was, then, the descendants of these men who were the custodians of all the knowledge and philosophy of Persia, who had the high honor of antedating the time when all science and all genius shall be placed at the feet of Christ the King in grateful homage.

So about thirty years afterward, when the feast of firstfruits had called all the Israelitish males, as well as many of the Jewish proselytes to the Holy City, the Persians were again prominent among those Gentile proselytes who had recognized the Messiahship of Jesus. Gathered in one place, in manifested unity, the sacred fire not only baptized the Hebrews, but also the "devout men," or Gentile proselytes.

Prominent among these proselytes were the "Parthians," who were located in that part of Persia which lies between the Tigris and Indus. The Medes, too, who were so closely allied to the Persians, also contributed their quota to this memorable assembly. The Elamites, whose capital, Shushan (now Kusistan), was the home of the exiled Daniel, were also conspicuous among these Gentile proselytes. As all these tribes spoke the Persian language, they may be regarded as one people; and thus Persia had the high privilege of > Forecasting that millennial day,

> When flags of every nation
> To Christ shall homage pay.

Notwithstanding that our Lord attested the inspiration of Daniel (Matthew 24 : 15) no book has been so assailed by neologians as that of Daniel, and we are sorry to add that no prophecy has been so mangled by commentators, by confounding past with future events, as that book, which is the Apocalypse of the Old Testament. It is therefore most cheering to find—even though true faith does not require it—how much of the past history of Persia verifies the predictions of Daniel. And when we see how much of its present condition is prerecorded, especially its relations with Russia, a country which in the days of Daniel was almost unknown, we may well infer that its future is equally preoutlined in the pages of prophecy.

Even in our days we see the beginning of the predicted national revival of Persia. For of all the Christian Asiatics among whom Dr. Jacob Perkins and other American missionaries have labored, none have been so fruitful as the Nestorians—that purest of the ancient churches—who have been located since the first age of the Church in the part of Persia adjacent to Babylon. Bishops, presbyters, and people of that ancient race have embraced the Gospel of God's grace in large numbers, who "are living epistles" to their kinsmen of all creeds. All these are but foreshadows of the coming millennial days, when, consequent on the epiphany and reign of Jesus, God will redeem His promise to Persia uttered 2900 years ago (Isaiah 49 : 39), "In the latter day I will bring again the captivity of Elam."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Melancholy Words "No Hope" Embodied the substance of the bulletins from the sick room in the White House at the close of last week. For the first time since the shooting, the physicians at the bedside on which the anxiety of the whole nation was concentrated, despaired of the President's life. Even the patient himself, who has been cheerful throughout his long suffering, asked on Friday whether it was worth while to maintain the struggle any longer.

The cause of the depressing feeling was the extreme exhaustion of the sufferer, to which was added the obstinacy of the swelling in the parotid gland. It occasioned the President serious discomfort, but at first, as stated last week, the physicians did not regard it with alarm. On Tuesday, August 23d, fears were, however, entertained of suppuration, and the drain on the enfeebled system would then become a serious factor in the case. The following day the presence of pus was detected in the gland, and it was decided to lance it. The operation was performed by Dr. Hamilton, but the result did not fulfil the expectation of the physicians. Only a small quantity of pus was released. Meanwhile, although the President was able to take liquid nourishment and the stomach apparently digested it, yet there was no indication of an increase of strength.

On Thursday the gravest apprehensions were excited, and Mrs. Garfield and the Cabinet were informed that the President was very much worse. On Friday the alarm increased. The President's pulse rose to 138, he was delirious at intervals, and his exhaustion was extreme. The glandular swelling, the physicians admitted, was the result of blood poisoning, the pus from the channel of the bullet having been absorbed into the blood. A little encouragement was derived from the discovery that the swelling was discharging through the ear; but the hope raised was feeble, for the drain on the vitality of the sufferer was apparently greater than his resources. Mr. Blaine telegraphed to Mr. Lowell, in London, that the situation was "one of great gravity and danger." As the President's critical condition became known there was profound sorrow manifested throughout the country. One man wrote to the doctors that if the President could be sustained by the transfusion of blood, he was willing to give half or all his blood for the purpose. The doctors, however, did not entertain the idea. On Saturday and Sunday the President slightly revived, his mind became clear, and he asked for and ate a small quantity of solid food. Mr. Blaine was able to telegraph to London that the case was not absolutely hopeless, although it was very dangerous and critical. During the whole of the day on Sunday, as the President lay hovering beteen life and death, Christians of all denominations in every city and village of the land were offering their supplications to "Him in whose hands are the issues of life" for his recovery.

On Monday afternoon the welcome intelligence was received from Washington that the parotid swelling had sensibly diminished and was discharging freely; that the body wound had improved in appearance and that the pus discharged therefrom was thicker and of a more healthy character than formerly. "The possibility of life," as Mr. Blaine said in his telegram to London, has manifestly increased, and hopes are encouraged that although the most sanguine of friends and the most eminent physicians had given up hope, God, in answer to the nation's prayers, is bringing back the President from the threshold of the grave.

The Secretary of the Treasury issued a notice last week offering to redeem, without rebate of interest, the thirty million five per cent bonds maturing on the first of next October. It is understood that the Secretary's action anticipating payment was prompted by a desire to relieve the banks. It appears that large sums of money were accumulating in the treasury vaults, while the bank reserves were dwindling down to a dangerously low amount. By setting free the money in the treasury, it was hoped that the schemes of speculators who might conspire to produce a panic would be thwarted.

Three Greenback Conventions Were in Session on Wednesday, August 24. They were those of New York, Massachusetts and Mississippi. In the platform adopted by the New York convention the following demands are formulated: "The unification of the people of the whole country; the overthrow of all monopolies by the resumption by the government of the power to issue and control the money of the people, and by a government control of railroads and other transportation corporations; the just payment of our national debt according to the laws under which it was contracted; the protection of labor by the establishment of an honest fiscal and financial system, and by securing to every citizen the inalienable right to the soil; and the general administration of the Government in the interest of the producing many, instead of as at present, the non-producing few. The other two conventions passed resolutions of similar purport. In each case a Greenback ticket was nominated. In Mississippi a coalition has been effected between the Republicans, the Greenbackers, and the Independents. The Republicans fill three places on the ticket.

A Difficulty is Reported to Exist in the liquidation of certain claims called into existence by the struggle for the United States senatorships at Albany. The new Collector of the Custom House is under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, not of the Secretary of State. Mr. Windom is a convert to the principles of civil service reform, and besides, was not so much interested in the Albany struggle as Mr. Blaine was; it is therefore probable that such claims as can be substantiated will have to be discharged in some other place than that under Mr. Robertson's control.

The Exposure of the Star Route Frauds goes on with sickening uniformity. Not only do we hear of the clever schemes by which the forms of law were observed while the people's money was stolen, but as the investigation proceeds, cases are exposed in which the mode of procedure advanced from cheating to barefaced robbery. Route No. 38,150 is a specimen. There a clean steal of $4568 was made. It extended from Saguache to Lake City, Col., a distance of ninety-five miles, with four intermediate stations, and was let originally for $3426. The usual trick of expedition and increased service was put in operation on a petition with only fourteen signatures, making the route worth to the contractor, $15,437, but he was paid $20,005.

As to the possibility of the offenders being punished, the New York Times, which has relentlessly exposed the villany, says: "There is reason for misgiving, lest the department of justice should find the obstacles in its way so formidable and the support behind it so inadequate that guilty men will finally escape the penalty of their wrong doing. But if public sentiment could only be aroused to exert its full power, and to bring all the forces of the government into play for the vindication of the national honor, there would be no doubt of the result."

A Gift of Twenty-Five Thousand Acres of land has been made by the Sioux Indians to the much-wronged Poncas. At the conference held in Washington last week, between the Omaha, Winnebago, Sioux, and Ponca chiefs and Secretary Kirkwood, the secretary offered to purchase from one of the tribes lands upon which to locate the one hundred and seventy-five Ponca Indians who yet remain upon the old Ponca reserve. The Omaha and Winnebago delegates refused, but the Sioux delegates consented not only to part with the land the Poncas needed, but offered to give the lands to the Poncas. White Thunder—the successor of Spotted Tail, who spoke for the Sioux delegation—said with native eloquence, when Secretary Kirkwood inquired whether they expected the government to give anything for the lands, "No, my friend; that is not what I want. You told me yesterday I ought to have pity upon these poor Poncas. If I have pity upon them I am not going to take their money. We give them the lands they need." Thus some reparation will be made for the iniquitous course of Mr. Hayes's administration through the nobility of the Sioux.

Eight Children Were Taken from Their mothers in New York, on Monday, August 22, by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. In each case the cause was that the mother was an habitual drunkard. One of the mothers was in the habit of sleeping in the open street with her baby in her arms; another was found actually offering her little daughter, two years old, for sale on Centre Street; and another had by her insatiable love of rum caused the ruin of her husband, the break-up of her home and the serious disease of her four girls aged from one to eleven. One of the children, an infant at the breast, had been dropped by her mother in the street. It was taken to a hospital, where the doctors said the baby was suffering from alcoholic poison imbibed through its mother's milk. If Christians who oppose prohibition would take the trouble to think over these and numberless similar cases, they would probably see reasons for reconsidering if not changing their attitude on this question.

The Duty of Watching for Christ's Second coming was impressed by Mr. Moody, last week, on the large assembly gathered at the Northfield Conference. While many people are saying, as was predicted, "Where are the signs of His coming?" Mr. Moody said, "Here is where I stand, and nothing can shake me off this rock; I am told to watch, and surely I am to watch for something. I am told to expect Christ. I am told not to look for signs, but to look for Him. As soon as we begin trying to descry signs we get muddled. All we have to do is to be ready for His appearing, if He should come at once as a thief in the night. I am to have my loins girded and my lamp burning. What may come any day, I am to be ready for every day."

"Cannot Divorce Suits Be Disinfected Before publication?" is the question asked by a prominent journal, in referring to a scandalous case to be argued in the courts. The question is a timely one, for it is certain that the publication of the details of so many of these suits has already done serious harm. Men and women have been heard to reply to expostulation, in reference to their own sins, that they are not so bad as some defendant they mention, recently before the public. Not a few also have acquired an acquaintance with deceitful tricks which they can imitate although they have not the brains to devise them. It is becoming a serious duty in the face of the rapidly spreading corruption of society for ministers to speak plainly of the fearful culpability of this sin.

A Curious Mistake Was Near Causing Loss life at Newark, N. J., on August 20th. A poeman had been requested to sleep in a house ere by its proprietor, who was temporarily abnt, and was anxious about the safety of his propty. Two other policemen, knowing that the man is away, but not being aware that a policeman d been stationed there, saw a light in the house, d thinking that burglars were at work, went on e stoop and tried to open the door to capture em. The policeman inside supposing that the ise of a man fumbling with the lock indicated an tack by burglars, rose, and going to the door uck at them through the glass. Pistols were awn by all three, but before the shooting a utual recognition of the voices took place, and ey were able to congratulate each other on their rrow escape. It is not the first time that allies ve mistaken each other for enemies. It would ve been a happy thing in many controversies beeen the clergy of different denominations if they d been sufficiently enlightened to recognize in ch other, servants of a common Master, before ey wounded each other's hearts (James 3 : 16).

Following an Example in Crime is the Plea t up by a boy who is now in the jail at Camden, J. He is charged with having placed a tie ross the rails on the Camden and Atlantic Railad near Waterford, Camden County. He has ade a statement to the effect that he was inced to place the tie on the track because he saw other party do the same thing a few days preous, but that he intended to do no injury. If the y speaks the truth he must be little better than idiot, but it is certain that, although every one ust bear the punishment of his own sin, many a an is responsible for the ruin of boys who enter e downward path through imitating him.

"Saved by a Dog" is the Acknowledgment ade by a man in Philadelphia, who had a narrow cape from a burning house last week. He was akened from sleep by his young Newfoundland g leaping on his bed and pawing his face. On ising he found the house suffocatingly full of oke, which issued from the kitchen. The fire partment was summoned and the flames extinished, but not until damage to the extent of ooo had been done. He is satisfied that he uld have suffocated had it not been for the dog, there was no other one in the house at the time. is is by no means an isolated case of an ani-al's watchfulness being the means of saving his aster's life. We hold ourselves superior to utes on account of our reasoning powers, but ripture points out that the ungodly show less inligence and a baser nature than the brute crean (Isa. 1 : 3 ; Jer. 8 : 7).

Alone In the World and Dreading Sick- ss was the reason assigned by a German govness at Greenwich, Conn., for committing suile. The lot of a woman alone in a land of angers is very disheartening, but it was a very surd idea as well as a very wicked one for this verness to attempt to improve it by committing icide. Had some Christian counsellor been at nd to direct her to a "friend who sticketh closer an a brother," she might have seen the only sure y out of her apprehensions. To the solitary as ll as to the Christian with many friends, there is thought so reassuring and comforting as that spired by the words of the ascending Saviour, Lo, I am with you alway" (Matt. 28 : 20).

A Remarkable Case of Healing Through th and prayer is reported from New Britain, nn. Miss Anna Lewis, the daughter of an emoyé of Messrs Humason & Buckley, cutlers, has en suffering during the past three years and a half m a severe nervous disease which has rendered r life a constant burden to her, and in its acute ges has prostrated her so utterly that she has en for three months at a time unable to rise from r bed. Many physicians had been consulted thout avail. In June last, a friend of the family lled their attention to the cures effected through e instrumentality of Mrs. Mix, the colored lady Torrington, especially to that of Miss Carrie dd, already described in these columns. Mrs. Mix was applied to, and on June 22d she visited Miss Lewis, and explained to her the necessity of absolute faith that the Lord could cure her according to His promise. The sick girl answered "I have faith." Then Mrs. Mix prayed, quoting the words "and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up" (James 5 : 15). When she had finished praying she moistened the tips of her fingers with olive oil taken from a small bottle, and touched with them the forehead of Miss Lewis. After this Miss Lewis lay still for a few moments, and then, Mrs. Mix taking her by the hand, she rose and walked across the room, uttering the prayer as she did so, "Lord, help my faith." Since that time, though very weak, Miss Lewis is conscious that she is entirely cured of her disease.

Mrs. Mix, in the course of conversation on the cure, said, "I believe in the Bible. There is no more efficacy in my prayers than in those of anybody else that prays with faith. It isn't necesary to anoint with oil. It isn't necessary even to be present. The only essential things are prayer and faith. I use oil because the Bible says so, and I have no doubt, therefore, that it is proper to use it."

In the Oldest Meeting-House in America an interesting commemoration service was held on Monday, August 8th. It is situated at Hingham, Mass., and is two hundred years old. A brass tablet by the side of the pulpit bears the inscription, "This church was gathered in 1635. The frame of this meeting-house was raised on the 26th, 27th, and 28th days of July, 1681, and the house was completed and opened for public worship on the 8th day of January, 1681-2. It cost the town £430 and the old house." Following is a list of the six pastors who have successively ministered to the church from 1635 to the present time. Rev. Calvin Lincoln, the present pastor, is a descendant of Rev. Peter Hobart, the first pastor, whose term of service extended from 1635 to 1679.

A Man Found Dying in a Cellar in New York on Wednesday, August 24th, from the effects of intemperance, is another instance out of many chronicled every day of the power of evil habit over men of ability and culture. From the contents of the dying man's pockets it was found that he was a Dane, whose connections in Denmark occupy a high position in society. Among his papers was a formal document on parchment, dated at Copenhagen, September 14th, 1879. It was a certificate issued by Dr. A. G. Drachman, saying that the bearer, a lieutenant in the Danish army and a candidate of philosophy and student of medicine, at the University of Copenhagen, had been in his service as an assistant physician and manipulator, and was very skilful and experienced. There were also several photographs, one being of a gray-haired man in the uniform of a general, and another of two little children caressing each other. The physicians at the hospital to which he was removed, say that he was completely saturated with liquor, yet he was a skilful surgeon and a man of education. Parents ought to see from this and similar cases that culture is no protection from this mania, and should teach their children to avoid liquor as they would the plague.

"A Rattlesnake is on the Bed" was the Start- ling information a lady gave her husband a few days ago at Rome, Ga. The couple had been away from home a few hours, and the lady on their return entering her chamber, saw a dark object on the bed. Happily she did not touch it, but struck a light, and then saw to her horror that it was a huge rattlesnake about six feet long. She called her husband, who succeeded in destroying it before it did any harm, but had she not discovered it in time, she and her husband in retiring to rest, might not have escaped injury. So has many a Christian, warned by the exhortations of his Saviour to constant watchfulness, been preserved from the wiles of the crafty enemy of souls, who is always active in places where men seek repose (Matt. 26 : 41).

THE MINSTREL.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

THE text is a somewhat singular one, but I hope it will suggest a profitable idea.

Elisha needed that the Holy Spirit should come upon him to inspire him with prophetic utterances. "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." We need that the hand of the Lord should be laid upon us, for we can never open our mouths in wisdom except we are under the divine touch. Now, the Spirit of God works according to His own will. "The wind bloweth where it listeth," and the Spirit of God operates as He chooseth. Elisha could not prophesy just when he liked; he must wait until the Spirit of God came upon him, and the Spirit of God could come or not even as He pleased. Elisha had noticed that the Spirit of God acted upon him most freely when his mind was restful and subdued. He found himself best prepared for the heavenly voice when the noise within his soul was hushed, and every disturbing emotion was quieted. Having ascertained this fact by observation, he acted upon it. He could not create the wind of the Spirit, but he could set his sail to receive it, and he did so.

At the particular time alluded to in the text Elisha had been greatly irritated by the sight of Jehoram, the king of Israel, the son of Ahab and Jezebel. In the true spirit of his old master, Elijah, the prophet let Jehoram know what he thought of him; and having delivered his soul, he very naturally felt agitated and distressed, and unfit to be the mouthpiece for the Spirit of God. He knew that the hand of the Lord would not rest upon him while he was in that state, and therefore he said, "Bring me a minstrel." The original Hebrew conveys the idea of a man accustomed to play upon the harp. Listening to the dulcet tones which were produced by a skilful harper, who very likely sang one of David's psalms to the music, the prophet waited awhile, and then the hand of the Lord came upon him.

Under the influence of minstrelsy his mind grew quiet, his agitation subsided, his thoughts were collected, and the Spirit of God spake through him. It was a most commendable thing for him to use the means which he had found at other times helpful, though still his sole reliance was upon the hand of the Lord. It would seem from a passage in the First Book of Samuel that Elisha was not the only prophet who had found music helpful, for we read, "Thou shalt meet a company of prophets coming down from the high place with a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp, before them; and they shall prophesy." Elisha, like his predecessors, only used a natural means for putting himself into readiness for receiving supernatural help.

Let us see if we can bring forth the practical lesson which this incident may teach us.

I. First: here is a lesson to those who wish to serve God, and to speak in His name. Let us strive to be in a fit state for the Lord's work. If we know of anything that will put our mind into such a condition that the Spirit of God is likely to work upon us and speak through us, let us make use of it. Elisha cried, "Bring me a minstrel;" let us also say—bring me that which will be helpful to me. The harper could be of no service to Elisha for bringing him inspiration; but by putting him into a calm, equable state of mind he prepared him for the heavenly communication and removed from his soul that which would have hindered the divine working.

It is very evident that we, too, like the prophet, have

OUR HINDRANCES.

We are at times unfit for the Master's use. Our minds are disarranged, the machinery is out of order, the sail is furled, the pipe is blocked up, the whole soul is out of gear. The hindrance in Elisha's case came from his surroundings. He was in a camp; a camp where three nations mixed their discordant voices; a noisy, ill-disciplined camp, and a camp ready to perish for thirst. There was no water, and the men-at-arms were perishing; the confusion and clamor must have been great. Prophetic thought could scarcely command itself amid the uproar, the discontent, the threatening from thousands of thirsty men.

Three kings had waited on the prophet; but this would not have disconcerted him had not one of them been Jehoram, the son of Ahab and Jezebel. What memories were awakened in the mind of Elijah's servant by the sight of the man in whom the proud dame of Sidon and her base-minded consort lived again. Naboth's vineyard must have come to his mind, and the stern threat of Elijah—"The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel." "For there was none like unto Ahab, which did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord, whom Jezebel his wife stirred up."

Elisha acted rightly, and bravely. When he saw Jehoram coming to him for help, he challenged him thus—"What have I to do with thee? Get thee to the prophets of thy father, and to the prophets of thy mother." When the king humbly and with bated breath confessed that he saw the hand of Jehovah in bringing the three kings together, the prophet scarcely moderated his tone, but exclaimed, "As the Lord of hosts liveth, before whom I stand, surely, were it not that I regard the presence of Jehoshaphat, the king of Judah, I would not look toward thee, nor see thee." It was fit that he should be in that temper; the occasion demanded it. Still it was not a fit preface to the inward whisper of the Spirit of God, and the prophet did not feel the circumstances were not soothing or elevating, and so he said, "Bring me a minstrel."

Do you not occasionally find yourself in an unhappy position? You have to preach, or to teach a class in school, or to carry an edifying word to a sick person; but everything distracts you. What with noise, or domestic trouble, or sinful neighbors, or the railing words of some wicked man, you cannot get into a fit frame of mind. You have had a duty to do which has caused you much pain and disquietude, and you cannot get over it, for everything conspires to worry you. Little things grieve great minds. The very sight of some individuals will throw a preacher off the rails. I know that the height of the pulpit, the thinness of the audience, the sleepiness of a hearer, or the heaviness of the atmosphere, may put the preacher's heart out of tune, and incapacitate him for the blessing. Yes, we have our hindrances even as Elisha had.

Elisha's hindrances lay mainly in his inward feelings; he could not feel the hand of the Lord upon him until the inner warfare had been pacified. Anger, even if it be of the purest kind, is a great disturber of the heart; it ruffles all our garments, and makes us unfit to minister before the Lord. I know of nothing that is more likely to put a man out of order for the communications of the Spirit of God than indignation. Even though we may be able to say, "I do well to be angry," yet it is a very trying emotion. The unruffled lake reflects the skies, but if it be tossed with tempest even the purest water becomes a broken mirror; even thus in the quiet of the soul the thoughts of God's Spirit are reflected, while in the rush of indignation they are broken and confused.

Moreover, the servant of God must have been the subject of a fierce internal conflict between two sets of thoughts. Indignation and pity strove within his heart. His justice and his piety made him feel that he could have nothing to do with two idolatrous kings; but pity and humanity made him wish to deliver the army from perishing by thirst. Like a patriot, he sympathized with his people; but, like a prophet, he was jealous for his God. The men of Judah and Israel, whatever they might be in character, were the Lord's people by covenant; he could not let them die; yet they had broken that covenant, and how could he help them? The prophet was perplexed, and his heart grew heavy.

How can we do the Lord's work when we are cast down in spirit? The joy of the Lord is our strength, and when we lose it our hands are feeble. When the heart is torn with inner conflict how can we speak words of comfort to those who are weary? We have need to escape from this inward strife before we can become sons of consolation to others. While rent with conflicting feeling, there was no rest in the prophet's spirit; and the hand of the Lord did not come upon him. Most wisely he did not attempt to speak in the name of the Lord, but sought for a means by which his excitement could be allayed. In the face of many hindrances we shall be wise if we imitate him. When we feel ourselves cumbered with much serving we shall act discreetly if we pause in it, and take Mary's place, for awhile, at least, and sit at Jesus' feet; or, if the service must be done at once, it will be well to use the readiest means for preparing the mind for doing it. It may be that some simple natural means will be helpful, and, if so, we must not be so ultra-spiritual as to disdain to cry, "Bring me a minstrel."

WHAT ARE OUR HELPS

when we are pressed with hindrances? Is there anything which in our case may be as useful as a harp? "Bring me a minstrel," said the prophet, for his mind was easily moved by that charming art. Music and song soothed and calmed, and cheered him.

> "Through every pulse the music stole,
> And held high converse with his soul."

On the wings of melody his mind rose above the noisy camp, and floated far away from the loathed presence of Jehoram; the melting mystic strain laid all his passions asleep, and his soul was left in silence to hear the voice of the Lord. Well did Luther say, "Music is the art of the prophets, the only art that can calm the agitations of the soul; it is one of the most magnificent and delightful presents God has given us."

Among our own helps singing holds a chief place; as saith the apostle, "Speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord." It is good to sing praises unto the Lord, and a part of its goodness lies in the comfort which it brings. It is not without significance, that after supper, before our Lord went to His great sacrifice, He sang a hymn. Did not even He find refreshment in that holy exercise? My mind dwells sweetly on a season which I have often mentioned to you when a new lie had been forged against me; a lie of peculiar bitterness, and it vexed me. I was never particularly pleased at being slandered, though I have had my fair share of it. Well, I went alone awhile, and sang over to myself in my own poor way:

> "If on my face, for Thy dear name,
> Shame and reproaches be,
> I'll hail reproach, and welcome shame,
> If Thou remember me."

By that means the sting was removed, and I felt merry again. "Bring me a minstrel;" the restoring means may be a little thing, but if you do not look to the linch-pin of a cart-wheel the wheel may come off, and down will go the cart, and what is the poor horse to do then? If you can get your mind right again by such a simple thing as singing, pray do not neglect it.

Suppose, however, that singing has no such power over you; let me recommend to you the quiet reading of a chapter of God's Word. Go upstairs and open the Book, and think upon a few verses. If you are much perplexed, read that blessed chapter which begins, "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in Me." Those verses act like a charm upon many minds; many and many a time a storm has subsided into a calm by the reading of those words. Some such passage read quietly will often operate as the harper acted upon Elisha. If time be pressing, see what is the text for the day in the almanac; or choose out some one precious promise which in other days was sweet to you. It is wonderful the effect of a single verse of Scripture when the Spirit of God applies it to the soul.

You will find it equal to bringing a minstrel, and perhaps even more efficient, if you will get alone to pray. That horrible Rabshakeh's letter—you read it, and then you wished you had never seen it. You put it behind the glass, but you fetch it out again, and read it again, and cry, "What a trial is this! who can bear it?" There is a kind of basilisk power in an abominable letter, so that you feel compelled to read it again and again. Can you not break the spell? What is the wisest course? Go upstairs, open it wide, spread it before the Lord, and say, "O Lord, Thou hast seen letters like this before; for Thy servant Hezekiah showed Thee one." I would say of every sorrow, "Pray over it."

It may be you will find fittest help in Christian association. I commend it to those believers who are seldom fit for God to use because they are morose and fault-finding. You ought to say, "Bring me a minstrel;"—find me some praying sister whom I may talk with, or find me some genial brother who rejoices in the Lord, and let me converse with such." It may be that the Master will join you and make a third, and then shall your heart be glad. Much misery is caused by Christians attempting to go to heaven alone.

What is the duty that arises out of this? It is this:

IF YOU GET INTO A BAD STATE DON'T STICK THERE.

"Ah," says one, "it is very close weather, and I feel depressed, so that the Spirit of God does not work upon my mind." Then cry at once, "Bring me a minstrel." Do not say, "I cannot help being stupid." You need not be; at least, not more so than you are by nature. You may get out of your dulness by making an effort, and you ought to make it. Did I not hear you say, "Everybody has gone away for a holiday, and I cannot leave my work. Trade is dull, and so am I?" But you need not be dull. Why should you always be heavy? You say, "I do not feel fit to go to my class," or, "I do not feel fit to preach." Should you, therefore, cease from the work of the Lord? By no means. Rouse yourself. Think of the way in which God has aforetime helped you, and use the same means again. While you are helping yourselves God will help you, and the hand of the Lord will come upon you.

Do not give way to feelings which unhinge you. Fight against them and cry with David, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul?" Still, do not rush into God's service in an unfit condition. Resort to such means as are within reach for calming the lower faculties, and then the Spirit of God will move upon your higher powers. Act rationally. Use you best judgment and most prudent endeavors, or we shall suspect that you have no particular wish to do the Lord's work, or fancy that anything is good enough for your God. Say to yourself, "Being in an unsuitable condition, I cannot expect God to use me. I must therefore get right."

This, then, is the first lesson, and I am sure there is real practical teaching in it, though some superior persons may despise it.

II. My second word is to those who have not yet found the Lord. We should

USE EVERY MEANS

to obtain the touch of the Divine hand. There are some here present who do not yet know whether they are believers in Christ or not; and I am sure I cannot tell them. I hope they are believers, for they are sincerely desirous of eternal salvation, but sometimes I am afraid they are not, for they do not appear to understand the meaning of the finished work of Christ. What are those who are earnestly seeking the Lord, to do? The reply is but one answer, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Faith is the only and only course commanded. But, some one

s. "Alas! I cannot get at that." But, my nd, you must get at it, or perish. Without h it is impossible to please God.

till, to help you, let me urge you to do this ch lies near at hand; if you cannot feel that Spirit of God will bless you as you are, call some minstrel, who may aid you in your search r the blessing. If there be any subordinate ns which may be helpful, use it with a view to higher and better thing. I would first say—If feel that you have not the faith which you ought ave, use what faith you have.

: is wonderful what an immense amount of pos- lity lies in a mustard seed of faith. It is a very ll, tiny thing; but sow it, and it will grow. ı have not enough faith to believe that Christ save you, but you have enough to feel sure : Christ can save you. That is something; l to it and follow it out to its fair conclusions. man has not money enough to pay for a week's visions, let him not starve; but let him spend t he has, hoping that more will come. Have a small dust of faith? use that, and it will tiply.

you want to feel the hand of the Lord, I would t say, Go and hear a sound, earnest, lively acher. I am advising you to do as I acted self. I was muddled, and could not exercise ı, and so I resolved to obey that other precept, ear, and your soul shall live."

ut suppose I have attended such a ministry, have found no good; what shall I do? Why, Scripture says, "Believe in the Lord Jesus ist, and thou shalt be saved." Still, if you can- get at this for the moment, attend earnest tings where souls have been converted, and ıy have been brought to Jesus's feet. Trust to preachers or meetings; but, still, go where rain is falling, and there may be a drop for . If a ministry is blessing others, resort to it, ying, "O Lord, bless me." Our immediate l is the hand of the Lord, and we may be made ly to receive it by hearing the Gospel; there- let us diligently incline our ear to the heavenly d.

would also strongly recommend you to get a l deal alone. You poor souls, who cannot find ist, and do not seem to understand what it is to eve in Him, should think much, and meditate h, upon Jesus and His cross. David said, "I ıght on my ways, and turned my feet unto Thy imonies." If you want a minstrel, think of r sin, your sin against your God, till it breaks r heart; then think of Christ, His nature, His k, His love, His deeds of mercy; think of the y Spirit, and His power to renew, regenerate, fort, sanctify; think over those precious truths he Word of God, which are set there on purpose ɔe beacons to light souls to Christ, and while are thinking of these it shall be to you as when minstrel played, and the hand of the Lord ıe upon His prophet

I. Thirdly, we should more abundantly use

ıts and sinners, too, would find it greatly to r benefit if they said, "Bring me a minstrel." s is the world's cry whenever it is merry, and d with wine. The art of music has been pros- ed to the service of Satan. Charles Wesley said:

"Listed into the cause of sin,
Why should a good be evil?
Music, alas! too long has been
Press'd to obey the devil.
Drunken, or lewd, or light, the lay
Flow'd to the soul's undoing;
Widen'd, and strew'd with flowers the way Down to eternal ruin."

is for us to use singing in the service of God, to make a conquest of it for our Redeemer. rldlings want the minstrel to excite them; we t him to calm our hearts and still our spirits. t is his use to us, and we shall do well to em- the harper to that end.

et us give instances: I will suppose that this ning you were thinking about coming up to the mbly of God's people, and you felt hardly up he mark. It would have been wise to do as I this morning. I read at family prayer the eighty-fourth Psalm: "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!" What a sweet piece of Sabbath minstrelsy it is!

When the house is full of trouble, and your heart is bowed down, is it not well to say—"Bring me a minstrel, and let him sing to me the twenty-seventh Psalm. 'The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid? When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell. Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident.'" You need not confine the harper to that one strain; for David has written many psalms for burdened hearts. It is wonderful what provision God has made of sacred minstrels to play us up out of the depths into the heights if we will but make a right use of them.

I will suppose you are in a state of alarm; it may be there is a thunder-storm, or possibly a disease is stalking through the land. Did you ever sing in such times that forty-sixth Psalm: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble." I remember being in a family one night when I was but a lad, when everybody in the house, strong men though some of them were, trembled and were afraid. A child was upstairs and must be brought down; but no one dared to pass by the window on the staircase. Well do I remember fetching down the child, awed, but not alarmed, and then I sat down and read aloud the ninety-first Psalm, and saw how it quieted both men and women. Ah, my brethren, David as a musician is one of a thousand; we need no other minstrel. The Word of God hushes the tempest of the soul, and refreshes the heart with a celestial dew. "Bring me a minstrel," but let him sing us one of

THE SONGS OF ZION.

Do you ever get depressed in spirit, beloved friends? I fear you do; and are you ever troubled because you seem to have more affliction than anybody else? Have you watched the wicked and seen them prosperously sailing while you have been tossed to and fro on a raging sea of troubles? Do you want to get peace to your mind by the power of the Holy Spirit? Then say, "Bring me a minstrel;" and let him sing that thirty-seventh Psalm, "Fret not thyself because of evil-doers." Or if you would have a change from the thirty-seventh, turn the figures round, and let him sing the seventy-third, and the notes will run thus: "Truly God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart. But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped." You will not be long before you will rise to the note—"Whom have I in Heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee. My flesh and my heart faileth; but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever."

When we come to die we will breathe our last breath to music. Then will we say, "Bring me a harper," and like Jacob and Moses we will sing ere we depart. Our song is ready. It is the twenty-third Psalm: "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil; for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me."

This is the kind of minstrel for me. Say you not so, my brethren? When you are in trouble or distress will you not remember your songs in the night? If such be the strain, I am of the same mind as Martin Luther, whose words I have copied out to read to you. His language is always strong.

thunderbolts. "One of the finest and noblest gifts of God is music. This is very hateful to the devil, and with it we may drive off temptations and evil thoughts. After theology I give the next place and highest honor to music. It has often aroused and moved me so that I have won a desire to preach. We ought not to ordain young men to the office of preacher if they have not trained themselves and practised singing in the schools." That is pretty strong. I fear many would not have been preachers if they must first have been singers. Still, there is a power about song; and to sing the praises of God in psalms such as those I have read to you is most consoling.

Suppose you have done with the minstrelsy which I have now mentioned, there is next the music of gospel doctrine. I confess to you that, when depressed in spirit, I love a bit of thorough Calvinistic doctrine. I turn to "Coles on Divine Sovereignty," and relish his plain speaking upon sovereign grace. The doctrine of election is noble music; predestination is a glorious hallelujah. Grace abounding, love victorious, truth unchanging, faithfulness invincible; these are melodies such as my ear delights in. The truth of God is fit music for angels. The harps of the redeemed never resound with more noble music than the doctrines of grace. Every truth has its melody, every doctrine is a psalm unto God. When my heart is faint, "Bring me a minstrel," and let him sing of free grace and dying love.

If these do not charm you, fetch a minstrel from experience. Think how God has dealt with you in times of sorrow and darkness long gone by, and then you will sing, "His mercy endureth forever." That one hundred and third Psalm might last a man from now till he entered heaven, he need not change the strain—"Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless His holy name." He may keep on chanting it until his song melts into the hymn of the angels, and he adds another voice to the chorus of the redeemed above.

If you want music, there is yet a sweeter store. Go fetch a minstrel from Calvary. Commend me for sweetness to

THE MUSIC OF THE CROSS.

At Calvary I hear music set to the minor key, which has bred more joy beneath the skies than all else. Hear it: "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Jesus deserted is the comfort of deserted souls; Jesus crying, "Why hast Thou forsaken Me?" is the joy of the spirit that has lost the light of God's countenance. That grave and solemn note can lift despair into delight.

But if you want another hymn of the cross to be sung with the accompaniment of the high-sounding cymbals, or with trumpet and sound of cornet, let me commend you to this other song of the cross, "It is finished." All music lies there. Condensed into those three words you have the harmonies of eternity, the melodies of the infinite. Angels themselves when on their loftiest key did never sing a canticle so sweet. "Consummatum est" is the consummation of song. "It is finished;" sin is blotted out, reconciliation is complete, everlasting righteousness is brought in, and believing souls are saved. Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Till the day break, and the shadows flee away, "Bring me a minstrel," and let us sing unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, to Him be glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

[PORTIONS OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Psalm 136; 2 Kings 3: 1–15.

The Story of Joseph has been Dramatized in the Mahrattee language of India, and brought out by a Hindoo theatrical company in the principal theatre of Bombay, and playbills in the Mahrattee language give the outline of the plot. The scene is laid in India, and the name of Joseph has been changed to Jayapal. The story has been altered and accommodated to the tastes of theatre-going people. The religious element is eliminated. Jayapal has six half-brothers who resolve to kill him; they thrust him into a cave and cover the mouth of it with a stone. Some soldiers travelling that way stop to rest in the neighborhood of the cave, hear the youth's cries, deliver him and take him with them. He is next found in the camp of the commander-in-chief of Sarungpoor, whose wife seeks to seduce him, and failing, has him cast into prison. The king has a bad dream and summons the Brahmans to explain it; but being told of Jayapal sends for him. Then follows Joseph's promotion, his marriage with the king's daughter, and so on to the end.
